I congratulate you on the occupation of a potent position, and on your faithful witnessing for the essentialities of religion and morality. May you long continue to lead, correct, inspire and develop thought and activity. Sanctify sagacity for service. Look earnestly upward, with the word in your heart:—

> "I asked no perfumed gale,
> I ask the unpampering breath
> That fits me to endure."

ALEX. WEBSTER.

Aberdeen, June 28.

DEAR INQUIRER.—Having known you since you reached your "majority," I have much pleasure in sending you greeting on the attainment of your Diamond Jubilee. I hope you may receive a growing share of that respect for age which seems to each of us more becoming as our point of view changes with the lapse of years. An INQUIRER of sixty years standing! That surely is a sign of rare openness and candour of mind. But does someone quote the text: "Ever learning and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth?" In reply it may be said that the principle for which you stand and which is implied in your title has proved far more fruitful in the acquisition of truth than the one to which it is opposed, and, moreover, that it obtains much wider recognition to-day than at any previous period of your life. Here is a two-fold encouragement. Greater encouragement still is the fact that your work lies before you and not behind. May you, like Wordsworth's "Happy Warrior":

> Look forward, persevering to the last,
> From well to better, daily self-surpast.

JAMES HARWOOD.

Further Greetings from the Revs. S. A. Steinthal, C. B. Upton, Frank Walters, J. Estlin Carpenter, F. K. Freeston, and J. M. Lloyd Thomas we must keep for next week.

A HOLIDAY FOR TIRED MOTHERS.

AT Great Hucklow, high up among the Derbyshire hills, amidst beautiful scenery, stands the Holiday Home established by the Manchester District Sunday School Association.

Week by week through the summer, parties of scholars and teachers, with a sprinkling of fathers and mothers, go out to have a country holiday; and recently an opportunity occurred for a party of a different kind to occupy the Home. No school had applied for the use of the building from June 7 to 14, and the Committee decided to act upon the suggestion of their chairman, the Rev. C. Peach, and to invite five of the schools, amongst them the three missions, to send twelve women, tired mothers if possible, at a somewhat lower cost than that usually charged.

The notice was rather short, and the full number was not obtained in all cases; but in the end a party of thirty-six mothers, old and young, eight little children who could not be left behind, with three helpers, met at the Central Station with bags and parcels, fully determined to enjoy the week's outing in spite of the rain which was falling.

The journey itself was a pleasure. Eyes accustomed to grey colourless streets and monotonous rows of houses were refreshed by the vivid green of grass and foliage, and the soft blue of wild hyacinths and sheets of forget-me-nots; while fine views of hill and valley, grey crag and winding river made the hour's journey full of interest.

Arrived at Millers Dale the party was packed into waggonettes, and enjoyed the beautiful drive up to Great Hucklow as much as a strong wind and cold showers of rain would allow.

Some of the travellers were very cold and tired when we arrived at the Holiday Home, but the sight of the tables set ready for us cheered drooping spirits, and good hot cups of tea made every one feel happy again. The Matron was kindness itself, and with her willing staff, did all she could to make the party comfortable.

Settling into the unaccustomed quarters took some time, but it was found in the end that tired mothers can be as lively as a party of children (or even of ministers, if Rumour does not lie), and there was not much sleep the first night.

Taking this into consideration we got through our wet Sunday very well. Most of us went down to and enjoyed the services in the old chapel. Many letters were written to the faraway home people, and there was a great demand for the paper and postcards adorned with a picture of the Home. Several of the women could not write, and one saw them carefully dictating in a low voice to friends who were acting as their secretaries.

The unaccustomed leisure was a wonderful thing to them—sometimes a little difficult to enjoy. One of them said one day "I just feel that I could like to set to and scrub the floor, or clean the windows" a remark which need not be taken as reflecting in any way on the condition of the said floor or windows.

One had many glimpses into hard lives. One young delicate-looking woman works to support an idle, or unfortunate, husband, and their little boy. On her way back, tired after her long day, she fetches the child from a neighbour's, and then gets home to find all her housework waiting to be done. Sometimes in addition to this there is some necessary patching or darning to be done when the little boy is in bed.

The meals were much enjoyed. For one thing the women never knew what was coming and had not had to do the cooking. This was a great treat. Then the food itself was excellent; simple, but good and well-cooked.

Porridge did not find many supporters the first morning, but soon grew in favour, till only two or three declined it, and many asked for second helpings, and said they should make it at home. The helpers had their hands full, keeping cups and plates supplied. The piles of bread and butter vanished like snow on a summer's day—much more quickly, in fact, than cake—and famous appetites were developed during the holiday.

The weather was uncertain, to say the least of it, all the week, and long expeditions were out of the question. A drive to Buxton was taken one day by some of the party, but for the most part short walks were all that could be managed. The verandah was a favourite place for those who could not walk much. They could sit there and enjoy the view, and the sweet air and the quiet.

In the evenings we had sometimes singing or games, or reading aloud. On the Thursday evening we had a concert, at which, besides songs from our Manchester party, much kind help in songs and accompaniments was given by the General Superintendent, the Rev. Sydney Street, and several Hucklow friends.

The end of the week came all too soon. There was a great gathering of flowers, so that all who liked should be able to take home bunches of cowslips, blue-bells, marsh-marigolds, &c. Besides these, many carried to the home-people more solid country-products in the shape of oat-cake, butter, and eggs.

There were some lamentations over the weather during the week, but the general feeling of all was that they had had such a holiday as they had seldom or never before enjoyed, and they went home eager to repeat the experiment.

ONE OF THE HELPERS.

CITY CINDERELLAS.

SIR,—You were good enough last year to allow me the use of your columns to describe the operations of our Cinderella Club, and so to enlist the sympathy and help of many of your readers. I shall esteem it a favour if you will allow me to plead the same cause once more. Our Manchester Cinderella Clubs, of which there are some half dozen or so at work now, grew originally out of the heart and mind of Mr. R. Blatchford "Numquam." Advocating great schemes of far-reaching social reform, he was yet unwilling to put off to the far days of their realisation any instalment of their promise, at least, so far as the children were concerned. And so he induced his friends and readers to gather the most destitute of the city children into little groups and to provide them with good cheer during the drear winter evenings. Our club at the Upper Brook-street Free Church had no connection with the original movement, but it has imbibed its spirit and works on its lines, and so it takes the common name. We have about 100 members in our club, the poorest and most comfortless to be found in the neighbourhood of our church; children absolutely destitute, many of them orphans or worse, the best of them the care of widowed mothers. Many without hats or shoes, all of them poorly clad, they come to us one night a week during the winter for warmth and food and amusement. A warm meal, a lantern or musical entertainment, a few hymns and national songs and a short talk fill up the two hours and the children reluctantly depart. All through the winter we meet weekly; in spring and summer we meet monthly so as to keep in touch with them until the time for their great annual treat comes round. This, the hope and dream of the year, is their week at the seaside. Bathed, scrubbed, hair cut short (in case of boys) and dressed out in the simple camp uniform (their own clothes left behind with the old life) they are taken off in batches to the camp at St. Anne's, where they spend long happy days in the sand hills and on the shore. What such a change means to them it is impossible to say. I can only speak of their gratitude, their wonder and delight, and of the nervous eagerness with which they look forward in fear and hope for the season to come round again. And now the season is here. Many of our children have already been away for their week, others are preparing to follow. But it all means great expense. Our expenses last year amounted to £26, of which your readers subscribed a generous proportion. May I again beg their kind help? Their own holidays will be the happier for their kind thought for others.

WILLASTON SCHOOL.

SPEECH DAY.

THE second year's Speech Day at Willaston School, which took place on Monday, June 30, was a very successful and pleasant event. A large number of parents, governors, and friends attended the proceedings. Amongst them were Rev. S. A. Steinthal (Chairman of Governors), Rev. H. E. Dowson, Rev. J. E. Odgers, Rev. A. Chalmers, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Jevons, Mr. Monks, Mr. Nicholson, Mr. Henry Greg, Rev. L. P. Jacks and Mrs. Jacks, Mr. S. B. Worthington, Miss Worthington, and Mr. A. H. Worthington, Mr. and Mrs. Coventry, Mr. and Mrs. F. W. Monks, Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Coventry, Rev. T. Lloyd Jones, Rev. Ceredig Jones, Rev. H. Gow, Mr. Rayner Wood, Mr. Russell Scott, Mr. J. H. Leigh, Rev. P. M. Higginson, Rev. and Mrs. E. A. Maley, Rev. H. E. Haycock, and many others.

The Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL took the chair, in the Gymnasium, soon after 2.30 P.M., and, after an opening song by the School, gave a short address, welcoming parents and visitors to the School. He referred to the national sorrow for the King's illness, and expressed the great satisfaction in which all must share on hearing the latest news of his improving condition. He also referred to the report of the Inspector of the Oxford and Cambridge Board, and congratulated the School on the generally satisfactory account of the year's work there given. The School on this second Speech Day may claim to have taken root and to be growing in strength. The number of boys at present is thirty-one. The Governors have the greatest confidence in the headmaster and in all the staff, and are convinced that the School is doing most useful and admirable work. Mr. Steinthal concluded by an appeal to the boys to feel the responsibility laid on them to build up traditions of hard work and skilful play and manliness, of which they and the School might be proud in days to come.

Mr. GUY LEWIS, the headmaster, then gave a very interesting address. After giving a welcome to all present, and especially to parents of the boys, he said he would be glad if every boy received one visit a term from his parents. No half-term holiday had yet been fixed, because he felt, whatever time was set apart would probably be inconvenient to some parents. He wanted them to feel that every day was parents' day, and that they would be always heartily welcomed at the school. In public schools one great feature is the friendship formed amongst the boys. Willaston School had, however, an especial advantage in that many of the boys came from families where there had been long-established hereditary friendship which would be continued amongst their sons. Even when the parents were unknown at present to each other, he might claim that there was an intense and sympathetic communion in educational and religious ideals amongst them all which gave strength and consecration to the work of the school and united them together in a common desire for its prosperity. The past year had been a year of continuous development. The numbers have increased and would have increased more if it had not been for the entrance examination which had excluded several applicants. The standard of the school was high, and the scheme of instruction comprehensive. He had hoped that the boys could have entered for the Oxford and Cambridge examinations, but the age of the boys had this year precluded him from making this attempt. An inspection, therefore, by the Oxford and Cambridge Board, had been substituted for an examination. The inspection had been carried out in March by Mr. Kitchener, headmaster of a well-known public school. He had examined paper work of every boy in the school, and had spent two days at the school, taking careful note of the instruction and its effects. His report, as Mr. Steinthal had said, was very encouraging and helpful to them all. Mr. Lewis then said that last year he had referred to the modern-language teaching of the school; this year he wished to say a few words as to the science teaching. In both junior and senior classes Botany was taught three times a week in summer with constant reference to the living flowers. In winter Zoology in relation to animals and birds was taught to the junior class. The senior class studied alternately advanced Zoology, especially insects, and Geology and Mineralogy. There was a united class for Physics, Heat and Magnetism being taken one year and Electricity the next. He hoped in a few years to be able to read on Speech Day a list of honours won by past and present members of the school. The life of the school was too young as yet. He was glad to announce that Chalmers had passed responsions at Oxford. He had learnt all his Greek in four and a half terms at Willaston. He will be the first boy to go up to Oxford from the school and initiate the definite connection of Willaston with the old Universities. He (Mr. Lewis) was assured that both morally and intellectually he would do honour to Willaston in his University career. The athletic sports which had been recently held, were excellent, and considering the size of the school, he thought them equal to any in the country. On two days each week there was swimming in the Town baths, which were reserved for the school on those days. The cricket team was much stronger than last year. All the boys had been measured and weighed in the winter, and a recent re-measurement showed great improvement in them all We encourage honest sentiment amongst the boys. We find an opportunity in the work of the school in our relationship with one another, and in our relationship with the lower animals. Over our museum are written the words:

> Never to blend our pleasures or our pride
> With sorrow of the meanest thing that feels.

And that is the spirit of all the teaching of the school in its relationship with nature. Mr. Lewis concluded by an appeal for further contributions to the School Library. Some few had been most generous and kind in their donations, but it was natural that more books should be needed. The library was especially in need of annotated editions of the classics, books on English history, and simple scientific text-books.

After Mr. Lewis's speech there followed a short musical and dramatic programme provided by the boys. It consisted of songs and piano playing, a recitation from Coriolanus, and another in German from Wallenstein. Both music and recitations were very interesting, and were much enjoyed by all. Tea was afterwards served in the dining-hall, and brought a very successful Speech Day to its close.

It was especially gratifying to Governors and Masters to hear the terms of high appreciation and gratitude in which parent after parent spoke of the influence of the school upon their sons. H. G.

CARMARTHEN COLLEGE.

The annual distribution of prizes in connection with the Presbyterian College, Carmarthen, took place on Friday, June 20. The chair was occupied by the Rev. G. Dawes Hicks, M.A., Ph.D., the examiner in Philosophy. The other members of the deputation from the Presbyterian Board were: Mr. Harold Baily (the examiner in English literature and hygiene), the Rev. R. H. U. Bloor, B.A. (apologetics and ecclesiastical history), and Mr. Talfourd Ely, M.A. (classics), Mr. G. Harold Clennell was present as secretary to the Presbyterian Board. The Rev. J. H. Woods, M.A. (examiner in Hebrew and Greek Testament), was unable to be present.

The Chairman, in opening the proceedings, delivered a valuable address, in which, after congratulating the students on the work done in his own department of philosophy and on the general results of the session, he conveyed to the Principal and his colleagues an assurance of the unabated confidence of the Presbyterian Board in the ability and faithfulness with which they carried on the work of the College. He then gave an account of the new departure about to be taken by the College, in connection with the post-graduate degree in theology established by the University of Wales, by which the teaching staff would be enlarged and scholarships provided for students of divinity, he offered a welcome to the Rev. Kerri Evans, newly-appointed to a professorship in the College, and enlarged upon the need of adequate intellectual training for the due fulfilment in the present day of a minister's duties.

This address we must reserve for fuller publication next week.

Mr. Harold Baily, who was the next speaker, referred to the enthusiasm Dr. Hicks had thrown into the working out of the new scheme, and quoted the report of the Committee of the Welsh University which had visited all the theological colleges in Wales, and said of the Presbyterian College "There is no college in Wales that has so long a history or a more honourable record. It would be much to be regretted that it should be outstripped in the race or left out of any scheme that aims at academic comprehension." The Presbyterian Board felt that the College could not stand still. It must go back or else take its place and go forward. They felt that it was not right to allow the College to go back; and they had made considerable efforts which they hoped would be crowned with success. One of the qualifications for the new theological degree was residence at one of the constituent theological colleges in connection with the University of Wales. He believed he was speaking correctly in saying that Carmarthen College was the only truly unsectarian college in Wales; therefore, if they were not able to keep up with the times they would have this state of affairs possible—that a student could not obtain a degree except he attended a sectarian college. That was a condition of affairs which they did not wish to see existing. They had proved at that college that it was possible to find a common basis in theology, and to run a college course on that basis. It was a position which they were pledged to uphold and they would do their best to uphold it in the future. He thought that one advantage of the new scheme would be that it would induce men who had a wider outlook than those who came for the ordinary three years course, to attend the college; this could not fail to raise the tone of the college, and could not fail to have its effect on the other students.

The Rev. R. H. U. Bloor, Mr. Clennell, and Mr. Talfourd Ely having spoken, with various interesting comments on the work of the College, Mr. Clennell, also conveying a greeting from the Rev. T. L. Marshall, his predecessor as secretary to the Board, Principal Evans referred with pleasure to the presence of the venerable Rev. D. L. Evans, the oldest surviving student of the college, having been admitted in 1834, and afterwards one of the professors and his own tutor, and then proceeded to distribute the prizes.

Subsequently addresses were given by Professors Weatherall and Lewis, and Professor D. L. Evans, who offered his congratulations on the striking progress of education in Wales since the day when his mother sent him to school to a shoemaker who had failed in his trade, and turned schoolmaster.

The Rev. A. F. Mills, as a local minister, added a few words, and the Rev. D. J. Thomas closed the meeting with prayer.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Appeal.

London: Bermondsey.—I shall be grateful for subscriptions towards the expenses of the Scholars' Summer Excursion. Friends will remember that the church is still pastorless—hence my appeal. It is hoped that a minister will soon be settled here, but meanwhile let us encourage the teachers and children.—W. G. Tarrant, 4, Geraldine-road, Wandsworth, S.W.

Accrington.—On Coronaion Day a short service was held in the chapel at 9.15, after which a procession of scholars and friends, to the number of 130, marshalled by Mr. S. Lancaster and Mr. A. Webster, walked to a central open space and there joined the other Sunday schools of the town, in singing appointed hymns. The Mayor presented medals to all Sunday scholars under fourteen. On Sunday last the marble table font, placed in the chapel recently in memory of the late Edmund Mills, was used for the first time at the dedication and christening of Annie, daughter of William and Alice Hitchon.

Acton.—The services which were commenced at the beginning of the year in the Central Auction Room, under the auspices of the Provincial Assembly, has been the means of gathering the nucleus of a congregation which is likely to become permanent. The district is a rapidly growing one, and the facilities of communication with the City by the tube and electric tramways are so great, that a large population is springing up in all directions. Several Unitarian families have become residents, and are anxious that a spiritual home should be established. The attendance at the services have been fairly good, considering that atmospheric influences have not been very genial. A conference of friends interested in this new movement was held on Saturday afternoon, the 21st inst., in the Central Auction Room, presided over by Mr. John Harrison, President of the Provincial Assembly, and supported by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, B.A., Chairman of the London District Unitarian Society, and the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards. A local committee was formed to organise the work, Mr. E. B. Athawes was elected secretary and Mr. Bernard Lewis treasurer. A very unanimous opinion was expressed, that with a suitable minister the prospects were most hopeful. It has been resolved to discontinue the services from the middle of July till the middle of September, when they will be resumed.

Cwmbach: South Wales.—The annual tea was held on Monday, June 23, when 350 sat down at the tables. In the evening a capital concert was given, presided over by the Rev. David Rees, Pentre. A real day of enjoyment was spent by all concerned.

Heaton Moor.—As as a preparation for the higher enjoyment of the summer holidays, the Rev. Priestley Prime is giving a course of Sunday evening sermons on "Wordsworth." 1. The Prelude. 2. An Excursion with Wordsworth. 3. God in Nature. 4. The Worth of Humanity.

Lancaster.—A united public service of Nonconformists was held, on what should have been Coronation Day, in the Independent Chapel, High-street. The service was organised by the Free Church Council, and not only was the St. Nicholas-street congregation invited to be present, but the Rev. J. Channing Pollard took part in the service—reading one of the lessons. Another instance of the catholicity of spirit prevailing in this district was a recent invitation to Mr. Pollard to take the Sunday-school for its summer treat to the house and grounds of a prominent Roman Catholic, an ex-M.P. The local papers also gave an almost verbatim report of Mr. Pollard's sermon on "The Declaration of Peace."

London: Kentish Town: Free Christian (Unitarian) Church.—At a general meeting of the congregation, held on Monday evening last, the Rev. George Critchley, B.A. (formerly for nearly thirty years minister of the Burnt Ash Congregational Church, Lee, Kent), was unanimously invited to, and has accepted, the ministry of this church.

London Sunday School Society: Aggregate Service.—The aggregate service for teachers and elder scholars was held at Essex Hall on Sunday afternoon, June 22, conducted by the Rev. J. Ellis, of Mansford-street, assisted by the Rev. W. Chynoweth Pope, president of the society. There were about 230 teachers and scholars present. The singing was led by the Unity Church Sunday-school choir, the winner of the society's banner this year, who also sang as an anthem, "O lovely peace." They were well supported by representatives from Bermondsey, Deptford, Essex Church, Highgate, Mansford-street, Newington Green, Portland-street, Stepney, Stratford, and Stamford-street, the last sending a strong detachment of their Boys' Own Brigade. Mr. John Brittan ably presided at the organ. Mr. Ellis, taking advantage of the thoughts and anticipations (so unhappily disappointed) which were thus present in the minds of all, sought to impress upon his youthful hearers the deeply religious significance both of the ceremony of Coronation and of the outward signs of the nation's rejoicing. Then adapting these thoughts to the inner life, he reminded them of that "little kingdom" which each child of God is called to rule. The singing of the "National Anthem" concluded the service.

North Lancashire and Westmorland Unitarian Association.—The summer conference was held at Kendal on Saturday, June 28, when delegates and friends assembled in force from Chorley, Preston, Blackpool, and Lancaster. The Committee received the Blackpool (South Shore) Chapel scheme, and gave it the very hearty approval of the Association. The reopening of the chapel at Chorley on Wednesday, July 2, and the following Sunday, after renovation, was announced and commended to the notice of the Association. The financial aspect of the scheme of lectures promoted in February last, was presented by the treasurer (Mr. F. Chadderton), and though there appeared to be a monetary loss, on the whole, the lectures were considered to have been helpful to the churches, and an extension of the idea will be considered at an adjourned committee meeting, whereby a series of lectures will be arranged for delivery throughout the district in the autumn. The Rev. H. V. Mills, President of the Association, gave an address in the evening, and referring to the need for unions such as this, said it was good in some respects to be solitary, that it meant much to be solitary for the sake of a principle, and there is not much need to bemoan our isolation; these gatherings, however, afforded help and sympathy, and one got from union with kindred souls strength and encouragement for continued work. The secretary (Mr. R. Newell), who had been sent by the Association to attend the May meetings at Essex Hall, briefly related his impressions. Two things impressed him in connection with Mrs. Osler's paper ; one, that we have a goodly heritage, won for us at a great price, and dearly to be prized and held ; but we should be compelled to enlarge the sphere of our activities if we are to hold our own in the van of progress ; the other, that there is a vast unused amount of intellect and enthusiasm which we ought to find scope for. In the work of the future there should be an enlarged sphere for women's work. Other points he touched upon, and especially on the need of a reform of our Senior Class system, as most necessary, whether on the lines indicated by Mr. Critchley or some other way. During the evening the Kendal friends provided a very enjoyable programme of music and drama, which was exceedingly well rendered, and appreciated greatly by the audience. The Rev. J. Channing Pollard, of Lancaster, and Mr. Sutcliffe, of Chorley, also spoke, and joined in submitting a vote of thanks to the Kendal friends for the admirable way in which the Conference had been entertained.

Parkstone.—Well-attended services were conducted on Sunday last in the Emerson Hall, at which Mr. F. Maddison gave addresses, in the afternoon on "What War is," and in the evening on "The Message of Christ for To-day." Great interest was shown in the proceedings by those attending, and thanks were expressed to the speaker for the able manner in which he had dealt with his subjects. The Rev. A. Hood and Mr. Bushrod conducted the devotional exercises, while a quartette from the Poole church sang an anthem.

Scarborough.—The annual picnic of the Westborough Unitarian Church took place on Friday, June 4, to Langdale End, reached by carriage and cycle, and much enjoyed by about eighty members and friends.

Todmorden.—On Sunday, June 22, the Sunday-school anniversary was held, when the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter preached in the morning and evening to large and deeply-impressed congregations. The Rev. Arthur W. Fox was the afternoon preacher to a large congregation. The choir rendered much music admirably. The collections exceeded £54, and are the largest for many years.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE news of the King's steady progress towards complete recovery has been received with the utmost satisfaction and thankfulness throughout the country. A week ago the surgeons announced that they considered their patient to be out of danger, and only one daily bulletin has since been issued. On that day also the King's dinner to half a million of his people in London was successfully given at various centres, the chief of which were visited by the Prince and Princess of Wales and other members of the Royal Family. How the dinner went at Highgate-hill and at Mansford-street Church may be seen in our column of "News from the Churches." On the whole it would appear that the King's kindly intention has been happily carried out.

"GOD SAVE THE KING!" is the title of the sermon preached by the Rev. Charles Hargrove on the Sunday following the postponement of the Coronation, and now published as the July number of the Mill Hill Pulpit. Speaking in conclusion of the history and significance of the National Anthem, the sermon ends as follows:—"The burden of the song is not English, it is not in any sense modern, it is old as organised Society. With some such shout doubtless did our West-Saxon forefathers proclaim Cerdic their king in Hampshire, and enthrone him upon an uplifted shield, their Kin-ing, their Kin's own, their Son of Man, representative of the tribe. Father, that rough warrior, though they knew it not nor could have dreamt it, of all the kings that were yet to be in the land of whose south-western shore they had just taken rude possession. Fourteen hundred years ago was that, and fourteen hundred years before had they so shouted in a far away Eastern Land when they greeted Saul, 'the chosen of Jehovah, higher than any of the people from his shoulders and upward,' King of Israel.

"And we 'the latest seed of time,' men of the twentieth century, shall we account it progress to be less loyal, less enthusiastic in our loyalty, than were they the men of old? Free of lordship, even as they our fierce forefathers, we would be no more than they free of law, nor subject to the fitful caprice of popular election which would give us rulers whom the larger half of us desired, and ever a lesser half repudiated. But now and from of old time have we chosen our King of a race which crossed the sea with us to take possession of the land, which except for the two conquerors, Dane and Norman, has never failed of a descendant to sit upon our throne, which is represented now in our seventh Edward, whose children's children, may it please God, shall inherit of him the glorious heritage untarnished and undiminished, which the free consent of people gives to him and to his race.

"God save the King!—Save him in this the hour of peril from disease and death, save him from evil counsellors and flatterers, save him from lawless ambition! may it be his salvation ever to remember himself subject and servant, even as is the meanest, of Him who alone is King of Kings, and Lawgiver of all nations and all worlds!"

THE contributions of "Greeting, Counsel, and Good Wishes" from friends both in this country and abroad, are completed in our present issue, celebrating the Diamond Jubilee of THE INQUIRER, the first number of which was issued July 9, 1842. Other letters and messages we have received, for which we are sorry not to be able to make room, but for all alike we are grateful and feel very deeply the overflowing kindness of our friends. That we can really take all the good advice we have received with the good wishes, is not to be expected, for as we pointed out last week, one suggestion is neutralised by another; but certainly we are greatly strengthened and encouraged to go forward.

THE first public announcement of a new "Quarterly Review of Religion, Theology, and Philosophy" is enclosed as a special supplement with the present issue of THE INQUIRER, and we desire to commend this circular very earnestly to the attention of our readers. Since the discontinuance of the New World, which though it came to us from across the Atlantic, we felt to stand fitly in the honourable succession of such liberal religious Quarterlies as the Prospective, the old National, and the Theological Reviews, followed by the Modern, and the later Christian Reformer, the ground has been unoccupied, and we have felt the need of such an organ of the highest thought and scholarship in our midst. To the new Hibbert Journal, with the Rev. L. P. Jacks, M.A., as editor, the Rev. G. Dawes Hicks, M.A., Ph.D., as sub-editor, and a most distinguished editorial board, including the Deans of Ely and Durham, Dr. Drummond, Principal of Manchester College; Professors Cheyne and Percy Gardner, of Oxford; Mr. Claude Montefiore; Dr. Oliver Lodge, Principal of Birmingham University, and others, we shall look with the utmost confidence and hope, and trust that a similar faith will at once prompt a large number of our readers to become subscribers.

THE Journal, it will be seen, is to be issued under the sanction and with the support of the Hibbert Trustees, and in a form which would seem to leave nothing to be desired. We note with special satisfaction that there is to be an annual "Ecclesiastical Summary," a feature of the Theological Review (where the summary was quarterly), which under the editorship of the late Charles Beard, was of the greatest value. As to the subject matter of the Hibbert Journal, we would call particular attention to what the editor says under the headings of Religion, Theology and Philosophy. Under the head of Religion, he will look, he says "to the religious experiences of mankind of whatsoever variety."

All religious ideals, beliefs, states of feeling, conceptions of God, the Universe, and the Soul, together with the bearings of these on public worship, social duty, and personal piety, will be offered an impartial representation.

As to the general character of the Journal, we cordially welcome the following declaration:—

The editor does not desire the Journal to represent a neutral attitude in regard to the above subjects. It will stand for the inner unity of all reverent minds. Its sympathies will be catholic, but they will be mainly directed towards an affirmative view of the central verities of religion. It will avowedly have a "liberal" character, not in the sense of confining its sympathies and offering its opportunities to novel opinions, but in the larger sense of admitting articles representing every seriously held point of view in the religious world, whether in the orthodox forms of historical Christian Churches, or among those who dissent from them, or among the thoughtful adherents of non-Christian religions in any part of the world.

In pursuing the aims of the Journal the distinction will be remembered between a genuine catholicity and the mere spirit of compromise. The Journal will not represent the latter, but will seek rather to publish opinions which are earnestly held, clearly defined, and cogently maintained.

THE list of honours published as intended to be conferred at the Coronation included a knighthood for the President of the Royal College of Surgeons, and a baronetcy for the Master of the Rolls in Ireland. Both bear names already honoured in our community. The former (Sir Henry Howse) is a son of one of the earliest York students, and a son-in-law of the Rev. T. L. Marshall—of INQUIRER fame. The latter, Sir A. M. Porter is a son of the celebrated Rev. John Scott Porter, and a staunch adherent to the Unitarian faith.

THE EDUCATION CRISIS.

ON Wednesday, July 2, the House of Commons in Committee, having agreed on the previous day to remove some of the restrictions imposed by the Bill relating to the financial aid to be given to Education "other than elementary," proceeded to the consideration of the burning question of religious teaching in secondary schools and colleges. A vigorous demand for unsectarian teaching and the opening of existing training colleges to all denominations was made by the Opposition, and received some support from the other side; but Mr. Balfour maintained an inflexible attitude.

Clause IV. provides that:—

> (1) A Council, in the application of money under this part of this Act, shall not require that any particular form of religious instruction or worship shall or shall not be taught or practised in any school or college.
> (2) In a school or college receiving a grant from, or maintained by, a Council under this part of this Act, a scholar attending as a day or evening scholar shall not be required, as a condition of being admitted into or remaining in the school or college, to attend, or abstain from attending, any Sunday-school, place of religious worship, religious observance, or instruction in religious subjects in the school or college or elsewhere.

Over these two sections the debate has since raged. The first section deprives the Council of all discretion in the application of its funds as regards the religious character of a school or college. However objectionable such teaching or practices may be to the ratepayers, or even to the Council itself, or whatever religious tests may be in existence in a school or college, the Council has no power to refuse financial aid.

The second clause, while providing for the religious liberty of day and evening schools and colleges, leaves the exclusively denominational character of residential training colleges for teachers untouched.

In order to meet the objection to the first clause it was proposed to omit it entirely, and thus give the Council a free hand. It was objected to this that if the Council were left to act entirely upon its own discretion it might in some cases act unfairly towards one denomination or another. This fear is, however, very illusory, as the Council would be under the influence of public opinion and the authority of the Education Department, and any sectarian or unfair prejudice would soon be counteracted. It would be better than tying their hands as the clause does. Weighty arguments were brought forward in support of the amendment, but the Government would not allow any check to be placed upon sectarianism, and the amendment was defeated by an overwhelming majority. At a later period of the debate (on Monday) Mr. Balfour offered to accept an amendment limiting the clause to schools and colleges, "aided, but not provided, by the Council, and no pupil shall be excluded from a school or college provided by the Council on the ground of religious belief." This, though apparently intended as a concession, is not one in reality. For it would be an abominable violation of the rights of the ratepayers if the Council were actually allowed to provide sectarian schools. But if other people provide more sectarian schools, thus preventing the Council from founding unsectarian ones, the Council will be compelled to give them assistance.

Training Colleges.—The question of admission to denominational training colleges proved to be of far greater interest even than the preceding one. As we have seen, there is to be a conscience clause for day and evening scholars, and Mr. Channing moved an amendment to section 2 of the fourth clause to the effect that in the case of any school, college, or class for the training of teachers provided or aided out of the rates, no pupil should be excluded on the ground of religious belief. This raised the whole question as regards the denominational training colleges. It was not difficult to show, and Dr. Macnamara showed it most effectively, that the exclusion of Nonconformists from denominational training colleges was a glaring injustice. The provision of opportunities of training for teachers in elementary schools is seriously inadequate, but this does not justify the exclusion of something like one-half of those who are entitled to share it on the grounds of their religious belief. It gives an overwhelming advantage to those students who are members of the Church of England, and a distinct inducement is offered to the children of Nonconformist parents to abandon the faith in which they have been reared, an inducement to which many unfortunately yield. Dr. Macnamara showed that twenty-nine of these Church of England training colleges received Government grants in aid of building, while not more than one-fourth of the cost of carrying them on is received from private sources, the remaining three-fourths coming from Government grants and fees. Yet these institutions are still treated as the exclusive property of one denomination, notwithstanding that they are maintained to so great an extent at the cost of the public. It was therefore urged, rather as a concession than demanded as a right, as it might have been, that Nonconformist students should be admitted to these colleges under a conscience clause. Not only was this concession urged by those who represented the Nonconformist case, but it was supported by several high-minded Churchmen, who recognised the justice of the plea. amongst whom were Sir John Kennaway, Earl Percy, Sir Edward Grey and Mr. Seeley, who held that the throwing open of the colleges would not only be a just concession to Nonconformists, but a real benefit to the Church itself. This view was also advocated by the Spectator, holding that opposition to it would be a great mistake. It was nevertheless hotly opposed by Mr. Balfour and Lord Hugh Cecil, who considered that such a concession would destroy the peculiar character of these colleges, and would change the religious atmosphere by the introduction of a "foreign element." This last phrase was warmly resented by Sir William Harcourt, who was righteously indignant, that in these schools which are paid for by public money, anyone who is not a member of the Church of England should be regarded as a foreigner. But Mr. Balfour was obdurate; he would yield to no argument; he seemed incapable of realising the justice of the claim. Sir Edward Grey had put the case in a sentence. The origin of a college might have been exclusive, so long as it was supported by private funds it had a right to be exclusive, but in proportion, as it accepted and continued to accept public money, it must more and more resign its exclusive ideals. But argument was useless; Mr. Balfour had other remedies to propose, all necessary and useful, "denominational and undenominational training colleges for day students, students at university colleges lodged in hostels, and possibly other machinery yet to be devised for obtaining the same object," but the sectarian colleges are to remain sectarian. Finally, the debate being closured the amendment was defeated by a majority of eighty-four.

With regard to this pressing question of the training of teachers there are two points which must be borne in mind—(1) the crying need of greatly increased provision in some form or other; (2) the right of Nonconformists to participate in the use of existing denominational colleges. To the latter Mr. Balfour would pay no regard, the former he and the Chancellor of the Exchequer would do their best to meet, so there is again a prospect of education benefitting by the exertions of the Opposition, who are wresting from the Government advantages for schools and teachers which were not contemplated in the Bill as introduced; but at the same time sectarian institutions are to be maintained at the public expense. The determination of the Government to gratify their clerical supporters becomes more clear day by day.

ERRATUM.—By a printer's error in our article last week the majority in the "whiskey money" division was stated to have been "two" instead of a hundred.

W. L.

Since the above notes were written more than one momentous step has been taken in the progress of the Bill. On Tuesday Clause 4 was passed, but so amended that the Cowper-Temple Clause is to be applied to all publicly provided secondary education, which will thus be guarded against the teaching of any "catechism or formulary distinctive of any particular denomination." On Wednesday the Government left their optional clause an open question for the House, and it was made away with, by a large majority, and with it, except in London, the School Board system.

UNITARIAN HOME MISSIONARY COLLEGE.

THE public examination was held at the Memorial Hall, Manchester, on Wednesday, July 2. The visitors were the Revs. J. Edwin Odgers, and Philemon Moore. During the day sermons were preached by five of the students, and a number of interesting papers were read bearing upon the work of the Session. In the afternoon the Visitor's Address was given by the Rev. J. E. ODGERS, the Principal, the Rev. Alexander Gordon, in the chair.

THE VISITOR'S ADDRESS.

"Devotional Culture" was the subject of the Address, which dealt first with the public devotions in which the minister leads the worship of a congregation, and then with the private devotion, increasingly felt to be necessary for the culture of the spiritual life. The following is an abstract of the address.

The adoption of a liturgy by Dissenting congregations is, to a certain extent, a confession that free prayer has proved unsatisfactory. Why is this? In some cases it is plain that the minister does not possess what used to be called a gift in prayer. We all know men who, themselves devout, do not impress their emotion upon others; but often a minister does not sufficiently stir up the gift that is in him. Can he make his prayer more truly common prayer without wandering into common-place? Genuine prayer must no doubt be individual. You may enlist the religious sympathy of another, but in proportion as the source of emotion is wholly within you, there is a diminution of what is called liturgical feeling in your free prayer. It may be admitted that the responsibility rests upon the minister and upon his disposition in the hour of worship with heart and soul to pray; his office and the publicity of the occasion cannot absolve him from the necessity of absolute sincerity. Now, many ministers have been induced by this very feeling to urge the adoption of liturgies. They cannot promise to be always in the Spirit on the Lord's Day. They are not always prepared to lead, often sorely need to be led, to the mount of vision. They need escape from their pursuits as others do from theirs, and to the minister it often is a great relief, and not only relief but spiritual good, to be won gradually by the rhythm of familiar words, and by the custom and associations of worship into the spirit of quiet and of prayer, which he could not bring with him. And what is helpful to him in this respect is largely helpful to others.

Of all complaints made concerning prayers, the most frequent is that the minister's prayers are too personal. Against this it may be urged that those who are unaccustomed to speak concerning things of personal conviction do not know how hard it is to express them truthfully in any very general terms. The personal character of our free prayer is to some extent a reaction against the Puritan conception and practice. Prayers conducted on definite plans, including sometimes recapitulations of the heads of the discourse, and running often to an hour in length, are, of course, entirely inconsistent with our lyrical conception of prayer. They were intended to operate on the hearers for their good. The conception of such prayers was the subject of teaching in the Dissenting Academies. A noteworthy manual is that of Matthew Henry; the most recent and complete the Directory recently issued by the Free Church of Scotland.

Probably devotional culture reached its lowest ebb in the latter years of the eighteenth century among the English Presbyterians. Between the technical scheme of Divine revelation and the hard philosophy of enlightened self-interest, devotion found an uncertain foothold, and the following of Lindsey in the adoption of the Book of Common Prayer reformed was, perhaps, the best thing that could have been done at the time. But this is, perhaps, rather a safe minimum, than an ideal in anybody's mind, of common worship. The minister desires to make his public prayer a real act of sincere worship, such as shall awaken and enlist the praying spirit in those around him. If he lives and has his being in the very spirit of prayer and godly aspiration, the unveiling to others of the natural current of his soul's life, while he throws around them the arm of his strength and the mantle of his sympathy, is in itself a better thing than aught he can devise by rule and method. But we are most of us as dependent as other people on times and seasons, on the helps of association and the power of words and things to waken memory and quicken aspiration. These you cannot count upon, and often the preparation of the heart must be made beforehand. In this, no doubt, a man's own experience of life furnishes the most important factor. The love of Nature and the love of Art seem to be fitting counter-agents to the tendency to dwell too exclusively on the religious facts of consciousness; poetry, too, in so far as it fulfils that definition which declares its object to be the unchanging part of man's nature and the unchanging realities of his experience.

The writing of prayers I would only commend to those who will engage to often write and seldom or never read. But in any case, make your own Prayer-book. Put into it the prayers, the sentences, the verses, which are connected with your own religious history, things that have come to you from books and services and scenes of Nature. This will stand you in good stead, when, as sometimes happens, some miserable contretemps makes you wish that you were anywhere but in the pulpit just at the moment when you are called upon to pray in the congregation.

The Address concluded with some advice concerning devotional literature, referring specially to the prayers of George Dawson as doing the utmost that could be done in this day in the way of reference to current events and to the subject of the day's discourse.

At the conclusion of the Address Principal GORDON announced that Mr. MacLachlin and Mr. Thackray had graduated B.A. at Victoria University, the former also taking the Shuttleworth Exhibition of £12; while Mr. Holt had passed his preliminary examination. The Sharp Prize for Biblical Study was taken again this year by Mr. Eustace Thompson, and also the Bibby Prize for Greek. An additional prize of books was given by the Principal to Mr. Jenkins, who had proved himself an excellent second in the same subjects. Certificates were presented to the outgoing students, Messrs. Thompson, Short, Phelps, and Jenkins, three of whom have already accepted appointments in the ministry, Mr. H. T. Short at Aberdare, Mr. G. L. Phelps at Devonport, and Mr. E. O. Jenkins at Llwynrhydowen.

THE VALEDICTORY SERVICE.

In the evening a Valedictory Service was conducted in Cross-street Chapel by the Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE, of Leeds. In the course of his address he said that ministers gave their very selves; that they received a decent living, had the disposal of their own time and labour, and took for granted a hearing not because they were learned or eloquent, but because they were ministers. That was an honour done to no other profession. Who could dare to think himself worthy of such deference? This same public which supports them, however, is agreed upon holding and expressing but a mean opinion of them in other respects. It thinks ministers ought to be something superior to other men. They are at once thought more and less of than laymen. "He talks just like a parson," is generally the opposite of a compliment. Is it not frequently hinted that ministers like cobblers should stick to their last and leave politics to the laity? The minister has no right to introduce party politics into the pulpit; but in season and out of season to emphasise the great principles of justice and mercy. Ministers were apparently too good for common life, and at the same time not so good as they ought to be. They have all the usual faults of their fellows; even the grossest crimes are sometimes proved against certain of them; they are no more saints than angels, and yet throughout them there is a certain leaven of unworldliness which works religiously upon the mass of the people. They proclaim that God is King; they are witnesses of God and His law; ambassadors in the name of Christ. They uphold the perfect life to men, though they may not fully attain to their own ideals. They are bound by their profession to intrude upon every debate the persistent consideration of divine law, and to denounce every proposal not in harmony with that law. They are not infallible either as observers or interpreters; and if there is a certain depreciation of the parson's office beyond that justified by their imperfection and inconsistency, it is nothing of which they should be ashamed; it is a reproach that religion shares with them. From one motive or another it is rare outside a religious assembly to hear God appealed to. Men do not seem to like to confess God. Can ministers complain if at times they are despised for putting their faith in the things which are not seen? They stand not to be judged of men, but to be approved of God. The calling to which they dedicated themselves was the highest on earth. It was theirs to uphold the eternal law, and promise salvation to those who through good and evil heed it and walk thereby.

CARMARTHEN COLLEGE.

ADDRESS BY THE REV. DR. G. DAWES HICKS AT THE ANNUAL DISTRIBUTION OF PRIZES.

DR. HICKS, speaking as Chairman, and on behalf of the deputation from the Presbyterian Board, having referred with satisfaction to the annual examinations, conveyed to the Principal and his colleagues an assurance of the Board's unabated confidence, and proceeded as follows:—

An Extended Curriculum.

This year the Presbyterian Board has more cause than usual to be grateful to the Professorial staff. The Board has been engaged, as you are aware, in framing and in arranging for the introduction of a series of changes in the curriculum of the College, larger and more far-reaching probably than any in its history, and in this undertaking the help and advice of the Professors have been invaluable. We in London have entertained from the first a genuine interest in the development of the Welsh University, and it has been with unqualified satisfaction that we have seen the young university taking the lead in a movement which has the support and good wishes of liberal theologians everywhere. It has established a post-graduate degree in theology, based upon the soundest principles of theological education, and absolutely free from tests and restrictions of a doctrinal character. Having taken this step, the University insists, quite naturally and quite properly, that the theological colleges affiliated with it shall both provide the teaching required for the new degree, and actually send up students qualified to sit for its theological examinations.

Now the members of the Presbyterian Board not only feel that it would be a sad calamity for the institution in which they are interested to be struck off the University calendar; what they feel still more is that there is now greater cause than ever for their giving such assistance as they can to the efforts of the University authorities to raise the status and culture of the Christian ministry in Wales. I venture to hope that when the history of this movement comes to be written it may be counted to our little college for righteousness, that immediately and spontaneously, and without the application of any external pressure, it rose of itself to the necessities of the situation, and determined at once to adapt itself to the higher demand that was being made upon it. That is no inconsiderable thing when it is remembered that we are not a wealthy body, and have not the resources of several other Colleges, which have not yet done what we now propose to do!

The New Scholarships.

Next October we shall commence the new session with a staff of four Professors, and to-day we give a hearty welcome to the Rev. Kerri Evans, who will henceforth be associated with us, and help to prepare the men who will be candidates for academical honours at their national seat of learning. There will be senior classes for those who are studying for the B.D. degree, to whom every facility will be afforded in the subjects upon which they are engaged. Not only so, recognising as we do, that the men who give themselves up to the service of the Church are not usually men of wealth, that they can offer their brains and not their money, we have resolved to found a number of scholarships of £40 a year each, which will enable a man to live in Carmarthen for the time required, fairly comfortably and freed from that pecuniary anxiety which so interferes with study. It seems to me that we are thus holding out a splendid opportunity for industrious and conscientious students to distinguish themselves and to serve their church in a way hitherto impossible, and we are looking forward with much anticipation to the future development of our little College, with its enlarged scope of work and extended field of studies. To-day I would appeal to its old alumni and supporters to rally round it as it embarks upon its new enterprise, and to do their best to send us the men who can avail themselves of the advantages we are now in a position to offer.

A Learned Ministry.

It may, perhaps, be questioned whether this advanced course of instruction is necessary for those who are to be engaged in humble spheres of Christian labour, and to spend themselves and be spent in the endeavour to make the truths of religion somewhat more real and actual in the little communities where their lot will be cast. And I readily confess that as the matter is ordinarily conceived there may be some appearance of force in such an objection. For there are strange notions concerning the ministry current in many quarters, which, if they in any degree correspond to the truth of things, will render it an enigma and a problem to our descendants, that any self-respecting men could have devoted themselves to such a profession at all. Amongst many people, the definition once given by Joseph de Maistre of one engaged in this calling, that he was "a gentleman in black talking pulpit platitudes," represents in a literal way the object of their abomination. And even by those among whom a minister is still regarded as an essential part of the social machinery, the prevalent idea seems to be that his existence is necessary for the sake of keeping up, for example, the institution of tea-parties, or for carrying on a fussy meddlesome sort of visitation from door to door, so that the difference between a Roman Catholic priest and an Evangelical pastor often amounts very much to this, that whilst to the former a parishioner confesses his own sins, to the latter he confesses the sins of everybody else in the vicinity excluding himself! But, need I say, this is not the conception of the ministry which those who are really alive to its duties and responsibilities entertain for a single instant? Need I say that if that were all, it would be a miserably poor and inadequate object upon which to spend the capacities and the energies of a life?

The Pride of Ignorance.

There may, indeed, have been times when the simple, pious reverential spirit was alone sufficient, without much culture of the intellect, to awaken in others a consciousness of the Unseen, but in our age there can be no question that the prophet of power must be the painstaking student too. If we indulge in mental unfaithfulness and intellectual indolence; if we cease to have understanding for the highest problems that agitate men's minds, if we leave all the rich results of science, art, and philosophy outside our circle of interest, and attempt to speak to our fellows from a lower level, why, then, there can be but one inevitable issue. Sooner or later, true religious emotion, severed from that which gives it authority and meaning, will cease to co-exist with stagnant intelligence, and will degenerate into a mere blind passion, from which thoughtful, earnest minds will shrink. Men have sometimes complained in sarcastic terms of what they call the pride of intellect—what you and I have to be on our guard against is the pride of ignorance. Nothing can be more injurious to religion than the ridiculous air of complacent assurance sometimes assumed by men whose knowledge is in inverse proportion to their confidence.

Stores of Knowledge to be Reckoned with.

Consider for a moment the enormous strides that are being made in every department of human research, and you will realise the absolute futility of the attitude I have depicted. Just now an easy way of representing to ourselves what is going on around us in this respect is furnished by an example like the following:—The ninth edition of the "Encyclopædia Britannica," that exhaustive repository of the contents of human knowledge, was begun in 1875, and finished in 1889. It consisted of twenty-four enormous volumes. In this year of grace, 1902, the proprietors are under the necessity of bringing out a supplement, which is to consist of eleven extra volumes of the same size. That is to say, within the space of twenty years it is needful to increase the bulk of the Encyclopædia by nearly one-half. If this rate of progression be continued, I shudder to think of what a student in this college a hundred years hence may have to go through. But what is very certain is that he must be a shortsighted theologian indeed who can imagine for a moment that all this mental activity is no concern of his. And there is another aspect of the matter, which ought to preserve us from so fatal an error.

The Spiritual Basis of Knowledge.

It is beginning to be seen that the result of all this intellectual industry, so far from leading perpendicularly downwards into the abysses of Atheism, as was once supposed, has been, on the contrary, infinitely to extend and ennoble the outlook presented to the religious mind. Scientific thought is no longer committed to the agnosticism of forty years ago, but is finding itself led continually to the threshold of a spiritual realm. Its devotees are reaching forward towards a rational theism that shall not violate the known facts obtained through their methods of investigation. Social reformers, who once repudiated the Christian conceptions and religious trusts, are now pointing to the life of Christ as the model of that form of living which man in a regenerate society would realise. Philosophic thinkers are abandoning the standpoints of Materialism and Sensationalism, and are insisting that no speculative efforts can be satisfactory which do not terminate with the Absolute and the Eternal. "The great feature of the progress of the last fifty years," said Mr. Addington Symonds, "has been to establish the spiritual view of man and the universe." The demand, then, made upon theology from all sides is large and weighty enough. It is no less than this: to unfold and develop the conception of Spirit, to make its real nature and structure manifest, to show how it contains within itself the promise and the potency of every form and quality of being, to explain how its ideals arise and how it inevitably works for ends that shall transform the rough materials of sense and appetite into elements of a whole, pregnant with purpose, and animated by a soul of ultimate truth and beauty. Humble no doubt should we feel in the presence of a task such as this; but unworthy of it are we unless we are inspired by its grandeur to exert ourselves and our capacities to the utmost.

The Vocation of the Minister.

There is a splendid passage in one of Fichte's writings describing the vocation of the scholar, and with very little alteration it may set before us the ideal of the Christian ministry. The scholar's aim is not to acquire a respectable competency, nor the admiration of his fellow-men. It is not even primarily to be useful to them, nor to promote their earthly welfare. Rather is it to gain the consciousness that his true being must have an enduring place in the divine economy of things, to realise that all which comes before it belongs to the material in which the infinite life reveals itself and assumes definite form, so that knowledge, not only in her highest branches, but down even to the meanest elements, originates in and is determined by the very thought of God Himself, and our poor life, dedicated to her, however insignificant it may otherwise seem, is still a God-like life, in touch with and moulded by influences that are eternal. Let that be the ideal we set before ourselves as we go forth to keep watch over the intellectual conditions and the practical expressions of religious truth, and to assist the mentally blind and halt and lame to a surer reliance upon the spiritual Life that surrounds and sustains us all. It is a tremendous office to assume, and only he can fulfil it worthily who reverences it as a sacred trust and is prepared to cultivate every faculty whose exercise it demands. Above all is it essential to keep in close communion with those high souls of our race who, down the ages, have stood, in reason, in sanctity, in love, nearer than we to God, to rise habitually into the atmosphere of their thought, and to prepare ourselves and our people for that migration to another world, when the veil shall be withdrawn which separates them from time and us from eternity. With such a mission we shall, indeed, never regret the day when we took upon us the yoke of Christ's service, and resolved in our humble measure to be the interpreters of God's revelations to men.

ERRATA.—In the verses "A Dream," on p. 423 of last week's INQUIRER, read in line 29,

Away and up a lovely hill,

and at the end,

Whether this city life is but a dream,
And that sweet dream was true.

We must also apologise to Mr. Hugenholtz for the absurd misspelling of his name. Certainly the Editor was nodding when that slipped through! In Professor Montet's letter, we fear that some accents and genders also went astray, which we trust may be forgiven us.

THE ROBINSON MEMORIAL CHURCH AT GAINSBOROUGH.

SIR,—Your issue of June 14th came into my hands at Oxford; and I at once determined to write and thank you for your note on the "John Robinson Memorial Church," so carefully written and so considerate toward those who have interested themselves in its erection. Being at a distance from my books and papers, and also very busy in Mansfield College work, I could not write last week; do not attribute my delay to carelessness.

You are quite right in saying that our association of Robinson's name with the modern Congregational Church at Gainsborough was "simply a matter of sentiment." In 1892, the Congregational Union determined on celebrating the tercentenary of the martyrdom of the early Separatists, Barrowe, Greenwood, and Penry, in 1593. The Church at Gainsborough needed a new and larger building, and the Rev. Hugh L. Griffiths availed himself of the interest excited in our history to propose that a permanent memorial of these eventful years should be erected in Gainsborough, the principal market town of the district where the second great Separatist movement originated, and that it should bear the name of the most distinguished man in the first days of English Congregationalism. To celebrate the tercentenary of the North of England movement in 1602, was not then in our minds; but when, in 1901, we found ourselves able by a combined effort to free the new church building from debt in the following year, we determined on a special thanksgiving service, at once for the completion of our labours, and yet more for the fidelity of the confessors and sufferers of 300 years ago.

I am not aware that any one in England has spoken of "the tercentenary of [what is called] the Robinson Memorial Church at Gainsborough." In our first circulars we did speak of the old Gainsborough Church as constituted in 1602; into this error, as your note states, I fell in "the Story of the English Separatists," following the history as it had been previously written. That error was not repeated in the celebration of June 11th. But this acknowledgment of mistake must not be understood as casting any doubt on the continuity of the events of 1602 and 1606, and the place of John Robinson in the continuous story.

The ultimate authority of all narratives of the churches in Gainsborough and Scrooby is Bradford's "History of Plymouth Plantation." Speaking of the corruption and despotism of the National Church under Elizabeth, he says:—

> So many therefore of these proffessors as saw ye evil of these things, in these parts, and whose hearts ye Lord had touched with heavenly zeale for his trueth, they shooke of this youke of anti-Christian bondage, and as ye Lord's free people joyned them selves (by a covenant of the Lord) into a church estate, in ye felowship of ye Gospell, to walke in all his wayes, made known, or to be made known unto them, according to their best endeavours, whatsoever it should cost them, the Lord assisting them. And that it cost them something this ensewing historie will declare.

The date of this is given, on the authority of Secretary Morton, Bradford's nephew, as 1602.

These people became, Bradford proceeds, 2 distincte bodys or churches, and in regarde of distance of place did congregate severally; for they were of sundrie townes and vilages, some in Notingamshire, some of Lincollnshire, and some of Yorkshire, wher they border nearest togeather.

These two "distinct churches" are identified, the one with Gainsborough, by the mention of Mr. John Smith, who "afterwards was chosen their pastor"; the other with Scrooby by the mention of "Mr. Richard Clifton, a grave and reverend preacher," and of "Mr. John Robinson, who afterwards was their pastor." Morton's date for this division into two churches is 1606.

Whether Bradford meant anything special in calling the first association a "church estate," and the second association two "churches," we can only "conjecture." I incline to think he did. The first association was of necessity very incompletely organised. The two churches had officers, and a closer "continuing together," with meetings every Sabbath. Bradford was writing, remembering the Leyden life, remembering how much the pastorate of John Robinson had developed church life, remembering, too, how Robinson forbade Elder Brewster, in Plymouth, to administer the sacraments. A contrast between the inchoate condition of the "church estate" and the fuller church life which was begun in Scrooby and Gainsborough may have been in his mind. But the three characteristics of the Pilgrim doctrine of a church are in the 1602 association, voluntary fellowship, the church covenant, and the inclusion of the obligation to walk in all the Lord's ways "to be made known" as well as actually "made known." Where these three factors are found, Robinson would have affirmed the existence of a true church, however incomplete its organisation. Bradford, moreover, is speaking of the first association, the "church estate," when he says "and that it cost them something this ensuing history will declare."

Not John Smith, nor Richard Clifton, nor John Robinson was pastor of that early fellowship, nor do we know that it was formed in Gainsborough. But we learn from Bradford that Scrooby and Gainsborough were included in it; and that John Robinson became pastor of one of the churches into which it divided.

A UNITED OPEN-AIR INTERCESSIONAL SERVICE.

A UNITED service in which really differing denominations take part is as yet a rare thing. I say really differing because the difference between many denominations is more apparent than real, or it is of such a character as to present no obstacle to united worship. Methodists, Congregationalists and Baptists could, and occasionally do, unite thus, but add the Established Church and the Unitarian, and you have something remarkable; and something, I am inclined to think, with very few precedents, if any

This is why I believe such a service is worth recalling. The first notice of it came to me on St. George's Day. On a brilliantly sunny day we had been looking at some troops who were doing honour to England's patron saint by being reviewed by one of England's famous generals, when the vicar said he thought such a united service might be held. I hoped so too, but with more scepticism than faith. Time passed, and I received an invitation to a meeting of the clergy to consider ways and means—a meeting which, owing to an engagement in town, I was unable to attend. However the Primitive Methodist minister, who had been appointed secretary, called to acquaint me with the result, which was that the service would be divided into six parts, three to be taken by clergymen of the Church of England, and three by Nonconformists. For the latter portion, he informed me, the Baptist minister had been chosen to give an address, the Captain of the Salvation Army to give out a hymn, and I to read a portion of Scripture. A large choir selected from the different denominations was organised, and a dais erected in the market place for those who were to take part. But then came the sad tidings which altered everything. The service was altered, not abandoned. From a glad Coronation thanksgiving service it was tranformed into a service of earnest intercession. It began with an address from the Mayor of Newport. Then the strains of Cowper's grand hymn, "God moves in a mysterious way," rang out over the crowded market place. The vicar of St. John's read some prayers from the Order for the Visitation of the Sick, after which I read the 90th Psalm, the Bible-Christian minister the 91st and the vicar of Newport gave an address. Then Watts' setting of the 90th Psalm, "O God, our help in ages past," given out by the Captain of the Salvation Army, was sung, the Baptist minister delivered an address, the National Anthem was sung and the vicar of St. Paul's pronounced the Benediction. So ended a service unique in my own experience, and I am inclined to think a record in united services. If I am mistaken I trust some of your correspondents will correct me. It would be interesting to know whether there is another instance on record of the Church of England, the Methodist, the Congregational, the Baptist, the Unitarian bodies and the Salvation Army ever having been united thus by all actively taking part in a religious service. CLEMENT E. PIKE.

A CAPE TOWN PREACHER ON THE PEACE.

PREACHING on Sunday, June 8, in the Cape Town Free Protestant (Unitarian) Church the Rev. R. Balmforth referred in the following terms to the declaration of peace:—

During the past week the welcome news has been proclaimed that peace has once more returned to South Africa Whatever view we may take of the war we may all be thankful that its tale of bloodshed and ruin, of broken hearts and desolated homes, is at last over, and that the saner weapons of reason have taken the place of the rifle and the sword. Assuming a wise peace policy, the conclusion of hostilities has brought one step nearer what I believe would ultimately have been brought about by a natural, and peaceful if slower, development, namely, the unity of South Africa. Unfortunately, these hasty and forced developments have to be paid for in other ways. They necessarily engender feelings and forces of which the silent growth and far-off result cannot be foreseen, and South Africa will be a source of anxiety both to South African and to English statesmen for many years to come. It is an obvious truth that the conquests of the sword are never so secure, and seldom so enduring, as the conquests of mind and heart, and if, during the coming years, by magnanimity, by conciliation, by a recognition of each other's rights, by putting ourselves in each other's places, we do not try to promote this conquest of mind and heart, our material conquest will assuredly pass into deserved and irretrievable ruin. It will be the duty of all who have the interests of humanity at heart to promote this higher conquest by a fusion of interests and races, so that this sad and lamentable conflict—to which all who consciously strove to bring it about may well look back with sorrow and humiliation—may never be repeated.

To the memory of those who have fallen in the war, friend or foe, let us bow in respect and reverence. They, at least, are purified by sacrifice. They are nearer to each other in death than in life, and perhaps they were nearer to each other in life than either were aware of. That is the tragedy and the hideous imbecility of war—that men, unknown to each other, who might have been comrades in a labour of love, slay each other at the bidding of others, in the darkness of ignorance and the blindness of misdirected passion. May the Spirit of Peace ever dwell in our hearts!

OBITUARY.

THE REV. THOMAS CARTER.

A VETERAN for some years retired from active service passed to his final rest by the peaceful death on July 4 of the Rev. Thomas Carter, of Rochdale. For more than twenty years he had been minister of the Blackwater-street congregation, and since his retirement in 1890 had continued to reside in Rochdale, where he was held in high esteem. Mr. Carter, who was in his seventy-sixth year, was a native of Cheltenham, where his family lived in prosperous circumstances, and he was educated there and at Gloucester. In early life he took to the sea, and had some trying experiences, which led him to abandon that career, but doubtless were of good service in the formation of his character. His parents were Church and Tory, but as a lad he had been impressed by some lectures of Mr. G. J. Holyoake's at Cheltenham, and when he returned home on abandoning the sea, he came also under the influence of the Rev. Henry Solly, and was led to devote himself to the ministry. He studied at Carmarthen and at Manchester New College in the first years of its settlement in London, and in 1856 became minister at Lewes. In 1867, the year of his removal to Rochdale, he married the younger daughter of Mr. John Every, a leading member of the Lewes congregation. Both there and at Rochdale Mr. Carter's ministry was marked by independence and vigour. He was keenly interested in the controversies of the day, and attracted much attention by his strenuous opposition to secularist thought, while he gained many friends among his opponents. He was a man of broad sympathies, sincerely and actively interested in social reform. A Radical in politics, among living politicians his chief admiration was given to Mr. John Morley. A faithful pastor, the Blackwater-street congregation prospered under his care, and in 1885 the church was enlarged by the erection of a new aisle, and opened in the following January free from debt. Lectures, followed by open conferences, musical services, and summer services in the open air were among the new departures to which he led his congregation. In 1884 Mr. Carter preached the annual sermon of the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire; as a life member of University Hall he was a trustee of Manchester College.

The funeral was at the Manchester crematorium.

THE REV. EDGAR SOLLY ANTHONY.

THE news of the sudden death, on July 4, of the Rev. E. S. Anthony, of Poole, will come as a shock to many friends. On Thursday week Mr. Anthony was apparently in his accustomed health, but on the evening of that day, while attending the choir-practice at his church, became suddenly ill, through the bursting of a blood vessel on the brain, and expired on the following morning, without regaining consciousness. A memorial notice of Mr. Anthony we shall publish next week. The funeral on Monday, conducted by the Revs. Alfred Hood and C. C. Coe, was attended by a large and representative gathering, including the Mayor and the vicars of Poole and Parkstone, and several Nonconformist ministers of the Free Church Council.

MR. JAMES ORMROD.

MR. JAMES ORMROD, who passed away on Friday, June 27th, at his residence, Burlington-road, South Shore, Blackpool, in his 71st year, had long been associated with Unitarian work and was greatly respected by a wide circle of friends. As a young man he was a teacher in the Lower Mosley-street Schools, Manchester, with Mr. Curtis and Mr. George Smith. Later he was schoolmaster at Stand Grammar School, under the Revs. John Cropper and W. C. Squier; and for a short time with the present minister, the Rev. R. T. Herford. He was also for some years superintendent of the Sunday School at Stand. The young people who came under his influence were much attached to him, and some of his pupils have since become well-known public men. His cheery disposition, uniform kindliness and good nature, joined with great earnestness of purpose and magnetic force of character, gave him an unusual power of influence over young people. Those who came into contact with him testify, even to-day, their indebtedness to the good influence he exerted. His sympathy, his genuineness and sincerity, were felt strongly wherever he went. It was a delight for boys to go for a ramble with him, he was so thoroughly their companion, interesting them in all sorts of things, drawing them into talk, and freely sharing their fun. After many years' service at Stand he retired to live at Urmston, near Manchester, and about sixteen years ago to Blackpool, where he assisted for a time in the work of the South Shore Church. But a few years ago he became quite disabled through paralysis, and his death was the end of a long and wearisome illness, bravely and patiently borne. Very few men can be said to have spent a more useful and helpful life than his. The funeral was on Monday, June 30, at Brooklands Cemetery, Manchester, the Rev. H. Bodell Smith being the officiating minister, assisted by the Rev. R. T. Herford, of Stand. H. B. S.

IN SUMMER.

I KNOW not what it is, but when I pass
Some running bit of water by the way,
A river brimming silver in the grass,
And rippled by a trailing alder-spray,

Hold in my heart I cannot from a cry,
It is so joyful at the merry sight;
So gracious is the water running by,
So full the simple grass is of delight.

And if by chance a redwing, passing near,
Should light beside me in the alder-tree;
And if above the ripple I should hear
The lusty conversation of the bee—

I think that I should lift my voice and sing;
I know that I should laugh and look around,
As if to catch the meadows answering,
As if expecting whispers from the ground.

DEVOTIONAL READING.*

Selected from the "Psalms and Litanies" of Rowland Williams.

DENY me not, O Lord, before I die, the knowledge of thy truth; to my soul's health, and to the deliverance of men into a holy freedom.

Into thy hands I commend my soul and my prayer: give what Thou seest fit, and fit us for what Thou givest.

Give us wisdom to abound, or patience to suffer need; and where the Master placed us, there to be content.

Let us not be over-anxious for to-morrow, to whom strength is hardly for the care of to-day.

Yet if Thou wilt, O Lord, grant us a happy life, in things holy, reverend and pure; in things honest, seemly and fair; in health and cheerfulness, and good name; in safety, friendship and peace.

Let all our work be done well before we come to die; and let us be gathered into Thine arms, as the harvester gathers a shock in full season.

Let our death be happy; and our happiness beyond the power of death.

When we call Thee Father, give us the mind of children.

Let Thy Spirit take all our inarticulate groanings, and translate them into everlasting prayer.

As our fathers who trusted in Thee were holpen and not confounded, so in the need of the times that are, and shall be, be Thou our hope, and that of all generations.

Lighten with freedom the dark places of the nations, and give peace and godliness to the world.

As the round earth is balanced by the counsel of Thy wisdom, so in Thy truth let our minds be established.

Fulfil all our prayers, as Thou seest best, O Lord; and inspire us with thoughts which Thou wilt bring to good effect.

O everlasting Teacher of mankind, from Thee come the workers of good for ever.

Thine are the revivers of godliness in the world, and the sowers of winged seeds of truth.

Thine, O Lord, is the great company of our ancestors, the sacred truth-tellers, and glorious patriots.

All makers of story and song, and the masters of harmony are Thine, and the pure sufferers for godliness.

Whoever have vanquished evil, and in faith and hope gone through labour for right.

Thou Lover of the holy and upright in the east and the west, let us love Thee with unity of mind.

For the Lord God Omnipotent reigneth now as of old: let us rejoice because He dwells among men.

Lord, perfect Thy work in us, and for us: and let us live as children of the Eternal.

THE boaster sees nothing but himself, having a veil of conceit before his eyes. If he was endowed with an eye capable of discerning God he would not discover any person weaker than himself.—Saadi.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

Eyes and Bright Eyes.

THERE are troubles of the eyes where all that is wanted is to get them properly opened. Not only have the lids to be lifted, but what is actually before the eyes has to be noticed and really beheld. Dull eyes fail to catch the look of things. Bright ones soon perceive it. This, however, they cannot do without some training or practice. I recollect taking a young lad into a field to get mushrooms. His sight was better than mine, his eyes nearer the ground. Yet it was I who saw the whitish gleam amongst the grass, and only when I was stooping could his eyes pick out what led me forward. It may have been he did not know what to look for. It may have been he thought he should see the mushrooms on their side above the grass. But it was plain he had his lesson to learn. His eyes were not watching for the proper appearance. They saw much less than mine could.

Training of the eyes in a town or city takes place by means of the shop windows, the houses, the dresses of the people, &c. In the country and at the seaside we can see very much further than in a street, and, of course, very much more of the sky with its clouds and its glorious blue.

Look at the passage in Luke xi. 54-56, where Jesus finds it strange that people who were to worship God could not be reminded of Him, if they saw nothing unusual and quite out of ordinary course. You find the expression "face of the sky and of the earth." The face of the sky may be like the human face lit with a smile or dark with a frown, clear in complexion or coloured with dingy hue, blushing with the glow of sunset or white with wintry look. It may seem near or far off. It may be beautiful, and leading the eye further and further on in pleasure of watching its charm, or it may threaten to blow the rain storm down on you and make you fear to be out under it.

Thus the face of the earth has to take its gladness or its gloom from the open heaven above it. At times in weather subject to quick rainfall, ground that is miles away seems near at hand. Again so hazy may be the air that even a mountain or a great headland is only a blurred patch, of which you could say little more than that something darkish loomed there. Farmers and shepherds and sailors learn to see these different signs, and become weatherwise. They can read the sense of this "face of the sky and of the earth." There is, as it were, a language foreign to others, familiar to them written there. They have learnt to read and understand it.

What Jesus meant when he blamed the Pharisees is that those who should be on the watch are half asleep or more than that. That is where bright eyes come in, with glances that go to and fro and fasten on what signifies, they are spelling out the alphabet written on the ground by the hand of Nature. And nature is not without God.

He makes everything beautiful in its season, and so if we have eyes and hearts for His goodness, though we may, for the while, be blind, we shall learn to see more and more of what is good and beautiful in the world, and shall understand how much reason we have for gladness and thankfulness. LONDON, JULY 12, 1902.

THE OXFORD SUMMER SCHOOL FOR TEACHERS.

ANOTHER brief but most successful and delightful summer session for Sunday-school Teachers has been held at Oxford during the past ten days. Glorious summer weather welcomed the teachers to Oxford and the hospitable doors of Manchester College opened for them the happiest meeting-place. This is the third session which has been held under the same conditions, the first in 1899 and the second two years ago; and although the numbers attending were not quite so large as on the previous occasions, they were amply sufficient to make a good meeting, and indeed with many more the pressure of accommodation would become somewhat difficult. Teachers were present from Glasgow in the north, from Lancashire and Yorkshire, from Ireland and Wales and the Midlands, and from London and the south. The numbers at the common mid-day meal in college are a fair test of the attendance, and they varied from seventy-two on Friday week, the opening day, to a hundred in the middle of the week, if not more. Once more it was proved how invaluable these gatherings are, not only in the stimulus of the actual lectures but in the meeting of friends from different parts of the country and the forming of new friendships, and the opportunities of taking counsel together about the common work.

The plan of the session was that which has already been proved so admirable, a first morning hour being devoted to an academical lecture, and a second after an interval, to a lecture of a more practical kind dealing with some aspect of Sunday-school work and inviting discussion, while the afternoons were given over to recreation, to boating, and other excursions, visits to colleges or to the houses of hospitable Oxford friends. Then in the evening some further provision was made for conferences or for instruction or social entertainment. On the first evening a reception was held by the PRINCIPAL and Mrs. DRUMMOND, while Monday evening was devoted to a reading in character from the Book of Job, introduced by Miss MARIAN PRITCHARD, and in a version specially prepared by her, and on Tuesday evening an address was given by the Rev. THOMAS VAN NESS, of the Second Church of Boston, Mass., giving a most vivid account of his varied experience in the ministry, and of his travels in Hungary and Russia, where he sought out the Molokani in the country beyond the Caucasus, and also paid a visit to Tolstoy.

The academic lectures proper were five in number—the first two by the Rev. J. EDWIN ODGERS on "Church and Ministry in early Christian times," dealing first with the evidence of the New Testament, and in the second lecture taking up the very interesting testimony of the "Teaching of the Twelve Apostles"; two by Principal DRUMMOND on "The Transmission of the Text of the New Testament," at which a number of valuable books from the college library were shown, including MILL's folio edition of the Greek Testament of 1707, and the fac-simile of the splendid "Codex Sinaiticus," presented to the library by the Emperor of RUSSIA; and one lecture by the Rev. W. E. ADDIS on "The Hebrew Prophets." Of the other lectures we hope to furnish some notes or to publish in subsequent numbers parts or the whole of some of them in full.

The impression left by the session as a whole is that which we expect from any such gathering of Sunday-school teachers, an impression of cheerfulness and happy fellowship, of earnest purpose, and unselfish devotion. These are not people to be betrayed into pessimism. Their great work, as was said by the Rev. JAMES HARWOOD, the President of the Sunday School Association, in his address at the opening service, is the training of the character of the young, and in this the chief emphasis must be laid on the power of personal influence and affection; and thus, while the difficulties of their task and frequent discouragements keep them, it may be, from any light-hearted optimism, they may always rightly claim the honourable title of Meliorists, as those who have unconquerable faith in progress and the ultimate triumph of goodness, and are actively engaged in the work by which it must be secured. This was a dominant note also in Mr. ION PRITCHARD's paper on "The Sunday School—Failure or Success?" in which the suggestion of failure was mentioned only to be instantly dismissed.

Dr. DRUMMOND, at the Sunday morning service, preached a very helpful sermon, based on the parable of Mark iv. 26-29, of the seed, which springs up, and grows, we know not how: first the blade, then the ear, and then the full corn in the ear. So, he said, must it be with the seeds of truth planted by the teacher; truth is a living principle to be planted in the soul, that it may gather to itself living elements of thought and feeling, and send out branches which in their turn may be productive of new, and it may be richer seed. Truth develops by a law of its own, and though it may be modified and suffer deterioration through circumstance, it keeps its essence and endeavours by divine energy to resume its own form and cast off any corruption that may have adhered to it. So has it been with the truths of CHRIST, covered by noxious growths, while still they have struck their roots irremovably into the mind of man, and the living force with which they fell from the lips of JESUS remains fresh and vigorous as ever. We must not, therefore, be discouraged, if only we can bear faithful witness to the truth and drop into the children's hearts some word of sound and seasonable wisdom. Then we can take unanxious sleep, and go about our avocations, trusting the seed to the divine power to bring it to maturity.

Such encouragement is specially needed by the teacher whose opportunities are so few when compared with the persistence of less wholesome influences. He must remember in intellectual as well as in moral and religious education to implant seminal principles, to be the germs of a manifold development, with broad and comprehensive bearing, that may become fruitful under varied circumstances. Mind and character are not to be built up like a house, but must grow like a plant, by an inward law appropriating what is needed for its nutrition, and there must be no anxiety for a too rapid growth. Gradual progress is the true law in spiritual as in natural growth. There is need of the firm stem of moral principle and self-denial, that will not bend before the storm, a covering of modesty and reverence to shelter the yet tender fruit, and only with the first autumn gathering over life, can one expect the perfect fruit of piety and wisdom.

Now and then an infant SAMUEL may glow with the prophet's ideal vision or hear strange voices in the night, but we must not frame a rule from the exception, but be content to observe real growth and mark the virtues proper to each season of life, sowing the seed, watchful against every blight, and trusting that the FATHER will work by His own methods, and mature the character as seems to Him best.

GOSSIP is the occupation of idle minds; scandal is the occupation of ungenerous ones. Spread the reports of goodness in the world, and if we have no such reports, let us in Heaven's name keep still. We shall at least do one good thing by doing this.—Wm. Salter.

SOCIAL AND MORAL REFORM.

EFFORTS for social and moral reform may be roughly divided into two classes—namely, those as to which there is such a general agreement that there is little likelihood of their becoming the occasions of controversy, and those in regard to which opinion is still so far divided that controversy, often of an acute character, is inevitable. With regard to the first class of questions, there will be general agreement that the attitude of such a paper as the INQUIRER should be sympathetic. It must recognise such efforts as part of the general religious effort of the community. Whether they be definitely connected with any specifically religious organisation or not, it must press their claims upon the attention of its readers. But it has a further function to perform. It must be critical as well as enthusiastic, critical of the ways and means by which benevolence proposes to realise its objects. It will not adopt in its entirety the cynical saying of Buckle that "there is no instance on record of an ignorant man who, having good intentions, and supreme power to enforce them, has not done far more evil than good"; but it will recognise that there is an element of truth in this sweeping indictment. The best intentioned measures of reform very often either fail altogether in achieving their object, or, in achieving it, give rise to new and unexpected forms of mischief. This is generally due to want of adequate knowledge either of the complicated circumstances to be dealt with or of the workings of economic and social laws. The whole history of charity is a standing illustration of this. Surely one of the most valuable services which a religious newspaper can render to its readers is to keep them so in touch with the latest information and best theories, that they may act intelligently as well as enthusiastically, and so be saved the bitter experiences of failure. It must criticse fearlessly all well meant effort which is not founded upon adequate knowledge and insight, remembering that the enemies of righteousness do specially triumph in the mistakes and failures of its advocates. In connection with the educational and charitable work which centres around our Churches, and which no one doubts to be a proper expression of their Religious Life, there is a great need for instructed and intelligent as well as for self-sacrificing and enthusiastic work. A paper which aims at being the organ of these Churches must not neglect to minister to this necessity.

If we turn to the other class of cases, though indeed there is no sharp line of demarcation to be drawn, the question is not so simple. Over and above the matters on which there is general agreement there are, and always will be, a number of moral and social problems which cannot be touched without arousing keen controversy. The new ideals which mark the progress of humanity do not all at once pass into general acceptance. They have to make good their title to our obedience through conflict with existing ideals and habits of life. Some fade away before this test. Others have to struggle long and painfully for a footing, and some have been so struggling for the last nineteen centuries. Must a religious newspaper be silent on such matters because the mention of them is sure to arouse controversy and possibly endanger denominational harmony? There are those who hold that such silence is the wisest course. There is a sense in which it may be the most prudent, but I cannot think it is the right course. To me it seems to involve a stepping from the van to the rear, an abandoning of the forlorn hopes of humanity to non-religious organisations, which must end, nay is to-day already to some extent tending towards, the abandoning by humanity of its religious organisations. And if a religious community cannot stand the stress and strain of controversy, properly conducted, upon such subjects, then, perhaps, it is time that it should be abandoned.

Controversy "properly conducted." Surely one great duty of a free religious newspaper is not to suppress such controversy, but, welcoming it as an instrument for working out new truth, to take care that it is properly conducted: conducted, that is, with a view not to a personal or party triumph, but to the elucidation of the truth and the victory of the higher ideal. What then can such a paper do towards achieving that victory?

It can and must criticise that ideal, and the methods proposed for attaining it in the sense above mentioned. If it find the ideal to be a sound and noble one it must not be deterred in its advocacy by the mere difficulties of realisation. It must never give into that doctrine of despair which pronounces whole classes of moral evil inevitable, but hold fast to the principle that when once we have realised that anything is morally evil it becomes our duty to expose and combat it. The first step towards victory is taken when we realise the true nature of any evil.

To that end it must aid in the great work of letting light in upon the dark places of life. Light, more light, is what we need as a first condition of improvement. It must struggle against the mistaken delicacy which would pass by whole classes of facts as too unpleasant to be talked about. Put the evil that exists in sharp contrast with the good that might be, so that all men may clearly see both, trusting that "we needs must love the highest when we see it," and, loving it, shall work for it, and it shall come to pass.

Finally, in this work, such a paper must be on its guard against one great danger. It may find it to be its duty from time to time to oppose or support political measures proposed now by one party and now by another, but it must never identify itself with any party. It must never take hold of any social or moral questions as a stick wherewith to beat opponents, nor allow the party spirit or party animosities to influence it. If it should fall into that snare it will deserve to forfeit the confidence of its readers, but if it can avoid it, then it may fairly hope that they will not be offended at the expression from time to time of views with which some of them cannot wholly agree.

GREETINGS, COUNSEL AND GOOD WISHES.

IT is not easy to estimate the debt which liberal religion owes to THE INQUIRER for the services which it has rendered during the sixty years, in which it has with faithful energy borne witness to truth, and proclaimed its gospel of spiritual faith and devotion. I can claim to have known something of what it has accomplished, as I have been a constant reader of its pages for over fifty years of its existence, and though not always agreeing with all the opinions it has advocated or thinking all the plans of action which it recommended wise, I have been always deeply impressed with the high aims it has had in view, and the broad spirit in which it has striven to promote their attainment. Under the direction of men of varied convictions it has maintained a faithful adherence to the object it proclaims of being a journal of Liberal Religious Thought and Life, keeping its columns open to the expression of divergent opinions and using them to promote the practical application to conduct of the religious principles of the free congregations from the members of which the majority of its readers are drawn. During the many years of THE INQUIRER'S existence many marked changes have occurred in the positions held by the leaders of theological thought, and opinions which the most advanced thinkers ventured to expound half-a-century ago with most hesitating discretion have passed into trite commonplaces even among our more conservative teachers of the present day. THE INQUIRER was always ready to let those new thoughts find room in its pages, if they were expressed in a reverent spirit, even when they did not meet with the acceptance of the Editor, nor sympathy from the majority of its readers, and secured for all who studied its pages the opportunity of knowing what new light research, criticism and philosophy were casting on religious knowledge and theological study. Many bright contributions have adorned its pages with literary criticism of no insignificant merit, and now and then its readers have greeted with pleasure poetry of high excellence. The Editors of THE INQUIRER have not aimed to secure for their paper the light popularity by which the profits of a successful periodical are secured, but have steadily striven to uphold a standard of high, reverent, and spiritual thought, which would promote a genuine Christianity in its readers, and enable them to keep abreast of the best results of modern philosophical and theological science. They have, at the same time, never allowed themselves to be prevented by carping criticisms from upholding what they believed to be right in theory and in practice, while with a rare impartiality in journalism they have freely given space to outspoken condemnation of their opinions and of the policy which they regarded as expedient. Sixty years is a long period to look back upon, but THE INQUIRER may be congratulated on having a record which is unstained. It has done noble work in proving that while maintaining complete freedom of research a definite faith in religion can be upheld, and applied to the changing conditions of private and of public life. It has cultivated a spirit of enlightened sympathy with every effort to make Christianity the inspiring principle of life in every individual and in all nations, and has striven to promote peace on earth and goodwill toward men. I do not wish to speak as if THE INQUIRER had never erred in the many years of its existence, but its faithful adherence to principle and its honest declaration of truth have won respect and made old readers like myself wish that prosperity may attend its future years, and that it may find its influence extending among those who, on the foundation of Christian Faith and Christian love, are slowly but surely building the Kingdom of our God.

S. ALFRED STEINTHAL.

THOUGH I cannot remember the launching of the good ship INQUIRER, my warm interest in her course goes back at least 30 years, during which time I have been an occasional contributor of heavy articles to her freight. Fortunately the three able captains under whom I have worked have so arranged their cargoes by the skilful introduction of a goodly supply of taking yet instructive matter as to keep their vessel well afloat, and so save her from the fate to which the philsophical lucubrations of some of us would speedily have consigned her.

But seriously, I can confidently say that THE INQUIRER, through my long acquaintance with it, has been thorough without being dull, and has succeeded in keeping its readers abreast of the highest scholarship of the time and the truest and most inspiring ideas on ethics and religion. There could be no more conclusive justification for its past existence, or a more encouraging omen for its future career than the fact that many of the rational conceptions of Christian doctrine which THE INQUIRER was almost alone in England in advocating 30 years ago, and which then met with strenuous opposition from the other branches of the Christian Church have now been quietly incorporated in the "new" theology and are being preached from many so-called "orthodox" pulpits. And it is particularly noticeable that owing to the rapid spread of the Sabellian conception of the Trinity, and to the almost universally accepted belief in the immanence and self-revelation of God in all rational souls, the conception of Jesus which Dr. Martineau held, and which THE INQUIRER has long advocated, is gradually becoming indistinguishable from the doctrine of the Incarnation of God in Christ as now set forth by some of the ablest Anglican and Nonconformist divines.

But the task for the performance of which THE INQUIRER exists is by no means finished. Its pages, and those of its worthy colleague, the Christian Life, still appear to be the only ones in which the rational views of Christianity which are gradually taking possession of the religious thought of our time can find clear and unambiguous expression.

Most heartily, then, do I congratulate THE INQUIRER on the good work it has done, and I feel assured that in the future it will present that happy combination of deep spirituality and reverence with perfect freedom of thought which has characterised its previous management.

Oxford. CHARLES B. UPTON.

THE sixty years which the present issue of THE INQUIRER commemorates, constitute the great era of modern thought. Have we not heard in these last years from a thousand tongues the praises of the Nineteenth Century or the Victorian Age. Free trade and industrial development, science and invention, geographical discovery and imperial expansion, do not all the specific influences, which have made us what we are to-day, fall within these limits? It is more to the point to notice that the great religious revolution, through which we have been passing, is also the creation of this period. The methods of historical criticism have been applied to the Bible, and the sources of religion have been transferred from an external record to the reason, the conscience, the affections, of the human spirit. We are ourselves too much involved in this great change to realise its full significance. For some of us it is still imperfectly accomplished; and if its results are carried a little further than we like, there are yet symptoms of apprehension and alarm.

During these eventful years THE INQUIRER, if I mistake not, has always been on the side of freedom and progress. The conflict could not, of course, take the acute shape in our churches which it assumed elsewhere. The crisis with us occurred early, and was practically over when the Rev. J. J. Tayler and the Rev. James Martineau became colleagues at Manchester New College. To the principles which they worked out in the fields of religious history and philosophy, THE INQUIRER has always given unflinching support. We do not think that it will cease to bear an equally honourable testimony in the future.

But in the meantime new questions have arisen. Every one rejoices in the mighty change in the conception of religion which transfers its chief interest from creed to character and conduct. In this application there is always room for wide varieties of judgment. Do we not all need a little more patience, forbearance, and sympathy, when conceptions of personal, social, or political duty are urged upon us, with which we are in imperfect accord? We cannot all go at quite the same pace; but when we expect THE INQUIRER to show us the way, let us only desire that it shall be strenuous without loss of moderation, sincere without prejudice, progressive without partisanship. The place of the churches which THE INQUIRER serves, at the end of another sixty years, it is happily not given to us to foresee. We are not called to prophesy, but to encourage. The way is long and steep, but the "upward calling" must ever summon us to quit the dusty valley for the heights. Let us, then, take courage, and the good hand of our God shall be upon us.

J. ESTLIN CARPENTER.

FOR sixty years THE INQUIRER has been the literary representative of a Christian faith whose emphasis is laid upon life. The finest affirmation of Jesus is this:—"I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly," while his great contribution to religious development must be found in the truth of the identification of knowledge and life, the attainment of divine vision by means of a divine experience. Jesus discovered a new way of knowing God through the spirit of truth and the love of holiness. Theological speculation is the spinning of theories to account for this spiritual consciousness. All "evidences" for the existence of God are elaborations of a solemn secret of the human heart; all "proofs" of immortality are the attempts to apply the category of time to that eternal life which transcends the touch of change; all creeds are the efforts to symbolise the stages of that life whereby man becomes partaker of the divine nature. Our endeavour is to lay the emphasis where Jesus laid it, not on Biblical authority, ecclesiastical tradition, or dogmatic symbols, but on the vital fellowship of the human soul with the Divine Spirit. Even the most venerable standards must be reckoned amongst "the things which are moved," when they no longer interpret the larger life into which Christianity has grown, when they become obstacles to the attainment of "the fulness of God." He whose life is a conscious growth into that fulness comes into contact with a Reality which dwarfs the most audacious philosophy, while the amplest symbol of faith shrivels up before the blaze of the beatific vision. To anticipate the vaster unfolding of this spiritual consciousness is more fascinating than any social or political forecasts of the years to come; all secular triumphs are subordinate to the creation of a kingdom of God, even as it is said of the holy city that they shall bring the glory and honour of the nations into it. And when some forerunner of that kingdom becomes the Voice of the unutterable yearnings of the soul, then the conflicting philosophies and theologies of olden days will be silenced before the Word of Life, which shall fulfil the desires of all hearts. He that tells us "all things," is he not indeed the Christ? In some second advent HE will come—how, we know not—when, we know not—but we know that when Messiah cometh—then—then! "Perhaps," as a modern mystic puts it, "some one will come to whom it will be given to express what it is that we all feel as regards this side of the soul, which is like the face of the moon, that none have perceived since the world began."

May THE INQUIRER, in its new career through the twentieth century, still maintain the ideal which has guided it through two generations; may it be a Voice crying: "Prepare ye the way of the Lord of Life!" FRANK WALTERS.

Newcastle-on-Tyne.

HEARTIEST greetings to THE INQUIRER on its sixtieth birthday and many happy returns of the day! I shall say no word in praise of its present editor, for I see his ruthless blue pencil poised menacingly over the complimentary sentence I have in my heart to write. Of THE INQUIRER, in its large impersonality, what can we say but words of sincerest gratitude for the generous hospitality that, like our Manchester College, recognises so many "differences of opinion but no heresies." Time was when its pages were especially necessary for theological reasons. Then it stood valiantly with the advanced wing. But the Parker controversy is dead. There are no longer two Unitarianisms, but many; and these are unified in one Free Catholic Faith. Another controversy, however, is already upon us. We may consent to paralyse our efforts and weaken, if not destroy, our collective efficiency by deferring its settlement; we may hide our heads in the sands and resolutely refuse to see it, but we shall not escape its difficulties save by going through with them, and tolerantly but thoroughly thrashing out the issues. They have already appeared in your columns and will appear again and again. It is not a matter of rivalry between the society of individual subscribers called the B. and F.U.A. and that representative Society of Churches known as the National Conference, for both societies are needed. The controversy is one respecting the right differentiation of the functions of these two bodies. Shall we blunder on darkly, permitting a doctrinal association (admitted to be doctrinal by its retired president) to carry on ecclesiastical work that is for it legally and morally ultra vires, simply because as sensible people we see that practical work must be done and is, moreover, being really well done; or, shall we firmly and insistently seek a transference of these particular functions from the B. and F. to the National Conference, leaving the B. and F. to continue, only more vigorously than ever, its publishing and propagandist work? Until this question is no longer evaded, but finally solved, there will remain the odious but necessary distinction of loyalties which finds expression in the names of our chapels and in speech that refers to "Conference men" and "men of Essex Hall," to "Free Catholics" and "Unitarians." The theological controversy is dead; this ecclesiastical controversy is sensitively alive. THE INQUIRER will be no partisan, and it is an intense satisfaction to know that in this new controversy as in the old it will offer no hindrance to the free and frank expression of opinion. May it ever flourish and extend its beneficent influence!

J. M. LLOYD THOMAS.

Nottingham.

DEAR INQUIRER,—So you are not yet grown too old and grey to let us take note of your sixtieth birthday. Well, here is congratulation, and heartily. But hold on until you reach your century, and then (if any of us living!) we will give you a worthy centenary.

You have, indeed, made a good record, set a high standard, and laid up sixty years of fine traditions. While other, and similar, religious papers have either "suffered" change, or passed out of existence, you have kept steadily on your way, and by no means without difficulty. Small circulations, scanty subscription lists, insufficient advertisements, seem to have dogged your course from the first, but you have never been deserted when you have made your appeal—and never will.

And you have taken a wide view of your mission: a woudrously wide one in the beginning. Your present readers do not turn to your columns for "Foreign and Colonial Intelligence," "Parliamentary Proceedings," "University Intelligence," "The Drama," "Court News," and "The Money Market and The Funds," contributed by the worthy Mr. Samuel Sharpe! Yet all these were there in your first number, but for a reason that holds no longer. This was your plea, that you wished to supply a family newspaper, "entertaining and useful to the general reader." Well, family and weekly papers have increased beyond knowledge, and decreased to lowest price since you first entered the lists and charged sixpence; and I do hope that we shall have no more of this "family" idea which has recently been revived with some favour.

For your present readers, as those of sixty years since, do look to your pages expectantly for those inspirations of "Truth, Freedom, Charity," which you have ever striven to proclaim since you first put this motto under your name. (Why has it gone?) As for your name, to which objection has been taken, it may not be an ideal one, old INQUIRER, but it is at least better than many another. It means candour, open-mindedness to the future, fair mindedness in every encounter—virtues, alas, not over conspicuous in the religious press; it means what it was meant to mean, when first selected and defended, "I seek after Truth by which no man ever yet was injured." But it does not mean indefiniteness or lack of strong convictions.

A definite, even urgent work is yours. You have principles, moral and religious, to uphold as sacred before the world, and apply to personal, social, and national need; a movement to represent whose thought may contribute to a truer and nearer knowledge of God; Churches to stimulate into a healthier sense of their corporate and organic life; onlookers and truthseekers in other Churches, or no churches, who are ready to receive the best that knowledge, scholarship and reverence can furnish.

Give us your very best; give us a lead; do not expect us to always agree; do not give way when we are touchy. You have better paid, well edited, widely read competitors—no companions, but we like you better than all the rest, and should miss you the most. Be the Speaker of our highest ideals, the Spectator of our hardest endeavours; be the Guardian of our liberties, the Pilot of our course, and we will back up your directors both with loyalty and means.

FRANK K. FREESTON.

GREETINGS FROM ABROAD.

I AM very glad to be able to send my hearty greetings to the gallant editor and staff of THE INQUIRER at the sixtieth anniversary of the birthday of this Unitarian and liberal paper. High are the ideals aimed at by the editor of THE INQUIRER. First, according to its title, stands the aim to make free inquiry into moral, social and religious questions, as is the order of the day among modern thinkers. Now, what else is the cause of such indefatigable inquiry but an eager love of truth? Lessing would have praised such a purpose, he who said: "If the Almighty would offer me in one hand truth, in the other inquiry after truth, I should choose the latter." But there is another ideal of THE INQUIRER—viz., to give satisfaction to the needs and aspirations of the human soul. Amidst the social evils, vices, sufferings and wars which grieve mankind the task of a religious paper is to warn, correct, console and counsel men with the charitable spirit of the Gospel.

It seems to me, who have read THE INQUIRER for many years, that it has faithfully discharged this double office. Therefore I am thankful for the good it has done to me, and I wish to its earnest and courageous leader success and long prosperity. G. BONET-MAURY.

Professor in the Protestant Faculty of Theology in the University of Paris.

Paris, June 28.

THE Rev. E. Fontanès, of Paris, whose genial presence added so much to the happiness of our International meetings last year, sends us, with the most cordial good wishes, the following valuable contribution to our anniversary number, for the translation of which we are indebted to the Rev. E. L. H. Thomas:—

I have been recalling an interesting conversation with a fellow-countryman of yours, a certain noble lord who has been devoting himself, I imagine, to an apostleship amongst the ruling classes, and who, whilst rejoicing at the sympathetic reception which he met with in France, confessed that it was not dogmatic Christianity which attracted and swayed men's souls, but that it was indirectly that Christianity was making its conquests. He added, too, that similarly in India it was this indirect influence which was becoming dominant, without leading the Hindoos to a direct profession of ecclesiastical and dogmatic Christianity. This testimony deserves to be recorded as an encouragement to such brave pioneers as the editors of THE INQUIRER, who so long have striven to discover and re-kindle beneath the stifling mass of encumbrances, and the dank dead leaves of an intolerant dogmatism of Authority, the sacred fire of the Gospel of Love. More than ever is it our duty to let the free accent of the human consciousness, which is known and felt amongst all independent and sincere minds, be heard above the discordant voices of the priests of every denomination. The more the feeling of human and planetary solidarity is accentuated, the more need there is to escape from that traditional language, the dull and obscured images of which have lost their clearness and their pith, and which are now nothing but the language of sects, and which the Countess de Gasparin justly called "the dialect of Canaan." If it is allowable to preserve certain images, which are like medals struck with a fine relief, we must do as intelligent jewellers do, and insert these pearls in a modern setting, but beware of circulating them as current coin.

For those in particular of the Latin race and culture, who have not been familiarised from childhood upwards with the stories and the language of the Bible, it is indispensable to follow the example and the counsel of an illustrious ambassador, de Bunsen, who disliked diplomacy that is shrouded in misty equivocations, and we must strive to translate the "Shemitic into the Japhetic." It is certain that for all men of Latin extraction, the Latin and Greek writers, Cicero, Seneca, or Plato, for example, are easier of access and more acceptable than the theologians and the mystics of the Middle Ages. To bring back to the Gospel these minds, to help them to appreciate the beauties of the Gospel, we must give the counsel which an old mother ape gave to a young irreverent monkey that despised its elders, and teach them that the nuts have an excellent taste, in spite of the bitter difficulty of trying to crack them, and that they must be opened. Theology, with its Byzantine formulas of the fourth century, and with the subtleties and and literalism of the Scholastic Epoch, set our teeth on edge. We must speedily crack the shell so as to enjoy the nut in peace. Religious Liberalism ought not to shrink from appearing radical; it is to its honour, and it is its duty to penetrate to the heart of things, and not to rest satisfied with half measures and conventions which endanger sincerity without solving problems. If nations, notwithstanding their national self-love, are obliged to modify their politics and to give it a cosmopolitan character (un caractère mondial), the exclusiveness of the Churches and of theologies is for ever condemned. We must learn to look above the narrow walls behind which prejudices were perpetuated, and imbue the Protestant Christian consciousness with respect and admiration of other religious types. The doctrine of the dualism and the antagonism of matter and spirit is refuted by careful observation of fact, and we must substitute a doctrine of a successive and constant hierarchy and ascent of religious truth for those alleged irreducible oppositions which foster hatreds and contradictions. Let us not accuse Religious Liberalism of indifference and scepticism because it has discovered a soul of truth in the errors which Anathema had vainly striven to reduce. Quite otherwise ought our feeling to be, and in this broadening of humanity's mental range of vision we ought to manifest a beneficent effect from the Religion of the Father who has never ceased to touch the heart of man and to awaken in it the love of truth and an aspiration after perfection. If at the origin of nations the diversity of languages appeared to them as the fruit of discord, and as proofs of a different origin in nobility, in our days the study of languages, of literatures, of religions, tells a quite different tale, and above the diversities we recognise the unity of the aspirations, the unity of the movement which draws all the members of the human family ever nearer to him whom the human heart has felt and claimed, and whom the purest of the sons of Shem called "Our Heavenly Father." The Tower of Babel belongs to the past, to the ages of ignorance, of credulity and antipathy. The modern world greets an ever-increasing Pentecost which finds in independent science a herald and a prophetess. THE INQUIRER will always be at the service of this beneficent propaganda, and will ceaselessly recall to the mind of the clergy of the churches of Authority, of Ritual and of Dogma, this great saying of Goethe's that "The time of the Religions of rites and formulas has passed away. Behold! the dawn of the Religion of Character and of Deeds. This is the new labarum which will lead on to the victory of the 'Kingdom of God.'"

I cherish a very pleasant and comforting recollection of last year's Conference of Religious Liberals, and remain most cordially yours, E. FONTANÈS.

Paris, June 24.

IT is with the greatest pleasure that I greet THE INQUIRER on its sixtieth birthday. For more than two-thirds of this long time it has been the best friend and most ready defender and helper of our cause in Hungary. In the fifties and sixties, when our Churches were under the greatest trials and difficulties its pages were open on our behalf and helped the Hungarian Unitarian Church to save herself from final oppression. We look upon THE INQUIRER as a hearty good friend of the Hungarian nation too. Most thankfully do I acknowledge that whenever I have sent words of defence and correction against unjust charges, they have been readily accepted. My personal gratitude is simply boundless, because during 25 years I have constantly been able to speak through its pages to my English friends and co-religionists. If English readers congratulate THE INQUIRER on this occasion, because of services rendered in England, I do so on account of good and noble international work, and wish for the paper all success and an endless life.

GEORGE BOROS.

Kolozsvár, Hungary, June 27.

YOU have taken in hand to defend the cause of true Christianity, delivered from dogmatic fetters and purified from all the artificial elements which centuries of ignorance had added by degrees. Your courage in affirming Unitarian beliefs has given courage also to your readers. As for me, I admired, at the last International meeting, how clear were the affirmations and how intense the conviction of the speakers. THE INQUIRER certainly amply contributed to such a happy result, which impressed all your foreign friends.

As you know, I have no Unitarian friends about me, and I receive your newspaper as a confidant who speaks to me in the stillness of my study. But it was not my purpose to enjoy it alone, and I regularly give THE INQUIRER to the Vieusseux's circulating library and reading room (5 Via dei Vecchietti), the most important in Florence. It remains all the week at the disposal of many readers, and, if I cannot tell you through how many hands it passes, I am sure it does good.

I only regret that my Italian colleagues do not read your newspaper. They would be the better for some progress in liberal thoughts. Nevertheless, I can tell you one good thing, that the Association of Clergymen in Florence—hitherto incorrectly known as the "Evangelical Alliance"—has, at my suggestion, abolished the confessional articles from its rules.

Lecturing during the past year on Biblical Archæology at the Waldensian Divinity School (an orthodox college), I have tried to initiate the students into critical problems, insisting on the chronology of the documents in the Bible. And I think the little I had the occasion to explain was with some profit. We are obliged in Italy to begin at the beginning, and you are in England almost half a century before us in the matter of religious science.

I finish with my best wishes for the ever growing prosperity of THE INQUIRER, already so prosperous under your direction. May it do much good near and far! May it invigorate the faith of its friends and obtain many more adherents to its principles! T. ANDRÉ.

Florence.

I HAVE much pleasure in availing myself of the opportunity kindly offered to me of addressing to THE INQUIRER some words of sympathy and friendship on the occasion of its sixtieth anniversary. It is with the greatest interest that I look through your weekly every Saturday. Since the never-to-be-forgotten days of the meetings of the International Council at London my interest in our English spiritual kinsmen has greatly increased. That interest has existed indeed for several years past, for ever since I attended your annual meetings as delegated member of the "Protestantenbond," I have felt cordial sympathy for the Unitarians. But the splendid Whitsun week, when so many nations of the world were represented in London, and spoke, each in his own way, of the great works of God, strengthened that sympathy to a considerable degree.

It is true that the miserable war in South Africa threw a dark shadow on that sympathetic feeling. Of course, we in Holland deeply deplore the fall of the South African Republics, and even the peace that has been made at last cannot remove our indignation. But the knowledge that so many of our Unitarian brethren were deeply ashamed of this war and uttered their protest in THE INQUIRER, as you did several times, gave us some consolation.

You English and we Dutch moderns are carrying on the same struggle on religious territory: the struggle against clerical conservatism on the one and against cold indifferentism on the other side. Yet the days of heated polemics happily lie behind us. More than the sword we have to handle the trowel. To the great labour of the building up of a free religious conviction all forces must be devoted. In my opinion that labour has to be directed towards religious Monism, towards the application of religious principles to evolution, the great idea of our time. And in that building we have also to use the materials which are offered us by pagan religions.

If religion is to be a power in the twentieth century, it has to descend to the depth of the inner life, it has to spread itself on the broad fields of the science of religions, and to apply its principles to the social and political questions of our time. It has to declare war against imperialism and conservatism, to adopt what is good in socialism, and to acknowledge the ethical significance of co-operation. It has to realise the noble thought of our friend Arnold Toynbee: "Any attempt to preach a pure religion must go along with attempts at social reform."

With the sincere wish that it may be given to THE INQUIRER to work for many years more in that direction.

BEST thanks for work done in years gone! Best wishes for God's blessing in years to come! THEO BERG.

Copenhagen, July 9. (Telegram.)

DR. SCHIELER, of Königsberg, with his congratulations to THE INQUIRER, sends us the following interesting account of the religious position in Germany, which he introduces by a reference to the happy memories he has of the meetings of the International Council last year in London:—

My congregation was very glad to hear my report of the hopeful success of the International Council, and if another meeting is arranged for next year a greater number of members of the free communities in Königsberg, Danzig and Tilsit will take part. I wrote about the Council for several religious and political papers in Germany, and was surprised how many people showed great interest in liberal religious thought and the progress of the liberal religious movement throughout the world, represented in the Unitarian International Council.

There are in Germany many liberal religious thinkers and workers in the "Evangelischen Landeskirchen" of Prussia, Sachsen, Hessen, Baden, &c., and outside their borders; but the State Churches have symbola and confessions of Faith, such as the Augsburg Confession. The articles of these "Symbola" are the rule of faith, and therefore obstacles to religious liberty, and religious inquiry. Very many liberal pastors do not dare to confess publicly, what they think and believe, and that is a great danger for the religious mind and life. Some of these liberal thinkers have dared it, and therefore have been obliged to leave their parishes, or ecclesiastical offices; other liberal pastors elected by congregations have not been confirmed in their posts by the Church government. In the parishes of many cities, as in Berlin, there are hot struggles between the orthodox and liberals. But the liberal religious movement is so strong and sound, that it will get the victory. "Haec est victoria nostra fides nostra," i.e., fides libera et liberalis.

In all the theological Faculties of the Universities there are liberal professors of Theology, in some Universities in addition to orthodox professors. The professors of Theology, Dr. Holtzmann in Strasburg, Dr. Adolf Harnack and Dr. Otto Pfleiderer in Berlin, are liberal thinkers and have the greatest authority and the largest influence on all theological questions. These celebrated teachers and authors powerfully forward liberal religious thought and life in Germany. Further, there are religious weekly and monthly papers (the Protestanten Blatt in Bremen, the organ of the "Deutschen Protestanten Verein," and Die Christliche Welt in Marburg and Dr. Websky's Protestant Monatshefte), very well edited, which spread liberal religious ideas everywhere; and a few days ago a conservative-orthodox newspaper of Berlin confessed, not without grief, that many more laymen now make inquiry for liberal religious papers and books than formerly, and than for orthodox religious papers and books.

The Minister of Ecclesiastical Affairs and Public Instruction in Prussia, Dr. Studt, declared lately that, for the diverse tendencies in evangelical theology, light and air should be proportionately distributed. This is a demand of equalising justice. It is in the nature of evangelical liberty that no limits should be set to theological inquiry. And Minister Studt is not a liberal Protestant. And the President of the High Consistory in Berlin, Dr. Barkhausen, Excel., said in the same legislative assembly (Herrenhaus), that in the present time there is a vehement struggle and a dangerous crisis in the Church.

These are very favourable indications that liberal religion is making progress in Germany. But we must not forget that intolerant orthodoxy is still a powerful adversary, dominant in the State Churches, that very many people are indifferent to religion because of the great contradiction between the Confessions of faith of the Church and the results of Science, between the doctrine of the Church and modern thought, and add to this that Ultramontanism, the most formidable antagonist of liberal religion, has still great influence in Germany. Nevertheless, liberal religious thought advances more and more in modern society quietly and continually, for Truth is on its side.

DR. D. C. SCHIELER.

Koenigsberg, i. P., June 26.

FROM the Rev. W. C. Gannett, of Rochester, N.Y. so well known among us as the author of "Blessed be Drudgery," and, with Mr. Hosmer, of beautiful hymns and poems in "The Thought of God," we have received a very cordial letter, in which he says:—

I can gladly and gratefully say that I enjoy THE INQUIRER—partly because it is an over-the-sea cousin, and readers like a letter from home-folks abroad, partly just for the value of the articles in it. Scissors are the test of valuation, and THE INQUIRER often goes to the basket under my table in fragments. It is a staider paper than ours—we laugh more than you in our thinking and talking. And it is more strictly indoors "Unitarian," perhaps because we feel ourselves very distinctly a part of the Assent rather than the Dissent in things religious here. Do we as Unitarians feel ourselves more vitally concerned with the general life of the community than you? We certainly seem to demand more windows in our papers. The Outlook, Lyman Abbott's liberal orthodox paper, is probably the most successful type of religious paper among us. Its name, which fits it better than Inlook, indicates the type; and other papers are imitating its make-up.

Sixty years old! For the best of reasons I like things of that age—its about mine! May THE INQUIRER keep its heart young and its voice strong, while its head grows wise!

THE Rev. Joseph May, for many years Unitarian minister at Philadelphia, and successor to the late Dr. Furness, writes from Florence:—

I truly rejoice in all that THE INQUIRER has been and done in its long life and wish for it many more cycles of prosperity and usefulness.

If, in outward form, the instrumentalities of the intellectual and religious movement which we commonly call Unitarianism are still comparatively small and feeble, we are bound to rate highly the importance of them. For the essence of Unitarianism is not in the theological opinions which characterise it at any period, and which are indeed more or less heterogeneous and mutable, but in the great unchanging principles which underlie it and give it its vigour, and which are axiomatically the conditions of all true thought and real progress in religion. The complete, inalienable freedom of the individual mind; the duty as well as the right of private inquiry after truth; mutual respect for all sincere and carefully attained results of thought and study; perfect confidence in the ultimate safety and welfare of every soul that dedicates itself to truth; these principles must necessarily lead faithful minds, ever progressively, towards the perfect truth of life and thought which is realised in the Divine mind.

For these we unfalteringly stand; and since they are so little understood and are so imperfectly recognised in the greater religious organisations about us, it is of the utmost consequence that somewhere, and though feebly and obscurely, they should be steadfastly proclaimed. The whole world must some day recognise and accept them. We must not doubt or waver, but only faithfully speak our word, and trust Providence that it shall be a good seed, to bear its harvest in God's good time.

HEARTY greetings from over the sea! The importance of sixty years of such intelligent, devoted, and heroic service to the cause of religious enlightenment as THE INQUIRER has rendered cannot be measured. I cannot think of any work done in the religious world during these sixty years that seems to me to have been more necessary or better worth doing than that which THE INQUIRER has accomplished. But who with eyes to see and intelligence to understand the signs of the times does not believe that the next sixty years will have a work for you to do still larger and more important?

It was a great thing you English Unitarians did in holding in London last year the first really representative gathering of the Unitarians of the world. Our churches and workers everywhere need more of the breadth of view which planned that meeting. It is time we were all getting a world-horizon. The Unitarian movement is not for England, or Hungary, or America; it is for the world. It has come into being in answer to demands as wide as humanity. Germany, France, Italy, Sweden, Russia, Australia, Mexico, all Christian countries, need it as they need no other form of religion; and thousands of their best minds are ready for it. The same is true of non-Christian countries.

The experience of our mission in Japan shows that that land welcomes Unitarianism as it welcomes no other form of Christian thought. The same is true of India. There are numerous signs that a welcome as cordial awaits it in China. Mohammedan peoples will listen to no other form of Christianity, but to our thought they give a respectful and interested hearing. What a call is this to missionary activity on our part! Here is a work which the present is already laying upon us, but which the future will lay upon us more and more. And we may well rejoice that it is so, for no higher task was ever given to men. Moreover, in throwing ourselves into this larger, this world-mission, we shall be certain vastly to increase the life and power of our own home work. Is not here the most important of all possible fields of leadership for THE INQUIRER?

For one I am convinced that the cause of Unitarianism to-day has no greater need than for a paper with a distinct world-outlook, and therefore on fire with missionary zeal. And is not the place for the publication of such a paper London, that city which comes nearer than any other to being the world's centre?

So, then, from across the sea, as one who has long been one of your friends and admirers, I beg leave to send this birthday message:—For the past sixty years, Well done! For the sixty years to come, Forward and Courage! Let THE INQUIRER be our strong standard bearer in a campaign to carry our Unitarian Gospel of Light and Love to the ends of the earth.

MISSIONARY CONFERENCE.

THE annual meeting of the Missionary Conference was held at the Memorial Hall, Manchester, on Thursday, July 3, the President, the Rev. HENRY EACHUS, in the chair. A Communion Service was conducted by the President and the Rev. T. Robinson; and afterwards a Devotional Service was conducted by the Revs. W. C. Hall and H. Kelsey White.

At the business meeting the President delivered an interesting address, in the course of which he spoke touchingly of the early days of the Home Missionary Board, the old students of which, at one time, formed the membership of the Conference exclusively. His brief character sketches of the old College tutors were tender and sympathetic. Though the College started in a small way, it had attained to a very honourable position. He was glad that its curriculum had been enlarged, and hoped that its progress would be upward and onward. While during the last fifty years much ground has been gained theologically, and in many other ways, yet we are passing through very difficult times—times which try the faith, the patience and forbearance of all. The world may be against us, as it was against our great teacher and leader Christ; but he overcame the world. So may we, if we imbibe his spirit, and walk in his steps. We are called upon to receive and welcome only such things as are based in truth and righteousness; and it is our duty to avoid all new ideas and new methods of preaching, no matter how popular such things may be, if they are not in harmony with the teaching of Jesus, or with the devout worship of God. If we strive to be popular only, we shall lose the prize of our high calling, and bring down the purity of the gospel to the mire of the world. Every minister will have a measure of success, if he will be true to himself and to the simple truths which he is called upon to teach. "Under the whole heavens there is nothing difficult; it is only the minds of men that are not determined."

The Committee's Report referred to the very successful services conducted at Colwyn Bay last summer, and also to the services held at Ramsay. The Pavilion at Colwyn Bay has been again secured for the coming season. Inquiries have been made at Morecambe Bay and Barrow-in-Furness as to the desirability of holding services; but the conclusion arrived at is that the present conditions are not favourable. The Committee was instructed to make arrangements for the holding of summer services at Windermere or Ambleside.

At the Afternoon Session the Rev. H. D. ROBERTS, of Liverpool, read a paper on "Some Impressions of Missionary Work." He said that as a matter of course we believe that we have a gospel of thought and life for the people around us. It claims no finality or infallibility. It is based on the sum total of human experience, and men cannot help needing it. He spoke in detail of his efforts in the Liverpool district, and of the difficulties not only in drawing men in to hear, but in holding them afterwards. There was still fear of religious persecution. Business men barely holding their own are chary of allying themselves with an unpopular cause. Lectures with questions afterwards, he thought preferable to religious services. Organisation, too, was wanted with a soul in it.

The Rev. W. H. BURGESS opened the discussion. He thought that everything did not depend upon the minister. There was an inevitable shrinkage in a new movement when a committee was formed, and the people asked to share responsibility. The problem in his own town was a difficult one. The work there had hung fire. It was started years ago in the Town Hall so successfully that one of the energetic converts believed that in a few years everybody in the town would be a Unitarian. Yet it was still dependent upon the Association for a yearly grant. There was a spirit of religious inquiry in the town, as shown by the theological volumes borrowed from the Free Library; but these thinking people will not attach themselves to any organisation. He believed in open-air preaching, though his own gift did not lie in that direction.

The Rev. JAMES RUDDLE thought that open-air preaching encouraged irresponsibility, and that for our cause it was not efficacious.

The Rev. JAMES C. STREET thought there was no cause for discouragement; that even where strong self-supporting churches were not built up influences went out and extended far and wide. He believed in open-air services, although those he himself held did not tend materially to augment his indoor congregations. He thought we needed a time of more testing and trial before the old earnestness in religious problems would come to us again.

The Rev. J. B. HIGHAM related his experiences amongst the navvies employed at the Birmingham Corporation Waterworks, and argued from them that Unitarianism needed to be more social before it could grip hold of the working man and win his open allegiance.

The Revs. E. W. LUMMIS, W. C. HALL, W. H. LAMBELLE, and A. H. DOLPHIN also took part in the discussion.

A resolution of earnest sympathy with the Rev. Thomas Leyland, in his serious illness, and enforced retirement from his useful ministry, was unanimously passed.

The members of the Conference had tea together, and spent a pleasant evening in speaking to various sentiments, and exchanging views upon the aspects of their life and work.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Chorley.—The old Park-street Chapel, built in 1725, was reopened on Wednesday, July 2, after complete renovation and enlargement, by the addition of a new chancel to the old oblong building. The old pews are gone, a vestibule is formed by a glazed screen, lead-light glazing is introduced into the windows, and ventilation, lighting, and interior decoration have all been attended to. The work had been rendered possible by the generous gifts of many friends, chief among them being Lady Tate, widow of the late Sir Henry Tate, Bart., who was born in the adjoining manse, his father the Rev. William Tate, having been for thirty-seven years minister of the chapel, and Sir W. H. Tate, Bart., and other members of the family. Lord Balcarres, M.P., and Sir J. T. Brunner, Bart., M.P., were also among the contributors. Nearly £300 has been raised by the congregation, and altogether £605 18s. 6d. has been collected. At the reopening a service was conducted in the afternoon, and a sermon preached by the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson; and after tea a public meeting was held, at which the chair was taken by the Rev. A. Doel, minister of the chapel. Among the speakers were the Rev. R. T. Herford, one of the secretaries of the North-East Lancashire Unitarian Mission, the Rev. S. Thompson, of Rivington, the Rev. W. Bagrie (United Methodist), Mr. W. Carter, secretary of the congregation, and others.

Liverpool Sunday School Society.—The annual summer excursion was held on Saturday, July 5. About fifty friends met at Warrington, and, at the kind invitation of Mr. Monks, a delightful afternoon was spent in the grounds of Walton Old Hall. Tea was served on the lawn. At 7.30 P.M. a service was held at Cairo-street Chapel, the Rev. W. E. Lummis conducting the first portion and the Rev. E. A. Parry giving a very suggestive and helpful address on "Influence." Most of the schools affiliated to the Society were represented, though, owing to the holiday season, several well-known Liverpool friends were unable to be present.

Liverpool: Ullet-road (Presentation).—After morning service on Sunday, June 29, a meeting of the congregation was held in the Church Hall, for the purpose of making a presentation to Major John Evans, V.D., on his retirement from the office of Warden, which he had filled for over twenty years. The chair was taken by Mr. Henry Jevons, J.P., Chairman of the Council, and Mr. Richard D. Holt, secretary, read the address, which was signed by the officers on behalf of the members of the congregation, who had subscribed for the testimonial. The address expressed the great esteem felt for Major Evans, and admiration of his unremitting services both at Renshaw-street and at Ullet-road, not only as Warden for so many years, but also as Sunday-school teacher, member of the Council and Trustee both of the old chapel and of Ullet-road Church. Mr. Jevons, in handing the address to Major Evans, together with a cheque, said that it was at his own desire the testimonial had taken that simple form; it would be gratifying for him to know that one of the last acts of the late William Rathbone was to subscribe to that address. The Rev. L. de Beaumont Klein and Mr. Robert D. Holt also spoke, adding warm tributes of admiration, and Major Evans, in acknowledging the presentation, said that he felt their kindness very deeply, and referred to his attachment to the congregation for nearly fifty years, under the successive ministries of the Revs. John Hamilton Thom, W. H. Channing, and Charles Beard. He had heard every sermon preached in Renshaw-street Chapel during the twenty-one years' of Mr. Beard's ministry. The cheque Major Evans handed back to the chairman, with the request that it should be invested to provide a prize or prizes for the Sunday-school in which he had been for many years a teacher. The address, illuminated by his friends, Mr. J. E. Worrall and Miss Ella Worrall, he should always prize. To them and to all his friends he was truly grateful.

London: Bermondsey.—The Rev. W. G. Tarrant begs to acknowledge, with sincere thanks, the following donations towards the expenses of the Sunday-school excursion:—J. H., £2 2s.; C. L., £1; D. M., 10s.; M. P., 10s.

London: Hampstead (Appointment).—The Rev. Henry Gow, B.A., of the Great Meeting, Leicester, has received and accepted an invitation to the pulpit of Rosslyn-hill Chapel.

London: Highgate.—As one of the centres of the Borough of Islington, the schoolroom of the Highgate-hill Unitarian Christian Church was on Saturday last filled with 150 guests of the King from among the poor of Upper Holloway. The dinner was an unqualified success down to the last detail; the Church members entered most heartily into the work. The Rev. R. H. Greaves presided, and the fare was abundant. No intoxicants were allowed on the premises. An excellent string band played selections during the progress of the banquet, to keep up the custom of the Royal dinners; afterwards many kind and clever artistes furnished an entertainment of music and merriment which was very greatly appreciated by the audience. As the guests departed, gifts of chocolate, tobacco (for the men), the King's beaker, &c., were presented, the President shaking hands with each, and then after tea for the helpers the room was prepared for Sunday-school on the following day.

London: Mansford-street.—On Saturday, July 5, 400 of the King's guests partook of dinner in the Mission Hall. The Rev. John Ellis was in charge at Mansford-street, assisted by a splendid band of voluntary helpers. The rooms had previously been beautifully decorated with festoons of evergreens, kindly supplied by Lady Lawrence; and flags and coloured material lent by several friends. The tables presented an attractive appearance as they were laden with abundant food for the hungry poor, and adorned with plants and cut flowers, supplied by Miss Garrett, Mr. G. Foster, and Mr. Clarke. Each guest received a procelain mug of Doulton ware and a box of chocolate. After dinner the guests were entertained by members of the Preston Club, Miss Garrett's class, and others. A message was read from the King. The loyal toast was received with enthusiasm, and the singing of two verses of the National Anthem brought to a close a most memorable day.

London: Peckham. — The Avondale-road Church was prettily decorated on Sunday last, on the occasion of the Sunday School Anniversary and Flower Services, when satisfactory collections were taken morning, afternoon (scholars), and evening. Addresses were given by the Rev. G. Carter on "Nature's Revelations of God," "The Soul's Growth," and "The Useful and the Ornamental," the Sunday-school superintendent (Mr. J. C. Griffin) assisting in the afternoon. The service in the evening was largely musical. The name of this school should have been among those reported last week as taking part in the London Sunday-school Society's Aggregate Service.

North Cheshire Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The annual picnic was held at Mossley on Saturday last. About 170 teachers and friends sat down to tea in Stamford-road School, and afterwards a ramble, conducted by Mr. Radcliffe Firth, was taken over Quick Edge, past Grotton Hall, where a halt was made, and then over the moors to Greenfield Station, whence the majority of the party took train homewards. On the hills two halts were made, and several of the Whitsuntide hymns were sung, Mr. W. Woolley acting as conductor. At the latter an informal meeting was held, Mr. Broadrick, the President, taking the chair, and a vote of thanks to the Mossley friends for their hospitality, and to Mr. Firth for his excellent services as guide was moved by the Rev. H. E. Dowson, seconded by the Rev. W. Harrison, supported by the Rev. N. Green, and carried unanimously. The weather throughout was gloriously fine, and the picnic a most enjoyable one throughout. The ministers present included (besides the above mentioned) the Revs. T. R. Elliot, J. A. Pearson, W. C. Hall, A. R. Andreae, and F. Dawtrey (locum tenens at Dukinfield).

Southend-on-Sea.—Special services to commemorate the fourth anniversary of the opening of this church were held on Sunday last. In the morning the Rev. G. Lansdown, of Billingshurst, delivered a most interesting and helpful address on "Parables of Household Things," and in the evening Mr. George Cosens-Prior, of Portsmouth, preached an eloquent sermon, taking for his subject "The Quest for Truth." There was a good attendance at each service, and the discourses were much appreciated. The singing was hearty, and altogether the services were much enjoyed. The church was tastefully decorated with plants and cut flowers kindly lent or given by friends. Several strangers were present at the evening service, when Mr. Dear, the minister, made a few brief remarks, and extended a warm welcome to any friends who might be induced to come again.

ABERYSTWYTH

("The Biarritz of Wales")

Is highly recommended for invalids, and possesses the most equable temperature, its shore being swept by the Gulf Stream and S.W. breezes of the Atlantic. The drainage is perfect, and the town is supplied with the purest water from Plymlimmon. The late Sir James Clarke, M.D., says: "A fortnight is equivalent to a month's residence in most watering places." Guides on application to the Town Clerk.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

IT has been a week without any drawback in the King's progress, and on Tuesday he was removed from Buckingham Palace, with the utmost care and ingenuity, so that he suffered no inconvenience or fatigue in the journey, and travelled to Portsmouth, and is now on the Royal yacht at Cowes, enjoying the fresh sea air and quiet summer weather. The doctors are so confident of a steady and complete recovery that they have allowed it to be announced that the Coronation will, in all probability, take place early in August.

DURING the past week three names have been in everybody's mouth—Kitchener, Salisbury, Balfour. Last Saturday Lord Kitchener returned from South Africa, and was warmly welcomed to London, not more as a great soldier than as a generous peacemaker. On Monday it was announced that on the previous Friday Lord Salisbury had resigned his office as Prime Minister, and that his nephew, Mr. Balfour, was his successor. In both Houses of Parliament the announcement was very cordially received, Mr. Balfour's personal popularity being deservedly great, and high tributes were paid to Lord Salisbury for his long and distinguished services to the Crown and country.

IN the House of Lords, where the Duke of Devonshire succeeds as leader, after he and Lord Spencer had borne their tribute, Lord Rosebery added some eloquent words, in the course of which he said of Lord Salisbury :—

He was privileged to be the adviser of the later years of our Elizabeth, as his great ancestor had been the adviser of the first Elizabeth, and, though we had occasion often to differ with him, none of those who opposed him, still less those who had occasion sometimes to cross swords with him in unequal combat, but must have admired the rich eloquence, delivered in those organ tones, the epigrammatic and literary form of his discourse, and the authority with which he spoke, not merely to Great Britain, but to the world.

In the House of Commons Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman said :—

The great and distinguished statesman who has now, it appears, retired from the foremost position in the Empire under the Crown, carries with him the respect and the gratitude of his fellow-countrymen, irrespective of their political opinions.

Lord Salisbury has been three times Prime Minister, and for nearly fifty years has taken his part in the world of politics. At a meeting of the Unionist party on Monday, when Mr. Balfour was greeted as Premier, a very cordial message from Mr. Chamberlain was delivered by his son, who also quoted a former saying of Mr. Chamberlain's respecting Mr. Balfour—"his transparent sincerity and simplicity of character, his generosity to his opponents, and his chivalrous loyalty to his friends."

VENICE suffered a grievous loss on Monday through the sudden collapse of the Campanile of St. Mark's, the great bell-tower which has stood there for a thousand years, the first thing to be seen by those approaching the city, its foundations having been laid in 902. Happily the tower collapsed into itself, and neither St. Mark's nor the Ducal Palace was injured, and there seems to have been no loss of life.

A CONFERENCE under the auspices of the Garden City Association is to be held at Liverpool and Port Sunlight on Friday and Saturday, the 25th and 26th inst. The Conference will open in Liverpool for the consideration of the Housing problem, and on Saturday the delegates will have the opportunity of inspecting the excellent housing arrangements at Port Sunlight, where they will be entertained by Messrs. Lever, and where the Conference will be resumed. Mr. Ralph Neville, K.C., is Chairman of the Council of the Garden City Association. The Secretary is Mr. Thomas Adams, and the Head Office is at 77, Chancery-lane, W.C.

THE High Pavement Chapel, Nottingham, seems about to realise its ambition to erect a handsome memorial to the late Mr. P. W. Clayden. The Nottingham Memorial must be distinguished from the subsequently organised London movement originated by Mr. Clayden's political and journalistic friends on a political basis. Our High Pavement friends wish rather to perpetuate the memory of a distinguished man and minister in his many-sided activities, religious, social, and literary—emphasising his religious work.

MR. E. W. ENFIELD, the hon. treasurer, has now in receipts or promises a sum of over £400. An analysis of the subscription list shows that almost the entire sum has been raised within the congregation. The amounts received or promised from those unconnected with our churches is a little over £10. Liberal Christians, not members of the Nottingham congregation, subscribe nearly £50. The hon. secretary informs us that the many warm and touching letters that have been received from all parts of the kingdom establish the wisdom of the Committee's forecast that many of Mr. Clayden's friends and admirers outside the congregation would desire, in however humble a measure, to join in this tribute, which it is hoped may now begin to assume a more widely representative character. Another £100 at least is needed before the work can be put in hand.

SIR ROBERT ANDERSON, K.C.B., discussing in this month's Nineteenth Century and After "How to put down 'Hooliganism,'" which is said to be on the increase, points out that prevention is not only better, but much easier than cure, and urges that the law should be so altered as to make it an offence for lads, without any occupation, to hang about the streets, where they naturally take a straight course to the life of a vagabond or criminal, and that such lads, if taken in hand in good time, would, as a rule, make capital soldiers and sailors, to their own great advantage and the advantage of the country.

THIS month's Contemporary Review contains a first article on "Immortality," by Mrs. E. M. Caillard, which deserves to be carefully considered. It is addressed to Christians, in the hope of giving them a truer and more helpful view of the life to come, and is to be followed by a second article addressed to those who cannot accept the prevalent Christian doctrine. In the present article it is pointed out how little in touch with the realities of modern life is the received idea of immortality, which has been inherited from ages long past, retaining the atmosphere of the cloister, and it is strongly argued that the conception must be enlarged so as to include all the wholesome activities of life, and not merely passive devotion. Such a belief, it is urged, must be of the utmost practical importance, and ought to be fostered by every available means :—

tual acquiescence) in this continuity of individual human life has issues of infinitely greater importance to society at large than those which it debates with such fervour and heat. It can hardly be said that we are in a position to estimate them as yet. One thing, however, should be abundantly plain. If death is indeed no break in life, but merely an entrance into different conditions of life, this fact of itself should weigh immensely in education. Before it could do so, however, a public opinion in favour of its practical importance would have to be created. At present what public opinion is being brought to bear on the subject leans all the other way. To think much of life beyond the grave is supposed to unfit us for work in the world as it is. Could we realise that every activity of which human beings are capable is a sacred thing (and this is the teaching of Christianity)—a thing which may be defiled, defamed, prostituted to low uses, but which in the Divine ideal of it is altogether noble, beautiful, worthy of all honour, not destined to perish in the using, but to be trained to ever higher and higher perfection then we should deem no effect too strenuous, no sacrifice too great to ensure to ourselves and to others the full development of all human powers and capacities. Our chief aim would be so to think and work that when we take that "one step past the entrance door" to fuller life, neither we nor others through our actions should be weighted by limitations which our experience under earthly conditions should have taught us to surmount.

THE EDUCATION CRISIS.

We only had space last week to refer briefly in a note to the close of the debate on the clause of the Bill dealing with religious instruction in secondary schools to be provided by the new local education authority. As the clause, even as amended, appeared to leave it open to the authority to provide denominational schools, the Committee considered that no such liberty should be allowed; an amendment to this effect was supported by Mr. Balfour and other members of the Government, as well as by the whole of the Opposition, but was violently opposed by a few "Aggressives" with Lord Hugh Cecil at their head, but these advocates for the extension of denominationalism could only muster 29 votes. Thus, the undenominational character of the Council schools is secured by the following addition to Clause 4—

And no pupil shall be excluded from nor placed in an inferior position in any school, college or hostel provided by the Council on the ground of religious belief; and no Catechism or formulary distinctive of any particular religious denomination shall be taught or used in any school, college or hostel so provided.

Mr. Whitley moved a resolution in favour of the abolition of religious tests for teachers in all schools aided by the Council—

That no teacher shall, as a condition of employment, be required to make a declaration of his religious belief.

A strong feeling against the maintenance of religious tests was expressed on both sides of the House, though Mr. Balfour denounced the proposal to abolish religious tests in the case of denominational schools as "raving lunacy." Notwithstanding the Government opposition the amendment was only defeated by a majority of 26.

These two significant divisions are some indication of the temper of the House of Commons towards denominationalism, and should encourage the Opposition to persevere in their efforts to remove every vestige of sectarianism from the remainder of the Bill, and to renew their attack upon what is left of it in Clause 4 when the opportunity occurs at a later stage. The clause as amended now stands part of the Bill.

Part III. The Death Knell of School Boards.—This is the vital part of the Bill dealing with "Elementary Education." Clause 5 runs (or ran), as follows:—

The following sections of this part of this Act shall only apply within the area of a local authority for which it is adopted, and a local authority may adopt it for their area by a resolution of that authority.

This is the famous permissive clause of the Bill which left it to the local authority to say whether the Act should be adopted in their area or whether the School Board should remain. From the first there has been a pretty general expression of opinion adverse to the option, as it was felt that whatever system should be decided upon there ought to be one uniform system for the whole country; at the same time many important cities and towns were opposed to the abolition of their School Boards. But, as we pointed out a fortnight ago, it seemed inevitable that this permissive clause would have to be dropped when Mr. Balfour announced a grant of 7s. 6d. per head for children in schools under the local education authority. This, unless some special provision were made, would place the schools in areas in which the Act was not adopted at such a disadvantage that it was impossible to conceive that it could be allowed.

At the commencement of the debate on this clause Mr. Balfour declined to disclose the intention of the Government with respect to it, preferring to leave the question to the judgment of the House; and, though he was severely lectured for this course, The Times going so far as to say it was expected of the Leader of the House that he should lead, Mr. Bryce and others approved of the course taken, as it would give the Committee the opportunity of expressing its opinion.

An amendment to the effect that the clause should be dropped was then discussed, and it was urged that the adoption of the Act ought not to be left as an apple of discord among local authorities, but that the question ought to be settled by Parliament. The amendment was supported by some Liberals, who thought a uniform system would be most conducive to educational efficiency; and as the Cockerton judgment had shorn the School Boards of so many of their powers that it was scarcely worth while to maintain them. Mr. Balfour himself spoke in favour of the amendment. Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman, Sir William Harcourt, Sir Charles Dilke and other Liberals opposed the amendment as a blow at local self-government, and the death knell of the School Boards; Mr. Bryce also defended the clause on the ground that many County Councils were not prepared to undertake the onerous duties which the Act would impose upon them. The amendment was carried by a majority of 169, and the clause was then dropped.

Although the elimination of Clause 5 from the Bill practically sealed the fate of the School Boards throughout the country (London excepted), the actual decree of execution is contained in Clause 6:—

The local education authority shall throughout their area have the powers and duties of a school board and school attendance committee under the Elementary Education Acts, 1870 to 1900, and the control of all secular instruction in public elementary schools, whether provided by them or not, and school boards and school attendance committees shall be abolished in that area.

While deploring, for many reasons, the abolition of School Boards, we cannot overlook the fact that this clause for the first time brings the Voluntary schools under some measure of public control; it is a step in the right direction, and its consequences cannot yet be realised. Some denominationalists view it with alarm as the proverbial thin end of the wedge. It now remains for Parliament to determine that the constitution of the local education authority shall be such as to command the confidence of the public. If the control is effective, and if it is used to raise the standard of education, especially in the rural districts, it will be found that the innocent-looking clause, "whether provided by them or not," signalises the beginning of what may prove to be a much-wanted improvement in our educational system; and may indeed pave the way for a national system.

Clause 6 was on Wednesday added to the Bill, and its consideration is to be resumed on Monday. Controversy will become keener over the remaining clauses of this part of the Bill.

It is impossible to regard the extinction of the School Boards of England without unfeigned regret. For thirty years they have fostered elementary education and have redeemed the country from the disgrace of having no public system of education for the masses. They have covered the land with splendid schools manned by a staff of excellent teachers; they have raised the standard of education and done much to elevate the people. We do not overlook what has been done during the same period by the Voluntary schools; but the Boards have led the way, and have created a zeal for popular education before unknown. And they have shown that education may be essentially religious without being denominational. Over and over again ministers of all denominations have declared themselves satisfied with the religious teaching given in Board schools, though a few bigots like the Dean of St. Paul's have denounced it. If in time to come the authorities which are to supersede the School Boards shall be found to do more work and to do it better, as they ought to do, being invested with more extensive powers, the work of the School Boards will always be remembered with gratitude and justly honoured by all who have the cause of education at heart.

LORD ACTON.

I.

SINCE Lord Acton's lamented death my memory has been wandering back to the years 1867 and 1868, when I lived upon his property and in a house which belonged to him. I was a very young man then, and I must begin by disclaiming any title to his close and intimate acquaintance. Still, for some eighteen months I saw him very often, for I had a standing invitation to dine with him every Sunday, and I had many other opportunities of conversing with him. He was kind enough to give me the unrestricted use of his noble library. I wrote regularly for a Roman Catholic paper called the Chronicle, of which he was the proprietor and the directing spirit, though not the actual editor. He was said at that time to have in hand a history of English Roman Catholics. The book, so far as I know, was never written, but he had collected materials for it, and I do not think that I have forgotten anything he said, and he said much, on a subject which had, and still has, an absorbing fascination for me. But enough of myself; I may now, without further preface, proceed to set down on paper my remembrance of those happy days in the hope that what interests me so much may have some little interest for others also. Great changes have happened since 1867, and a type of English Romanism which was common then is now absolutely extinct.

The Old Roman Catholic Families.

Sir John Acton belonged to an ancient English family, and the baronetcy was, I think, of Charles the First's creation. The Actons were not, strictly speaking, hereditary Roman Catholics, for they had only become adherents of the Roman Church in the latter part of the eighteenth century, but of course the family had long before I knew anything of it taken its place among the landed gentry of the Roman communion. The bond which then united Roman Catholic families of the higher class was very close. They were knit together by disabilities which had debarred them from the universities and from public life. They had intermarried with each other; they had been educated at the same colleges, and the Anglo-Roman Church before the Irish immigration consisted almost entirely of county families and the tenants who in the old days of persecution had settled on their estates. Many of the old Roman Catholic gentry preserved with natural pride the hiding-place to which the priest retired in case of danger: the chapel was in or next the mansion, and the priest was at once private chaplain and responsible for the adherents of his church scattered over the neighbourhood.

Other Family Connections.

But besides the tie which bound him to a romantic past, to a society English through and through, and yet with a history and tradition which separated English Romanists from the great mass of their fellow-countrymen, Sir John had a far wider outlook than the rest of his co-religionists, and he enjoyed social and intellectual advantages which were in some respects unique. His paternal grandfather had been Prime Minister of Naples, where he himself was born in 1834, and had played a great part in European politics when Nelson was there. His uncle, Cardinal Acton, a man of high character and unaffected piety, was a prominent figure in Roman society at the time when Newman left the Church of England. Sir John Acton's mother was a Dalberg, a kinswoman of the famous Charles Theodor Dalberg, last Prince-Archbishop of Mainz and Archchancellor of the Holy Roman Empire, a liberal-minded prelate who adopted the reforming views of Joseph II., and cherished the dream of a National Catholic Church. His lofty aims and the unselfish purity of his life extorted praise even from his adversaries of the Papal party. Lady Acton, after the death of her husband, Sir Richard, married Lord Granville, and thus her son, besides his entrée to the best society of Italy and Germany (the latter connection being afterwards cemented by his own marriage with a lady from the great Bavarian house of Arco-Valley) had the further advantage of association with the politicians and literary men of the Whig party in England. He loved to talk of Macaulay and of his conversation, brilliant but tending to monologue, and of his astonishing feats of memory.

Early Education.

He received his early education at Oscott, near Birmingham, an institution then under Dr., afterwards Cardinal, Wiseman, who was for a short time Vicar-Apostolic of the Midland District. But, indeed, as I have often heard him say, it scarcely deserved the name of education. Wiseman was devoted to ecclesiastical affairs, and the system pursued at Oscott was, for intellectual purposes, as bad as bad could be. The college consisted of young men studying for the priesthood and known as "divines," along with boys intended for lay pursuits. These young laymen received almost the whole of their instruction from the "divines," with the natural result that the "divines" suffered by the distraction of teaching, while the lay boys and the "church" boys before they entered on their course of philosophy and theology were taught Greek and Latin by masters who were ludicrously destitute of classical knowledge. Sir John used to tell a story of a learned "divine" who corrected a boy for giving Catilina as the Latin equivalent of Catiline, and so making that conspirator a woman. After 1845 one or two Oxford converts joined the teaching staff, but there was no serious improvement till the college fell into the excellent hands of Dr. Northcote, a sound scholar and excellent administrator, who exercised an admirable influence over his pupils. Acton, however, had left Oscott before Dr. Northcote's advent and the dawn of better things. The Roman Catholic colleges were abodes of peace and happiness, but till very recently they were far behind as places of education. Cardinal Manning knew this very well, and was ready enough to state his opinion regardless of the offence which he sometimes gave. Roman Catholics were for the most part unconscious of the evils under which they suffered. We must remember that they had been shut out by no fault of their own from the main current of English life. Dr. Ward, with characteristic candour and, it must be added, with characteristic exaggeration, described a controversy between an English Protestant and an English Romanist as a fight between a civilised man and a barbarian.

With Döllinger in Germany.

His German connection secured young Acton a better fate. It was his good fortune to live for some years with Döllinger and study under him. Döllinger's orthodoxy was at that time unblemished; indeed, Heine had spoken of him as "Döllinger the black," i.e., the ultramontane. It is needless to speak of his profound learning. Acton led in his house an ascetic life, but the asceticism was for the sake of study, not of devotion. He studied, if I remember right, ten hours a day, and had but one brief annual holiday, taken in company with his master.

At Aldenham.

From this Continental sojourn Acton returned to the home of his ancestors with a learning uncommon at any time, and of a kind especially rare in those days, when German literature was far less familiar among us than it is now. He spoke and wrote German, French and Italian. German, indeed, was to him a mother tongue no less than English. He was thoroughly trained in mediæval and modern history, in the philosophy of politics and in historical theology. The fine property of Aldenham, situated in one of the most beautiful parts of England, had become his by his father's early death, and he entered into full possession after a long minority. He began at once to collect a library which was, I suppose, the best private library in England. Not that it contained rare or curious books; for such things its owner did not care. It was meant for use, and the volumes were bound or half-bound in the plainest fashion. They were placed in a huge room attached to the mansion and constructed with staircases and galleries. It received continual additions, and its owner never relaxed the studious habits which he had learned abroad.

The common pursuits of an English country gentleman had no charm for him, though he was kindly and hospitable and lived on good terms with his neighbours. But his chief delight was in the company of learned men, and especially learned Roman Catholics. Let me mention two of them whom I knew well; one Acton used to call the "most learned of English priests," the other "the most learned of Englishmen."

J. B. Morris.

The priest in question was the Rev. J. B. Morris. He had been a Fellow of Exeter and Assistant Professor of Hebrew at Oxford. He was guileless as a child, a devout man of a mystical turn of mind, and, I must add, as helpless and unpractical as a child. For some years he found refuge from a world which was too much for him as chaplain at Aldenham. His learning was portentous. He had published translations of Syriac poems by St. Ephraem with notes which are a marvel of erudition; he was deeply read in Rabbinical and Patristic literature and in the schoolmen, especially in Scotus and his followers. He had a genuine interest in philology: otherwise the world of modern scholarship was to him absolutely unknown. "What are the Synoptic Gospels?" was the question he once asked a young cleric who had spoken of them in his hearing.

Le Page Renouf.

A very different man was Le Page Renouf, Acton's "most learned Englishman." Everybody knows of his achievements in Egyptology, a branch of learning which he pursued in the scanty leisure left by the scrupulous discharge of his duties as inspector of schools. But he was also a Patristic scholar of high rank, as he showed by his pamphlets on the case of Pope Honorius, written and published to avert the definition of Papal infallibility at the Vatican Council. He was a singularly modest and kind-hearted man. He had been an undergraduate at Pembroke College, Oxford, and had joined the Roman communion before Newman, and before taking his degree. He passed to a better life a few years ago, greatly respected and loved.

Parties in the Church.

It was not till about 1860 that Sir John came into serious conflict with ecclesiastical authority. We may describe the English Romanism of that day as divided into three parties. Most prominent and best known to the general public were the converts from the national Church who had followed Newman in 1845 or Manning in 1851. They, as a rule, represented the Italian and Papal influence in England. They had thrown themselves with reckless enthusiasm into the Papal system, and they occupied the strange position of acting as missionaries not only to their Anglican fellow-countrymen, the adherents of the really ancient and Catholic Church, but also to hereditary Romanists. For to the convert on fire with proselytising zeal the old Roman Catholic seemed cold, insular, and half-Protestant. Faber introduced devotions and hymns to the Precious Blood, the Blessed Virgin and the Saints which were strongly reprobated in the communion which he had joined. The oratorian lives of the Saints shocked old-fashioned people by their report of saintly self-torture over which the discreet Alban Butler* had prudently thrown a veil. The converts, too, were generally extravagant advocates of Papal infallibility and of the temporal power, besides being free and outspoken in their defence of religious persecution. Wiseman had in many ways identified himself with this Papal contingent, though he was too large-hearted and tolerant to be quite one with them. On the other hand, Newman soon ceased to approve the extravagance of the men who had crossed the Rubicon with him. He fell back into a more sober and English line, and thus it came to pass that while he was notoriously on very distant terms with Manning and Faber, a reciprocal attachment arose between him and the older Romanists. Then there was the mass of English Romanists already described by implication. The priests who had been born in the Roman fold were quiet and eminently respectable men. The older clergy had all been bred Gallicans, and very few of them were ever enthusiastic Papalists. Some were good archæologists and historians. I may mention Dr. Rock, Mr. Kirk, Mr. Berington, Mr. Oliver, Mr. Tierney, and, above all, Dr. Lingard. Most of them, however, were by no means scholarlike. They were staunch in their belief, and held fast to the Council of Trent and the creed of Pius IV. Nor were they at all averse to controversy when occasion arose. But they were not disposed to offer their enemies a wide target, and accordingly they limited themselves to their bond. They were slow to accept anything which had not been defined as an article of faith. Usually there were no images in their chapels except the crucifix. They disliked "new devotions" and sometimes denounced them as Methodistical or even idolatrous. The present writer heard a priest of the old school preach Sunday after Sunday for eighteen months, and to the best of his recollection there was not one devotional allusion to the Virgin Mother of our Lord. "In my young days," said this priest, "we were so busy explaining what the Blessed Virgin was not, that we had no time to say what she was." Very often the sermons were dry moral essays of a kind well known in the Church of England before the Evangelical revival. One day during the excitement of the Papal aggression, some mischievous person had written "No Popery" on the wall of the Warwick-street Chapel, then the most fashionable centre of Romanist worship in London. "That," said an Oxford convert, "is a very accurate account of the place." Of converts the hereditary Roman priests and laymen had a profound distrust. It was a favourite maxim of theirs that it took "three generations to make a Catholic." They disliked the trouble they gave by their fussiness, their theological and devotional eccentricities, and their tendency to hysterical sentiment. Thoroughly patriotic themselves, they resented that un-English feeling which led a convert peer to make the silly statement that he was "a Catholic first and an Englishman second." Of course these objections do not apply to converts before the famous '45: the converts previous to the Oxford movement were as "Old Catholic" as the "Old Catholics" themselves.

WILLIAM ADDIS.

(To be concluded.)

* The first edition of Butler's "Lives of the Saints" appeared in 1745, and the book is still widely and deservedly popular. "The learning," said Gibbon, "is his own, the prejudices are those of his profession." The words were addressed to Charles Butler, the nephew of Alban. This latter wrote "Memoirs of English, Irish, and Scottish Catholics," had a famous controversy with Southey, and died a very old man in 1832.

LITERATURE.

JOHN BROWN.*

ENTHUSIASM for the mission of a hero and admiration for his character are needed by one who would write with success the story of his life. The writer of this appreciative biography possesses both these qualifications, nevertheless he tells us in his preface that he "cannot help expressing his feeling of the immense distance which separates the picture he attempts from the conception in his own mind of what is necessary to an adequate and worthy presentation of a noble career." "Such as it is," he adds, "he offers it to all sympathetic readers, who, in an age tainted with selfishness and greed, still preserve a love of all heroic endeavour and unselfish sacrifice in the service of humanity."

The lament that a King, or a generation, has arisen that "knows not Joseph" is by no means confined to ancient days. As time passes, we of the present age, welcome on the world's stage fresh scenes and actors, but we are apt also to sigh for old days and old deeds, and to fear that the brave souls so famous in our youth are in a fair way to be forgotten. With the desire that this shall not be the case, concerning the early martyr in the anti-slavery cause "whose name was on the lips and whose spirit was in the hearts of the sturdy Northeners who marched to victory through long years of bloody warfare," our author has written this book.

The first chapter entitled "What is Slavery?" is intended to help readers to realize the powerful influences which decided John Brown's career. With this end in view Mr. Newton was doubtless wise in depicting horrors typical of the sufferings endured by multitudes in the Southern plantations of the United States; yet, though from a moral point of view, slavery was an unmitigated evil to both the Black and White races, there was another aspect of the slave system which shows us that, at times, the tie between owner and slave was of quite an opposite character to that of the brutal pictures which he so realistically depicts, and one queries, therefore, whether, in this chapter, Mr. Newton gives a complete answer to the question he asks.

In the next chapter—"The State and Slavery"—we have a clear history of the course of events from the Missouri Compromise in 1820 to the outbreak of the Civil War in 1861, Readers to whom the history of those forty years may not be entirely familiar will be able to realise the struggle which went on to maintain the balance of power between the Slave and Free States, the eager efforts on both sides to claim new territory, the conciliations and compromises on the part of the North, and the growing desire of Southerners for the repeal of the Union. We enter on the thrilling story of which Captain John Brown is the hero, and which is told so graphically in the succeeding ten chapters, after the passing of the Kansas-Nebraska Act in 1854 when the contest for Kansas began.

But first, John Brown's boyhood claims attention, and we learn that he came of Puritan stock, directly descended from one of the Pilgrim Fathers, who had bequeathed to his posterity a hatred of oppression and wrong. The bare-footed, fearless little lad passed his early years, for the most part, in wild regions of Ohio. Meanwhile, certain experiences impressed on his mind a hatred of military life and a resolution never to take part in war unless it were a war for liberty. As time passed, other incidents connected with the miseries on a slave plantation turned the eager youth into a red-hot Abolitionist, who "began to look upon himself as one who held a commission direct from God to act against slavery."

The news that a well-known New York philanthropist, named Gerrit Smith, was offering tracts of land among the Adirondack mountains for cultivation by escaped slaves, led to a crisis in his life. John Brown, always on the watch for Heaven-sent opportunities, in which he firmly believed, hearing that a dishonest surveyor threatened the new settlement with ruin, sent the following proposal to Mr. Smith:—

* "Captain John Brown, of Harper's Ferry." By John Newton. Lives worth Living Series of Popular Biographies. T. Fisher Unwin. 3s. 6d.

I see by the newspapers that you have offered so many acres of wild land to each of the coloured men on condition that they will cultivate them. Now they are mostly inexperienced in this sort of work and unused to the climate, while I am familiar with both. I propose, therefore, to take a farm there myself, clear and plant it, showing the negroes how such work should be done. I will also employ some of them on my land and will look after them in all ways, and be a kind of father to them.

This offer was accepted, and John Brown, with his wife and ten children went, moved by philanthropy, to take up his abode in North Elba, of which a description is given.

The farm is a wild place, cold and bleak. It is too cold to raise corn, indeed they can scarcely in the most favourable seasons obtain a few ears for roasting. Stock must be wintered for nearly six months every year. They never raise anything to sell off that farm except a few fleeces. It was well, they said, if they raised their own provisions, and could spin their own wool for clothing.

In such surroundings we find our hero at nearly fifty years of age. He has trained up round him "a band of enthusiasts and a family of heroes, the whole scheme of whose lives was formed to promote one object, while those who married into the family caught the same single-eyed devotion also. The sons eagerly seconded their father." We learn of John Brown that he rose early and worked late—one of his favourite sayings was—"Action, action, action, we have but one life to live." A man of simple, practical religion, he held that genuine love of God must be shown by goodwill to men—his religious principles were summed up in the Golden Rule, and in his eyes slave-holding was the cardinal sin. As one reads the story of his life in his lonely settlement, the picture rises before one of a strong, tender-hearted countryman filled with passionate love for home and devotion to wife and family, and underlying all other qualities, deepest pity for the suffering of his fellow-men, so deep that there was "a constant ringing in his years of the despairing cry of millions whose woes none but God knows."

Into the last four years are crowded the most thrilling events and deeds of this heroic life, and were it not for the light which the preceding comparatively uneventful half century throws upon his character, the space given here to this portion of the biography would be out of due proportion. In Chapter V. we enter upon "the struggle for Kansas" and hear how John Brown's sons go to settle there among the "Free-soilers," hoping to cultivate the land in peace, and to help to keep it as a Free State. But news goes back to the old home of the raids of Border-ruffians from neighbouring slave states—"murderers, plunderers and pro-slavery partisans who treated the Free State people as if they were conquered slaves."

There is no space to tell in detail how, in the course of events, John Brown became the chosen leader of a knot of earnest anti-slavery champions, and how the man who hated war with all his heart entered upon what he believed was a holy crusade against wrong, how, at length, his name carried with it terror among men who were thirsting for his blood.

Yet, "determined as he was in the fight, the tender humanity of the man was never obliterated, and it comes as a ray of sunshine after a terrible storm to learn that out of his poverty he carefully supported the widow of a pro-slavery man who was killed, until her friends came to take her away."

It seems to have been, according to Mr. Newton, in 1857 that the idea of an armed attack upon slavery began to take practical shape in Brown's mind. His object was not revolution, but slave emancipation, and the plan of seizing Harper's Ferry was gradually matured.

Among several other illustrations the book contains views of Harper's Ferry lying on the hillside above the broad bend of the Potomac river. It is a thrilling narrative which describes how the little band of men—scarcely more than a score—followed Captain John Brown on his desperate enterprise. It was his hope to rouse the nation by this sudden attack, and that the coloured people would flock round his standard when raised at Harper's Ferry. Then his righteous victory was sure. Some 16 pages tell the tale of how plans miscarried, and how a few hours saw the end, with the brave leader lying wounded in Charleston gaol.

The history of the trial and the martyrdom, including many letters to his wife and descriptions of his heroic bearing during captavity are full of pathetic and beautiful incidents. Many of his sayings during imprisonment are quoted, e.g.:—

I think I cannot better serve the cause I love so much than to die for it, and in my death I may do more than in my life. I sleep as peacefully as an infant, or if I am wakeful, glad thoughts come to me. The sentence they have pronounced against me does not disturb me in the least. It is not the first time I have looked death in the face. . . I am endeavouring to get ready for another field of action where no defeat befals the truly brave.

Probably most readers are familiar with the incidents of Brown's execution—how with bright, serene countenance he appeared like a victorious hero going to his reward, and how he stooped, as he went to death, to kiss the little negro child, an act illustrative of his character through life. Not so well known is the description of the funeral on the lonely hill side, where in the midst of his family he was laid to rest in a spot near his home, while the hymn with which he had been used to rock his children to sleep, was sung around his grave. Wendell Phillips's fine address on the occasion is given, and in the concluding chapter and elsewhere we have many testimonies to the noble character and life by Emerson, Garrison, Theodore Parker, Alcott, Thoreau, and other writers.

This biography will doubtless find numbers of sympathetic readers, and Mr. Newton is only true to history when he reminds us of the great revulsion of feeling which took place in the United States whereby "John Brown, denounced as a fanatic and madman rose to the position of a hero and martyr."

FRANCES E. COOKE.

"AFTER THIS MANNER."*

WE are glad that Mr. Wallace had the courage which it must undoubtedly have required to add another to the multitude of expositions of the Lord's Prayer. In reading these pages, we feel that the author has not only read and thought, but seen and observed much; we have a living voice, addressing human notes to human needs, using an admirable directness, and often striking out the terse, vivid phrase that drives a lesson home where a more elaborate diction would fail of its effect. Sometimes, indeed, we feel that a point has been merely suggested, and might with advantage have received fuller treatment; but this, if a fault, is such an unusual one in sermons, that many will think of it as "a mistake on the right side." Mr. Wallace, in this book at any rate, is so much concerned with practice that it would be hard to guess at his precise theological standpoint, unless we may do so from a passage where he says that "Jesus Christ represented God." But it is not for theology that we look in these pages so much as for a broad, manly, work-a-day religion, and in this search we shall not be disappointed, while we find a special source of pleasure in the telling illustrations liberally—but not too liberally—employed by the preacher. We must not close this brief notice of a fresh and stimulating little volume without quoting at random one or two of the wise and happy sayings we marked in reading: "Jesus says, 'I am the door.' We enter, and, passing through the vestibule, find Fatherhood in every room of the house." "It has come to pass that men mostly think of submission to the will of God as an eminently disagreeable thing, but that is not the case. His will is that we should obey His laws, and thus avoid a great many disagreeable things." "The Church that ventures to assert that it possesses all the truth is certainly possessed of the spirit of impertinence, if not of the spirit of truthfulness." "As water running over gravel is purified, so our minds have been clarified through our petitions [in the earlier part of the Prayer] on behalf of others." "If we cannot forgive our brother who has wronged us, there may be something wrong with him, but there is a great deal more wrong with us." "Our temptations depend very largely upon the difference in our education, environment, and temperament. To some, a change of the weather is a temptation." "Take care of the acts, and the results will take care of themselves." We cordially recommend the book to our readers. J. W.

HISTORICAL ROMANCE.*

A DESCRIPTIVE list of historical tales is no novelty; but Mr. Nield's book is a guide to the best historical fiction rather than a catalogue of all the historical tales, and as such it claims originality.

The Introduction explains the principles on which the selection has been made. Some books are omitted for deficiency in literary style or in narrative interest, others as being too didactic. In the case of a prolific writer of uneven power, and of a period copiously illustrated by various writers, the best tales are selected, whilst occasionally a story below the usual standard is admitted because it deals with a period otherwise unrepresented. The question of historical accuracy or inaccuracy is not considered.

* "Guide to the Best Historical Novels and Tales." By Jonathan Nield. London: Elkin Mathews. 5s.

As Mr. Nield says, "The historical novel exists primarily as fiction." Its first condition of success is that it should be a good story. His definition of the historical novel is a simple one—"A novel is rendered 'historical' by the introduction of dates, personages, and events to which identification can be readily given." The introduction of verifiable personages and events in obscure lives is insufficient to constitute a novel historical. They must be sufficiently important to be easily recognisable. Thus Stevenson's "Treasure Island," though it introduces veritable figures of the eighteenth century, is not admitted as within the domain of historical romance proper. This book is relegated to the "supplementary list of notable novels, which, while not strictly 'historical,' in some way represent bygone periods." This short supplementary list, including many masterpieces in our literature, is particularly interesting.

The lists are arranged in tabular form in four columns, giving title, author, publisher, and subject. Whilst the order is chronological on the whole, absolute accuracy in this respect is occasionally disregarded for the sake of the grouping.

In the main list the Pre-Christian Era is illustrated by a dozen and a half tales, including Marion Crawford's "Zoroaster," Church's "Stories of Greece, Rome, and Palestine," and some of George Ebers' Egyptian Tales. For the first century there are about the same number of entries, including "Philochristus," "Ben Hur," "Quo Vadis," "Darkness and Dawn," and "The Last Days of Pompeii," besides various other stories of early Christianity.

There is some entry for Britain in nearly all of the early centuries, until in the ninth century under the heading of "Alfred and His Times," England takes a prominent place in the list. From the time of the Norman Conquest the story of our English History is continuous, entries for other countries being copiously interspersed.

In making a selection from foreign historical fiction Mr. Nield has done no more, he says, than include the leading examples, most of which are accessible in translations. Amongst the foreign writers represented are Auerbach, Balzac, Erckmann-Chatrian, Daudet, Dumas, Ebers, Karl Emil Franzos, Victor Hugo, Jokai, Saintine, George Sand, Tolstoy, and Zola.

The brevity and clearness of the headings in the subject column enables us to follow out any special subject through the successive centuries. We may trace the progress of Christianity in different countries, we may trace the religious development of different nations through stories of the Crusaders, the Albigenses, the Lollards, the Hussites, the Huguenots, the Pilgrim Fathers, the Covenanters, the Friends, &c. Students of literature may find tales relating to Sir Thomas More, Cranmer, Sir Walter Raleigh, Sir Philip Sidney, Shakespeare, George Herbert, Milton, Sir Thomas Browne, Dean Swift, Goldsmith, Sheridan, and Dr. Johnson. Lovers of the arts may find fiction introducing Leonardo da Vinci, Vandyck, Purcell the composer, Handel, Sir Joshua Reynolds, Angelica Kauffmann, Mozart, and Romney.

In the chronological method of arrangement old favourites are invested with new interest. The historical setting becomes more prominent, and strange comrades are brought into juxtaposition. "Ivanhoe" is next to "Richard Yea and Nay," "Kenilworth" to "Westward Ho!" "The Last of the Mohicans" to "Seats of the Mighty"; "Romola," "Notre Dame" and "Cloister and the Hearth" follow one another; Napoleon's Russian Campaign brings together Tolstoy, Charlotte M. Yonge and Henty; under the Jacobites we find G. Norway, Scott, Besant, J. H. Findlater and Sarah Tytler.

No one work of fiction could be more suggestive of strong contrasts in life and in views of life than this list of Mr. Nield's, and identity of subject only emphasises these contrasts.

The section of the book that will probably be most freely subjected to criticism is the "Suggested Courses of Reading for Young People," two lists covering English History from the Norman Conquest onwards, for boys and girls, respectively. Parents, teachers, and others interested in the tastes and needs of young people, including those most concerned—the young people themselves—will turn with special curiosity to this section to see whether favourite authors and favourite books are included, and whether they are recommended to boys, to girls, or to both. The majority would agree with Mr. Nield in appropriating the stories of Sarah Tytler, Emma Marshall, Grace Aguilar, and Jane Porter to the girls; and would assign to the boys the stories of Herbert Maxwell, Conan Doyle, and Harrison Ainsworth. But some surprise will be felt at the omission from the boys' list of Edna Lyall's "In the Golden Days," &c. Dickens, Lytton, G. P. R. James, Mark Twain, and Besant are equally represented in the two lists, as are also Scott, Charles Kingsley, and Stevenson, with the exception of "Rob Roy," "Hereward," and "The Black Arrow," recommended to the boys only. Girls who prefer a larger proportion of books of adventure, will take the boys' list rather than their own. For it is in the proportion of the different kinds of books selected that these two lists are distinguished. The girls have two volumes of Henty to the boys' eleven, whilst the boys have two volumes of Charlotte M. Yonge to the girls' seven. The omission of the very popular "Caged Lion" from both these lists for young readers is perhaps due to the inaccurate description attached to it in the general list. "Scotland in Early Fifteenth Century" is misleading, for, whilst the story opens and closes in Scotland, and the hero is Scotch, the greater part of the story treats of the English Court in England and in France, and of the English camp in France. King Henry V. is as conspicuous and as interesting a figure as the Caged Lion himself, the nominally captive James of Scotland, and it is by contrast to the better condition of England at the same period that the picture of anarchy and violence in Scotland is so impressive. But, however freely Mr. Nield's judgment may be questioned in particular instances, his list for juvenile readers will no doubt, on the whole, prove suggestive and useful.

To students of literature the Bibliography at the end will prove specially attractive. Mr. Nield gives a list, in order of publication, of all the writings which deal directly with the subject of Historical Romance—articles in magazines and reviews, lectures, essays, library catalogues, &c., from the time of Scott, the creator of historical fiction, down to the current year. So admirable is the arrangement of the volume, and so interesting its contents that Mr. Nield has left little to be desired, unless it were an index of authors to facilitate the locating of any particular volume.

This book should be in every library, whilst real lovers of historical romance, on once becoming acquainted with it, will wish to possess a copy of the Guide for constant use.

To the elders this book will recall past pleasures in the company of familiar friends in romance. To the young it will call up visions of delightful reading in the future. And if we look to the best historical fiction for the imaginative interpretation of life in the past, its great personages, events and movements, all leading up to our own time, Mr. Nield's "Guide" may prove a key to unlock for us the moving drama of the world's history.

OBITUARY.

MISS LAMPORT, OF LANCASTER.

NEARLY a hundred years ago, the Rev. William Lamport, then a young man of thirty-two, came to Lancaster to be minister of the old English "Presbyterian" Chapel in St. Nicholas street, and there, in the chapel house, his children were born—William, the eldest son, who made for himself so distinguished a career as a shipowner in Liverpool, founder of the well-known firm of Lamport and Holt, whose death in 1874 was a heavy blow to our churches and to the town of which he was one of the most influential citizens; Charles and Edward, who as old men have both passed away within the last three months, and Frances Noble, the only daughter, who bore her mother's name, and to whom, the last of her generation, the summons has now come.

With Lancaster Miss Lamport's name will always be associated, and the news of her death on Wednesday week, in her eighty-first year, will have brought sorrow to a wide circle of friends, and wakened many happy and grateful memories. Born in October, 1821, she removed with her parents to Manchester before she was ten years old, but after Mr. Lamport's death in 1848, returned with her mother to Lancaster, and seventeen years later was left alone at Greenfield, the house which remained her home to the end.

A delicate child, and hampered all her life by physical weakness, she was yet one of those women of whom one thinks as always brave and beautiful, bearing her own burdens uncomplainingly, with a spirit so bright, so perfectly unselfish and wonderfully kind, with keen intelligence and yet the tenderest sympathy, a lover of her garden and of all dumb creatures, but most of all a helper and encourager of the needy and the lonely, a constant deviser of pleasant and kindly things, one whose gifts were always beautiful in the manner of the giving, a true and generous friend. In her early life, the daughter of a Unitarian minister, she knew the pinch of straitened circumstances, and thus found an added delight when her brother's prosperity brought to her also ampler means in the generous kindness in which in innumerable ways she found the constant occupation of her quiet life. No chronicle of her good deeds is possible, but they rise up now and call her blessed.

Of unaffected modesty, she was yet possessed of no mean culture, she delighted in all beautiful things, and had especially a fine taste in poetry and a wonderfully ready memory. From her Manchester days she had grateful remembrance of the early influence of Mr. John James Tayler and Mr. Gaskell over her life, for Dr. Martineau and Mr. Thom she had a profound veneration, and to the late Daniel Gaskell, of Lupset Hall, near Wakefield, where she was a frequent visitor, she owed much of her familiarity with English literature.

Among the interests of her life the Lancaster Chapel, with which her earliest years were associated, held to the last a foremost place. To its successive ministers she was a warm and constant friend, and many a visitor, coming there to preach, enjoyed her ever ready hospitality. How much she did for the Chapel, and for many members of the congregation in quiet ways, as for many of the humble folk of the town, can never be told. Her's was the loveliest spirit of a true Christian charity. Her closest friends knew best how beautiful it was.

Death came to her peacefully on July 9, after a brief illness, and sorrow is silenced in the thought of her great gain. After cremation at Manchester on Saturday, the funeral was at the Lancaster Cemetery on Monday, and in the evening a memorial service was held in the St. Nicholas-street Chapel. Both services were conducted by the Rev. J. C. Pollard, the present minister of the Chapel, with the assistance of the Rev. Rudolf Davis, of Evesham. At the evening service Mr. Pollard gave an address, in which he dwelt with much feeling on the leading features of Miss Lamport's character, and said very happily that her's was, indeed,

> A heart at leisure from itself
> To soothe and sympathise.

The whole address is published in this week's Lancaster Guardian.

THE REV. EDGAR SOLLY ANTHONY.

THE Rev. E. S. Anthony, M.A., B.D., whose sudden death we briefly noticed last week, was the eldest surviving son of the late Samuel Hollis Anthony, of "Wynches," Much Hadham, Herts, and was born at Smyrna in 1853. Coming of a sturdy Dissenting ancestry, our late friend was connected with many of the families whose names are as household words in Unitarian circles, amongst his near connections being the Shaens, the Sollys, and the Listers, and some others whose names were better known a generation ago than now. He was at first intended for the engineering profession, and after attending at the School of Mines in London was articled to an engineering firm in Leeds. While at Leeds he came under the influence of the Rev. Dendy Agate, at that time minister of Hunslet Chapel, and after working first as superintendent of Hunslet Sunday-school and then as lay preacher he definitely relinquished the engineering profession and entered himself as a student of St. Andrews University with a view to preparing himself for the ministry. He graduated as M.A. in 1881, and then, after some little time spent in travel in South-Eastern Europe and Asia Minor, entered for the divinity course at Manchester New College under Dr. Martineau. On entering the ministry he became assistant to the late Rev. Robert Spears (of Highgate), and afterwards held pastorates at Raloo, Bury St. Edmunds and Lydgate successively, and then after a short break spent at "Wynches" (which he inherited from his aunt in 1895), he accepted the charge at Poole in 1896. Prior to this, however, he had resumed his studies for a while and taken the degree of B.D. at his old university. He was also made an honorary member of the St. Andrews Classical Society—the highest honour it was in the power of his fellow-members to bestow upon him.

As a minister he was scrupulously zealous in the performance of every duty. He was an ardent worker in the cause of temperance, and was always ready to associate himself with every movement of an educational or philanthropic character in the neighbourhood in which he lived, and for the past three years was an active member of the Poole Technical Instruction Committee. Singularly retiring in manner, he was yet sturdy in principle, and thoroughly outspoken and frank when he deemed outspokenness to be necessary.

His sermons were simple and direct appeals to live the higher life, and the perfect life in Christ Jesus was the ideal he ever kept before his hearers.

Of his life in the sacred circle of the family and the home, this is not the place to speak. It is enough to say that to those who knew him best the story of his life may be summed up in the old Scripture phrase, "He walked with God, and was not, for God took him."

Mr. Anthony was married in 1890 to Miss A. L. Holden, daughter of the Rev. R. Holden (of Kirkstead), whom he leaves with three young children to mourn his loss. On Sunday morning last a memorial service was conducted in Hill-street Church by the Rev. C. C. Coe, of Bournemouth, when there was a good congregation who were deeply moved by the preacher's earnest and sympathetic words.

E. J. W.

I ENVY no quality of the mind or intellect in others; be it genius, power, wit or fancy: but I should prefer a firm religious faith to every other blessing, for it makes life a discipline of goodness, creates new hopes when all earthly hopes vanish, and throws over the decay, the destruction of existence, the most gorgeous of all lights, awakens life even in death, and from corruption and decay calls up beauty and divinity, makes an instrument of torture and shame the ladder of ascent to Paradise, and, far above all combinations of earthly hopes, calls up the most delightful visions of palms and amaranths, the gardens of the blest, the security of everlasting joys, where the sensualist and the sceptic view only gloom, decay, annihilation, and despair.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

A Song of Summer.

SING me a song of summer,
Little brown birdie, I pray;
Pour forth your notes of gladness
Just in your own bonnie way.
"Tweet, tweet, tweet, tweet!
Summer is sweet!
Blue is the sky
Whither we fly.
Soft blows the breeze
Over the lees,
Wafting this way
The scent of the hay.
Up in our tree
Happy are we.
Summer is sweet,
Tweet, tweet, tweet, tweet!"

Sing me a song of summer,
Merry wee brook, as you run
Over the pretty round pebbles,
Reflecting the golden sun.
"Bubble, babble, babble, bubble!
On I go and know not trouble.
Always busy, angry never
But in stormy windy weather.
Now the sun is gladness bringing,
All the land with joy is singing;
On my banks the flowers are growing,
Bright with many colours glowing;
Graceful ferns and feathery grasses
Rustle as the soft wind passes.
My clear waters sink all trouble,
Bubble, babble, babble, bubble!"

Sing me a song of summer,
I pray you, oh, gentle rain;
Fain would I catch your music,
Which falls like a sweet refrain.
"Drip, drop, drip, drop, drip,
Thirsty flowers sip
New life when we fall,
For we bring to all
Coolness from the heat
And a fragrance sweet.
We keep all things clean,
Make the grass more green,
Help the trees to grow,
Cause the streams to flow,
Wet the earth's parched lips
With our drip, drop, drip."

Sing me a song of summer,
Zephyr, thou soft western breeze;
What are the thoughts you whisper
So sweetly among the trees?
"Our song is soft and dreamy,
A lullaby of rest;
Our hushing soothes the weary
And comforts the oppressed.
It stills the heart's wild beating,
It eases inward pain;
It gently tells the troubled
'That sunshine follows rain.'
The secrets of th' Eternal,
The peace that giveth rest,
Is heard in mystic whispers
Like the breathing of the blest."

Fill my heart with your singing,
Summer, sweet Queen of the year,
Pour into me thy beauty,
And bring all thy music near.
Give me the birdie's gladness,
The streamlet's untroubled glee,
Let the gentle song of the raindrop
Awaken an echo in me.
Breathe on my soul, O, zephyr,
The message of Love Divine,
That when the summer fadeth
Its gladness shall yet be mine.

CONTENTIO VERITATIS.

THE bare acceptance of the critical attitude towards the Bible has as yet very imperfectly permeated the bulk of the clergy, or even the instructed religious laity; while very little has been done to modify, except by a silence which often escapes notice, the ordinary religious instruction of pulpit, Bible-class, and Sunday-school. Meanwhile, especially among younger men and women of fair education, there is a wide-spread unsettlement and uneasiness. There is a vague feeling that the old Orthodoxy is impossible; people suspect that much that was once commonly believed is no longer tenable, but they do not yet know how much, nor by what it is to be replaced.

So write six Oxford Tutors in the preface to their volume of "Essays in Constructive Theology," the title of which stands at the head of this article.* For themselves, as Christians and Churchmen, no less than as lovers of truth, they are thankful for the new light which science and criticism have within the last half century thrown upon religious problems; they are agreed that scientific and critical methods must be applied to such questions, and that authority ought not to attempt to crush or stifle inquiry. United in a heartfelt loyalty to CHRIST, and to the fundamental ideas of Christianity, they are yet convinced that a considerable restatement, and even reconstruction, of certain parts of the religious teaching of the Church is inevitable, and in these essays they seek to indicate the lines which such a reconstruction must follow. They have been impelled to this undertaking by their experience as tutors at Oxford, in personal intercourse with a large number of young men, seeing how the great questions of religion as presented by the Church of England affect the mind of the rising generation, deterring so many thoughtful and earnest men from taking Orders; and their hope is to offer such a restatement of the essentials of religion as shall remove the difficulties of thoughtful minds, and show once more that reason and faith are at one in striving for the truth.

They ask that their book shall not be taken as the manifesto of a party, since each writer is solely responsible for his own essay, and among them are men of various sympathies as regards the great historic parties in the Church. The fact is that the liberalising of thought has proceeded both among High Churchmen and Evangelicals, and if a distinct Broad Church party can no longer be recognised it is because the leavening influence has extended beyond the confines of any party. On this point the six essayists are quite explicit. "They believe that if liberal theology is to prosper in its work of repairing the breaches in our walls it must be by influencing both the Catholic and the Protestant elements in the Church—elements which are too deeply rooted in the history of the English Church, and, perhaps, even in the constitution of human nature, to be either fused or superseded."

The Guardian received this volume with the respect due to the position, the high culture, and the manifest religious earnestness of the writers, and yet expressed a grave misgiving that some at least of the essayists had surrendered far too much, and were endangering fundamental truths of Catholic Christianity. There has been no outcry such as followed the publication of the famous "Essays and Reviews" of forty years ago; the temper of the times would forbid it, even if the volume had been far more provocative and radical than it is; nor has it wakened the widespread interest of the much more recent "Lux Mundi" essays, with their striking concessions to modern thought on the part of pronounced High Churchmen; yet this is a book of great significance, to be very cordially welcomed as a sign of the far-reaching progress of earnest liberal thinking within the Church, and the Guardian, from its own point of view as a defender of the old dogmatic entrenchments, is no doubt justified in its misgivings.

There are seven essays in the volume, the Rev. W. R. INGE contributing two, one on "The Person of Christ," the other on "The Sacraments." The other five tutors each contribute one essay, the first, by Dr. HASTINGS RASHDALL, of New College, being on "The Ultimate Basis of Theism." Readers who are familiar with Dr. RASHDALL'S volume of University sermons, "Doctrine and Development," will turn with keen interest to this essay, and will not be surprised to find passages in it which may well make the Guardian look grave. It contains a lucid exposition of the idealist method of thought, establishing the common-sense conviction that matter can only have its origin in spirit, and that GOD is Spirit, and not Mind only, but Will. A rational theism the essay earnestly defends as the basis of Christianity, and if Dr. RASHDALL proceeds to suggest a rational doctrine of the Trinity it would appear to be only that "GOD is essentially Power, Wisdom, and Will," He is the Union of Power, Wisdom, and Goodness, the will for the good springing from the union of Power with Wisdom." And, as to the doctrine of the Incarnation, "the divine Logos (or Wisdom) present in all souls to some extent and in some degree was pre-eminently present in the human soul of CHRIST."

If an actual historical person is actually pronounced by the moral and the religious consciousness to embody the highest ideal of human life and of the true relation between God and man, such a person may be regarded on this ground alone as in a unique sense a revelation of God.

Dr. RASHDALL adds some thoughtful notes on the subject of miracle, belief in which, in his view, is clearly not essential to Christian faith; and his general position is well indicated by these closing sentences of his essay:—

We may be quite confident that for minds which have once appreciated the principles of historical criticism, or minds affected by the diffused scepticism which has sprung from historical criticism, neither religious faith in general, nor any doctrine of primary importance, will ever depend mainly upon the evidence of abnormal events recorded to have happened in the remote past. Criticism must be wholly free; though when it is seen that faith is independent of miracles, it may become less destructive on one side and less desperately apologetic on the other. Belief in God will rest in the long run upon the instinctive rejection of materialism by the common-sense of mankind, confirmed by the reflective analysis of the philosopher. Belief in His goodness will rest upon the testimony of the moral consciousness. For minds which dare not explain away or minimise the presence of evil in human life, belief in immortality will be a corollary of that goodness.

Belief in Christ as the supreme, unique Revealer of God will rest upon the testimony of the same moral consciousness, recognising and welcoming its own ideal in Him. "No man can say that Jesus is Lord but by the Holy Ghost." "He that is of the light cometh to the light."

Of the other essays, that on "The Teaching of Christ," by the Rev. H. L. WILD, of St. Edmunds Hall, and that on "Modern Criticism and the New Testament," by the Rev. W. C. ALLEN, of Exeter College, will reward the most careful study, and, indeed, the same may be said of the whole volume; but we must be content here with a brief reference to Mr. INGE'S essay on "The Person of Christ."

The doctrine of the Incarnation is to Mr. INGE the centre of Christian revelation, and his treatment of it is full of interest even for one who remains unconvinced. The doctrine, he admits, was not held in its completeness in the earliest age of the Church. The full comprehension of it came afterwards.

* "Contentio Veritatis: Essays in Constructive Theology," by Six Oxford Tutors. Murray. 12s. net.

"The doctrine of the Divinity of CHRIST was at first of the nature of a splendid intuition." The efforts of the dogmatists were devoted "to recovering and vitalising truths which we can find easily enough in the New Testament, but which were imperfectly understood in the sub-Apostolic period." To us, on the contrary, the suggestion is obvious, that in spite of the later Christian philosophers, their doctrine is not really in the New Testament, although the dogmatists can find it there; nor does that conclusion, or the elimination of the element of miracle, lead us, as Mr. INGE would suppose, to despair of the historical worth of the record, or of true and intimate knowledge of JESUS, as revealer of the spiritual life with GOD. "The revelation of GOD as a Person" does not in our experience depend on any metaphysical doctrine of absolute sinlessness in the human revealer. "God as a Person" cannot surely mean "as a human Person," and by what right is it assumed that a humble soul conscious of imperfection, yet aspiring after perfection, "even as our FATHER in heaven is perfect," cannot look up with assured faith to that FATHER, and quicken the same faith in others?

We are among those whom Mr. INGE regards as outside the pale, who cannot believe (in his sense) in "the Christian doctrine of a historical Incarnation two thousand years ago." Of such he writes with true Christian feeling, as the following passage will show:—

> The divinity of the historical Christ is a dogma which cannot be proved by external evidence; and though some may claim to have had it revealed to them in a manner which admits of no doubt, they cannot make their experiences valid for others. The loss of the belief to most of us would be incalculable; it would deprive us of nearly all our joy and peace in believing. But let us remember (so that we may do justice to those who cannot accept it) that without it men may still treasure the supreme ethical revelation of perfect humanity in the gospels, a revelation which would remain a precious treasure to mankind, even if it were an unrealised ideal. They may still listen to the voice of God within them, testifying that the law of Christ, as they read it in the New Testament, is the law under which we live; that sin is blotted out by love and self-sacrifice; and that every step in moral progress is a passage through death unto life—a crucifixion and resurrection. Christianity so mutilated is an austere and difficult religion, but not an ignoble one; and those who are trying to guide their lives by its light are deserving of sympathy rather than harsh condemnation. It is a comparatively easy thing to do violence to our intellect, when we are desirous on all grounds to reach a certain conclusion. A man who, though of a religious temper, refuses to do this is not far from the kingdom of God. This faith, for faith it often really is, even in the religious sense, may end in definite Christian conviction, or it may not. We can only know in part, while we live here; and we may be sure that "when that which is perfect is come," Christ will own many as his friends who have borne the cross without hoping for the crown.

One cannot read such words as these without being touched by their sincerity, and yet standing in another line of Christian tradition, after generations of lowly discipleship and thankful trust, we must add that we are not conscious that our religion is more "austere and difficult" than that of an orthodox believer in the Incarnation, nor that our Christianity is mutilated. Rather does it appear to us in its simplicity and truth in complete harmony with the religion of JESUS himself, rich in the joy and peace of believing. We cannot worship GOD in the form of a man, but in the holiest human fellowship, with JESUS, we rest in the FATHER'S perfect love.

THE SOURCES OF FAITH.

ONE other letter of congratulation on the Diamond Jubilee of THE INQUIRER, from among those which we were unable to print last week, we must find a place for here, because, while joining in the cordial greetings which have come to us so abundantly from many sides, it holds a special place, as from one who no longer occupies that position of religious faith in which we find the strength and inspiration of our life. Miss SHARPE has abandoned as "symbols" what to us are profound realities of the spiritual life; at least, so we understand her reference to the discarding of "all theologies." That grave difference we cannot pretend in any way to minimise; but for that very reason we are anxious to meet the friendly sympathy of her letter with the sincerest acknowledgment, and with what is no less its due, some words of frank response.

To the Editor of "The Inquirer."

Can you find space for a few words of congratulation and thanks from "a constant reader" who has been led through the paths of reverent free thought, which are the acknowledged heritage of THE INQUIRER, to a point of view differing from that of most of your correspondents?

There are some who, following after "Truth, by which no man ever yet was injured," have found that honest "personal conviction," respected always by THE INQUIRER, has brought them to discard all theologies, and to breathe more freely and happily in a world of thought, where the old landmarks have lost their significance and new ones point forward full of hope and inspiration. Some of us will always look back with gratitude to the steps that have led us forward, and we continue to try to follow the progress of those whose symbols we have relinquished.

Among varying aspects of thought that strike an outsider there is one I should like to mention, and that is the apparently growing tendency to religious mysticism, whether it be in the utterances of the prophets of Unitarian Christianity or in Dr. MacLaren's "Evangelical Mysticism," in the return to the mysticism of the mediæval saints, or in Maeterlinck's would-be scientific mysticism. More and more the sources of religion seem relegated to a region of individual poetic vision and emotion.

But while we have a firm basis of morality we have a common ground for work, and we may respect, if we cannot realise, the ideals of others, and be grateful for the sincerity which it is the tradition of THE INQUIRER to cultivate.

July 9. LŒTITIA SHARPE.

We have with Miss SHARPE a common ground in the firm basis of morality, and, we will add, in the tradition of sincerity, to which we may claim to have maintained an unswerving loyalty. And, happily, in the difference which separates us, immense as it must seem and for the moment is, there cannot be on either side any bitterness or any of that looking down upon another from a self-conscious superior intellectual or moral height, which is the despair of mutual understanding. Not in self-seeking or in self-conceit, but in the single-hearted desire for reality of life and for service of the Highest, we must each make our own confession of faith, and make of our life a prayer that what is truest and best may prevail. Pledged to the humble service of Truth and Righteousness, the difference is that in that service we find GOD, as the final satisfaction of all our thinking, the confidence and hope of our moral aspiration, the abiding strength and gladness of our life—and our friend does not.

When we get our hold upon Righteousness and begin to realise what duty means, and say that herein is the strength of the living GOD, the words may be "symbols," as all words are, with which we try to speak of the profoundest truths of life, but we are not dealing merely with "symbols" or "theologies," we have here facts of experience, which belong to the energies of our inmost being. In our surrender to the obligation of duty, as in our recognition of the marvellous order and beauty of the world, and in the communion of personal trust and affection, which is not limited to those whose hands we can still grasp, but in the stillness of a hidden fellowship knows that love is stronger than death, we come to the ultimate ground of our being, and find that our rest is in the Eternal. We are in the presence of One, who is more than all else. We do not commit the folly of supposing that we can comprehend the Infinite, but the more deeply we enter into the knowledge of ourselves and our own life of human fellowship the more absolutely are we convinced, with a calm and happy faith, that it is not of ourselves alone, that it is with God, of His grace, and that it is not for these fleeting moments only of our earthly years.

It is true, we believe, and we are thankful to believe it, that our people more and more find the strength of their faith in the direct experiences of personal life, understanding that here and now GOD is with us, and that here in our modern life, with its marvellous extension of knowledge and the consequent revolution of our ways of thinking, the Spirit yet beareth witness with our spirit, that we are children of GOD. On that conviction our churches are built; without it our religious fellowship would lose its deepest significance. It furnishes, we are convinced, the true interpretation of our "firm basis of morality," the immovable foundation of righteousness, on which our life must be built; it leads us to the further conviction, so infinite in its significance, that Righteousness is in truth one with Eternal Love.

If this is to be called religious mysticism, it can only be in that true sense in which all experience in touch with the Infinite reaches out beyond the moment and becomes aware of the larger bearings of life. It rests upon a solid basis of fact, and not merely on "poetic vision and emotion." The vision of GOD is amid the common things of His Universe. Having regard to the nature of our spiritual being, in its simplest elements, we should say that the conviction that we cannot go where GOD is not is the common-sense of a clear-sighted religious life.

The ultimate ground of faith is therefore within each living soul. There we are nearest to GOD, and there the Spirit beareth witness. In the mutual recognition of the fact we find the happiness and strength of our religious fellowship, and so the witness of the Church is added to that of individual faith. In that same inner shrine the teaching of every age finds its interpreter. To all divine truth, which is in the Bible and in other Scriptures, the same Spirit must bear witness, and above all to the grace and truth of JESUS. Thus the whole communion of the religious life centres in each living soul, and that is possible, and not only possible, but necessary, because we all rest together in the Eternal, the living GOD.

Here we may perhaps add a word on a point raised by another correspondent in a recent letter. In THE INQUIRER of May 17 Mrs. COURTAULD, referring to a letter from Miss FRANCES POWER COBBE and our comment on it, asked how many of our people would attach a distinct meaning to a phrase we had used as to being "with JESUS, as a living Friend, in the Divine presence." The whole passage in our article was as follows:—

> Our faith, it is true, must be grounded in direct and present experience of the spiritual life, the hidden life with God, and it must be nurtured in loyalty to the moral ideal, for which Miss Cobbe has so nobly contended. But that life comes to its fulness, and realises all the height and depth of its meaning, only in human fellowship, and amid the conditions of duty in our great human brotherhood; and this must ever include the revealers of what is highest in our common humanity, in its life with God, and therefore, as we hold, above all others, Jesus, the "great chief of faithful souls." Our knowledge of the love of God, of the strength of eternal righteousness, and of the meaning of surrender to the Father's will, is perfected, as otherwise it cannot be, when we are with him, as a living Friend, in the Divine presence, though so long since hidden from mortal sight, and when in the spirit of a true discipleship we strive, as he did in his own day, to do the duties of our time and in brotherly love to serve our fellow-men.
> That may be set down as a piece of religious mysticism; it would, in our view, be as truly described as Realism. What we mean is, that the abiding realities of life are the Eternal Spirit, whom we speak of as GOD and FATHER, and the great communion of living souls, of whom we know through self-knowledge and the experience of our human fellowship. These all are "living unto GOD," the great teachers of the past, and those who were our own closest friends, but have now passed from our mortal sight.
> We cannot think of them as dead
> Who walk with us no more.
> Least of all is JESUS dead, and with perfect simplicity and truth, when we realise our communion in the Divine presence, we can think of him as a living Friend. Because we find him to be the crown of our humanity, it is with him that our knowledge of GOD is perfected, as otherwise it would not be. If others feel that their knowledge would be as complete, even though humanity were without JESUS and the whole history of Christian discipleship, we have no word to say against them, but it is not so with us. Thus we make our confession of faith, with quiet confidence that on this foundation of a genuine humanity, attentive to the Truth teaching inwardly, religion must be based, and must continually grow in the knowledge and the love of GOD.

MISS COBBE ON CONSTRUCTIVE THEISM.

IT is a pleasure and an encouragement to Theists in this country when our old teacher and friend, Miss Frances Power Cobbe, raises her voice once more from her far retirement in the interests of the religion of the future. So far as India is concerned she, along with Theodore Parker and others, has contributed so largely towards the formation of a positive system of theistic faith that we must listen carefully to any further message which she has to deliver.

In her letter to you on "Religion v. the History of Religion," she has indicated her attitude towards Christology as taught by orthodox Christians—an attitude with which even advanced orthodox theologians must largely sympathise. One wishes she as clearly indicated the lines on which the new theology and new ethics of the twentieth century are to be constructed. Barring the errors of Christian creeds and confessions, may it not be said that, at least for Christendom, Christianity, in the history of its development, has laid the foundation and built a good deal of such theology and ethics? A great mass of the dogmatic and ecclesiastic superstructure must be, and is already, dismantled, but the foundation laid is good. That GOD is spirit, that His relations with man's soul show that the latter is His essence, His image, His son, that the highest and holiest in man is His self-revelation, are facts which none need gainsay. Eastern and Western religions, as well as the personal experiences of Theists, both Christian and Hindu, bear testimony to them. I go the length of saying that Christian Theology, as a whole—excepting, of course, its metaphysics of the birth and nature of Christ—and Hindu theology as a whole bear out the basal truths of universal religion. Some day a great religious thinker will work out the connection. Theology and ethics are to my mind not two separate things, whose sources and sanctions have to be traced by different processes of religious thought; the one is a speculation and the other is a practical evolution of the same central truth. It would be too arduous, and perhaps an unnecessary work to launch into fresh speculations on these subjects when orthodox religions already furnish real and workable materials for the coming construction. As far as possible the past and future shall be on common lines.

It is different, however, on the subject of Christ's place in the future faith. Mediæval and modern orthodoxy has gone such lengths of wonderful exaggeration about the function and personality of Jesus Christ that any attempt at reconciliation is rendered all but hopeless. Much that Miss Cobbe says is perfectly true. Nevertheless, the question occurs, has Christ, "the greatest prophet," a necessary and unique place in the spiritual evolution of the future man? All the elaborate disquisitions about his birth, his place, his nature, his resurrection, are tiring, and may be laid aside. But has or has not his personality a universal place in the very core of spiritual religion? My doctrine of the spirit of Christ involves the divine humanity of all the greatest teachers of the world, in whom God manifested himself, summed up into a unity in the historical Christ, the seed, the type, the ever-unfolding life of God-like manhood. Personal practical religion must ever need a personal exemplar who realises what is humanly possible, who is conscious of his mission, and of his relations both to God and man. He must have the perfect self-confidence which becomes authoritative in its teachings; he instinctively indulges in a "sublime self-assertion," as Keshub Chunder Sen termed it, which silences doubt, and enforces his great lessons with the weight and achievement of character. This is not "the familiar weakness of human nature," as Miss Cobbe calls it, but the familiar strength of the loftiest natures. Buddha and even Mohammed had it. It is the privilege of self-immersion and self-effacement in a great cause. Whosoever may have written the Fourth Gospel, and with whatsoever purpose, with all the admixtures of Alexandrine mysticism in it, there is a profound spirituality in it which the world will never let go, and which creates a spontaneous response to which, a non-Christian as I am, I plead deeply guilty. I do not go into the comparative authenticity of the Four Gospels; the same Indweller who interprets the other three interprets the fourth also, and in His leading I can trust.

All the same I concur wholly with Miss

Cobbe that Christendom has talked so much of Jesus, and so little of the Spirit of God, as almost to banish Him from the field of practical religion. Faith, devotions, holy living must draw their inspiration from direct communion with God, as Christ cultivated it and exemplified it. Growing and maturing personal relations with an all-filling, besetting, personal God alone can serve us in this present crisis in the Christian Church. And the spirit of a living Christ, who embodies the sorrows, aspirations, and achievements of man, shall help us to perfect those relations.

OXFORD SUMMER SESSION FOR SUNDAY-SCHOOL TEACHERS.

IN order to qualify myself for writing some report of our pleasant trip to Oxford I have been looking through a chapter of ancient history — history so quickly becomes antiquated nowadays! — and there, in The Helper published at the beginning of 1899, we find how the idea of a summer school at Oxford for Sunday-school teachers was first received. All the good friends whose opinion upon the matter we had asked agreed with one accord that the idea was excellent; but the question as to its practicability was not so easily settled; indeed, this seemed to be approached with some nervousness, although it was most emphatically stated that, if only we had zeal and faith enough to overcome the mountains of difficulty, we might fairly hope to succeed in gathering together some fifty teachers, from among all our schools, who might be able and willing to take part in such a project.

Well, here we are in July, 1902, and not only has this idea been already realised, but we have just returned from our third session in Oxford, where we hope that these meetings will become an established institution, to be held regularly every alternate year. Not only have we gathered together fifty teachers, but double that number—sometimes even more—have made use of this golden opportunity for gaining knowledge and inspiration for the work to which they have set their hands. How we have all revelled in our touch with classic Oxford, with its hallowed associations and memories; how we delighted in feeling that we had a home of our own in Manchester College; and how we all rejoiced in meeting with fellow-teachers from all parts of "Great Britain and Ireland" (as our geography books rather clumsily style our British Isles), let those who have lively imaginations try to conceive. Nor did the outside attractions of Oxford cause our students to swerve from the main object of our gathering; the lectures were assiduously followed and enjoyed. As one teacher well said, "The week has been a succession of 'sweet surprises' to me. I had expected to find the lectures rather too deep, but each one has been full of just those things that I wanted to know something about."

Some folks there are who are fond of complaining that our people are so cold, and it always seems to me as if these are exactly the ones who support their theory by their own conduct. But we at the Oxford Session neither held that doctrine nor acted as though we did. Our S. S. A. President, Mr. James Harwood, whose ready and cheery word just at the right moment gave a sense of cohesion to the whole session, shook hands with each visitor before lunch on the first day; and this introduction to him was taken as the introduction of each one to the others, so that we at once felt that sense of pleasant acquaintance and comradeship which in many cases developed into positive friendship before the close of the week.

There was but one cause for regret among us, I think; and that was the unavoidable absence of two of the best known and most appreciated among the friends of Sunday-school work—namely, Professor J. Estlin Carpenter, who is away from Oxford this month; and Mr. J. J. Wright, who was unable to leave home on account of the serious illness of his wife.

And now, how can I gather up all the threads, and pass on, for the benefit of those teachers who were not able to be present, some of the happy visions which will ever be recalled to memory when we think of our recent visit? Perhaps it may be best to group my recollections under headings, after just one word upon Mr. Harwood's opening address, in which he laid emphasis on the fact that one scholar influenced for good, one scholar kept from evil ways, will mean the influencing of children yet unborn, as well as of the many companions and friends who must be drawn upward or downward by contact with that one scholar. This lesson is sorely needed for the encouragement of every worker among the people; for who has not felt at times that the tiny corner which alone we can touch is as nothing compared with the vast ALL that needs doing? and yet, if we really think the subject out, we shall see how true were the words of our preacher, and so we shall take courage and work on. Now for our recollections:—

1. The Academic Lectures.

At these we were privileged to see and hear some of the professors of Manchester College, who, to their honour be it spoken, remembering their audience, were careful to make what they said able to be "understanded of the people." With Mr. Addis we caught a glimpse of the prophets in the Hebrew nation, and learnt to understand something of their purpose and teaching. Principal Drummond explained how books were first made, how written, and how published; passing on to the early manuscripts of the New Testament, and telling us very simply something of the elements of Textual criticism; and afterwards he showed us some of the early books, and also a few facsimiles of written pages of ancient manuscripts. Mr. J. Edwin Odgers told us what THE CHURCH in New Testament writings really meant, and traced the growth of the idea connected the thought of The Church from early Christian times. And, lastly, from Mr V. D. Davis we learnt something of the development of sacred song in religious services, which for so many centuries was confined to the ancient Book of Psalms or to metrical versions of them; these have, however, been gradually superseded by the hymns of the last two centuries—hymns in the writing of which our own liberal churches have taken a prominent part.

2. The Practical Lectures.

These embraced subjects of practical interest to Sunday-school workers. The question of Success or Failure was discussed; the boys and girls of our cities described, and their needs emphasized; the Sunday-school, from the superintendent's point of view, was given by one of their number; the personal influence of the Teacher has been dwelt upon; while music and its importance in Sunday-school work was the theme on another occasion. The use of the blackboard was advocated by Mr. T. Robinson, whose trained fingers followed the orders of his brain in a quite wonderful manner; and this lecturer also, on a second day, emphasized the value of rambles with one's scholars as one of the best assistants we can have in our Sunday-school work.

3. Teachers in Council.

Several conferences on various activities connected with our schools have been held; a discussion upon the Sunday School Code Book brought forth an expression of appreciation of the book, and some suggestions for the next edition; and one evening was devoted to short lessons given to a class, for the nonce represented by teachers acting as scholars.

4. Special Meetings.

The first evening Dr. and Mrs. Drummond held a reception of welcome at Manchester College, which gave the opportunity of gathering in friendly intercourse all the students, with their friends, in Oxford.

A most inspiring address was given one evening by our American visitor, Mr. Van Ness, of Boston, U.S.A., in which he brought before us, in vivid word pictures, some of his experiences of life in the West of America and in the East of Europe. Another evening was devoted to an address on the wonderful poem of Job, followed by a concerted reading of the work.

5. Excursions.

Boating and cycling parties, visits to the colleges, or to the houses of Oxford friends, together with a couple of longer excursions to Blenheim and Nuneham, filled in the afternoons in most enjoyable fashion.

There yet remains one point, and that which I hold to be the most important one, that will dwell in the happy memories of our Oxford visit—something intangible rather than concrete, which I will call.

6. The Inspiring Element.

Everyone who was with us will know exactly what I mean by this expression. It was a mingling of joy, and enthusiasm, and uplifting of spirit, which made each student open heart and mind to take in inspiration, hope, and encouragement. Early morning saw the lover of Mother Nature leading a few disciples off to some secluded spot where she might be coaxed to whisper some of her wonderful secrets; every day beheld other learners gathering around a friend of city lads and lassies, trying to catch some sparks of his fire of devoted love, and anxious to be taught how to help forward those whom Mother Nature means to be the noblest of all her works. And this spirit was caught up, confirmed, and strengthened by our short morning services, held in the chapel at the beginning of each day. I am not one who believes that the true spirit of love, and praise, and prayer, is strengthened by spoken words at all times and seasons; but these short services seemed to fit in so exactly with the feeling of the audience that few, I think, would have willingly absented themselves from them; and when on the Sunday morning we met, under Principal Drummond's genial influence, for the morning service, and joined in the beautiful hymn, "Come, labour on," it seemed indeed as if the congregation understood what was meant by the words used in past ages, "I will pray with the spirit, and I will pray with the understanding also; I will sing with the spirit, and I will sing with the understanding also."

MARIAN PRITCHARD.

July, 1902.

We have some further notes of the Teachers' Summer Session, which we must hold over until next week, and in addition to these we look forward to publishing in full Mr. Haigh's paper on "Our City Youths and Maidens," and a great part of Mr. Howard Young's on "The Superintendent's Standpoint." Mr. Robinson has also promised us two articles, which will embody the substance of his delightful lectures on "Blackboard Illustrations" and "Saturday Rambles as Helps to Sunday-school Work."

ANY man of many transactions can hardly expect to go through life without being subject to one or two very severe calumnies. Amongst these many transactions, some few will be with very ill-conditioned people, with very ignorant people, or, perhaps, with monomaniacs; and he cannot expect, therefore, but that some narrative of a calumnious kind will have its origin in one of these transactions. It may be fanned by any accidental breeze of malice or ill-fortune, and become a very serious element of mischief to him. Such a thing is to be looked upon as pure misfortune coming in the ordinary course of events; and the way to treat it is to deal with it as calmly and philosophically as with any other misfortune. As someone has said, the mud will rub off when it is dry, not before. The drying will not always come in the calumniated man's time unless in favourable seasons, which he cannot command. It is not wise, however, to be very impatient to justify oneself; and, altogether, too much stress should not be laid upon calumny by the calumniated, else their serious work will be for ever interrupted; and they should remember that it is not so much their business to explain to others all they do, as to be sure that it will bear explanation and satisfy themselves.

ARTHUR HELPS.

THERE is a power (have you not felt it?) in the presence, conversation, and example of a man of strong principle and magnanimity, to lift us at least for the moment from our vulgar and tame habits of thought, and to kindle some generous aspirations after the excellence which we were made to attain. I hardly need say to you that it is impossible to place ourselves under any influence of this nature so quickening as the example of Jesus.—W. E. Channing.

GEORGE HERBERT.

SIR,—I pray deliver this little book to my dear brother Ferrar, and tell him he shall find in it a picture of the many spiritual conflicts that have passed between God and my soul before I could subject mine to the will of Jesus my Master; in whose service I have now found perfect freedom; desire him to read it: and then if he can think it may turn to the advantage of any dejected poor soul, let it be made public; if not, let him burn it; for I and it are less than the least of God's mercies.

IT was thus that George Herbert, as he lay a-dying, handed to a friend the manuscript of his poems, that he might deliver it to Nicholas Ferrar, a man of piety as singular and chaste as George Herbert himself. The author's choice of his literary executor was a wise one. So far was Ferrar, when he turned over these pages in the peaceful seclusion of Little Gidding, disposed to think them fit for no better fate than the flames, that he sturdily withstood the Vice-Chancellor of Cambridge, who at first refused to license the book for the press unless the lines, were expunged. Ferrar declined to alter a syllable, and won the day. And so the little volume known as "The Temple; or, Sacred Poems and Private Ejaculations," saw the light; of which its editor declared that "there was in it the picture of a divine soul in every page; and that the whole book was such a harmony of holy passions as would enrich the world with pleasure and piety."

> Religion stands a tip-toe in our land
> Ready to pass to the American strand,

George Herbert came of a noble family—a younger branch from the Earls of Pembroke. The loss of his father during his early childhood threw the responsibility of his education upon his mother, than whom, whether we base our judgment upon the ultimate attainments of her sons, or upon the compliments of Dr. Donne, no woman was ever better qualified to lead her children up to honour and wisdom through the influence of her own piety and wit. In little but sweet content must Herbert have passed his childhood under the eye of this "particular good angel"—as that particular good angler, old Isaac Walton, handsomely styles her in his "Life" of her son. This prudent mother with the witty tongue and gentle, autumnal face, broke up home at the family seat, Montgomery Castle, and went to live in Oxford with her boys, to mingle the grace of her affection with their intellectual wrestlings. Edward, the eldest of the family, was one of those who thus gained, between the class-room and his mother's side, the foundations of chivalry and solid thinking on which he subsequently built up a brilliant career in the diplomatic service of his country and as a philosopher. We know him best as Lord Herbert of Cherbury. George, however, was schooled at Westminster, and thence went on to Cambridge. This was in 1608—the year of Milton's birth—and when he himself was about fifteen years of age. But distance failed to weaken the ties of affection that bound mother and son together for the period of her life. Academic distinctions came apace, leading up to the oratorship of the University, in which office Herbert was brought under the notice of the king. James was delighted with the scholar's clever and flattering acknowledgment of the "Basilikon Doron," which he had written and presented to the University. Herbert was always welcome at Court and had grounds for anticipating brilliant secular preferment. On this he set his heart. Happily for us King James died, and with him died Herbert's chances of preferment. But for that the world would probably have lost in the courtier the unique treasure it gained from the country parson.

There is no doubt that to Herbert this was a staggering blow. He went away into the country and lived in close seclusion. It was time to choose, once for all, his future career. He had to decide whether still to aim at worldly dignity for which he had all the gifts to shine, or to sacrifice himself and take orders in the Church. After much wrestling of the spirit and weariness of the body, he laid his lot upon the altar. The following verses tell the story of this crisis:—

> Whereas my birth and spirit rather took
> The way that takes the town;
> Thou didst betray me to a lingering book,
> And wrap me in a gown.
> I was entangled in a world of strife,
> Before I had the power to change my life.
> . . . . .
> Yet, though Thou troublest me, I must be meek,
> In weakness must be stout:
> Well, I will change my service, and go seek
> Some other master out.
> Ah! my dear God! though I am clean forgot,
> Let me not love Thee, if I love Thee not.

To such as sought to dissuade him from taking a step unworthy, as they thought, of his birth and exceptional talents, he replied that "the domestic servants of the King of Heaven should be of the noblest families on earth." If the sacred office had been latterly brought into contempt he would labour to make it honourable by consecrating to it all his learning and abilities to advance the glory of that God who gave them. And, he concludes, "I will labour to be like my Saviour, by making humility lovely in the eyes of all men."

Although his first charge was at Layton Ecclesia, in Huntingdonshire, where he found the village church in ruins and left a handsome building in its place, it is as the rector of Bemerton, close to Salisbury, that we shall always think of George Herbert, poet and country parson. There for less than three years he laboured, repairing his church and rebuilding his parsonage at his own cost, and winning the hearts of his rustic parishioners so that "they would let their plough rest" when the bell rung to prayers, "that they might offer their devotions to God with him; and would then return back to their plough." There is an antique simplicity about this in keeping with the rest of the story of his brief pastorate.

His favourite recreation was to walk into Salisbury to attend the choral service at the Cathedral, being also himself a skilful musician. On one occasion, when due at the house of some musical friends in the city, he, who was wont to be so trim and clean, appeared with his clothes all soiled and discomposed. He explained that on his way he had doffed his coat to help a poor packman and his horse, which had fallen beneath its load. One of the company told him that "he had disparaged himself by so dirty an employment," but he replied, in words which were worthy of one who spoke of making drudgery divine, that "the thought of what he had done would prove music to him at midnight . . . . And though I do not wish," he said, "for the like occasion every day, yet let me tell you I would not willingly pass one day of my life without comforting a sad soul or showing mercy, and I praise God for this occasion. And now," he added, "let us tune our instruments."

Thus, with the poetry of kind deeds, George Herbert won the hearts of the humble around him, as with his witty piety he has refreshed the spirits of so many since.

Though scarcely forty when he died, he had found time to build for his chaste spirit an ingenious tabernacle of verse, unique in its peculiar charm.

We should approach his poetry as he did its composition. He was a fine gentleman, a distinguished scholar, a rhetorical adept, practising a courtly reserve to his inferiors, and ambitious to win renown in the service of the State. But when once he had taken the critical step which made him a minister of the Church of Christ all these things were finally renounced, and there was nothing which he considered good enough for "his Master." He would henceforth sacrifice time and talent to no profane theme, but he would put his muse under tribute to the lowliest duties for the King of Heaven. He was a man of undivided heart.

Though brought by force of will to live under a rule of ascetic severity, which, no doubt, helped to shatter his health, Herbert inherited by nature a lithe and vivacious mind, a mind which, as he said, was "like a penknife in too narrow a sheath—too sharp for his body." In him we see the humorist turned saint without extinguishing his humour. And so, among the first verses of his book, we come across such couplets as these:

Command thyself in chief. He life's warre knows,
Whom all his passions follow, as he goes.

That he attained this perfect self-command he himself testified in his last hours, when he thanked God that he had not then to learn patience when most he stood in need of it. On the other hand, he protested that "Religion does not banish mirth," for

All things are bigge with jest: nothing that's plain,
But may be wittie, if thou hast the vein.

The reader of "The Temple" will have no difficulty in ascertaining for himself that he had the vein and that to him the plainest things had a twinkle of laughter, which he expresses in verbal tricks and quaint inventions of thought. These ingenuities and paradoxes, these strained and grotesque metaphors meet us on every page. Indeed, but for the unquestionable piety of the author, we might not so lightly submit to some of the licenses he takes. The faith of that man must indeed be strong who can without sacrilege mix his pleasantry with his prayers. Perhaps it is fairer to say that in his case prayer and praise overflow into his laughter. It is not enough to say that he was exhibiting that euphuistic style which had been so prevalent a few years before. No doubt this helped to shape his verse, but it is not enough to account for the spirit of it. George Herbert was one of the few who have felt themselves altogether on their native heath when in pursuit of a perfectly unworldly life. As no one can dream of accusing him of religious insolence, we conclude that nothing but spiritual contentment and confidence found utterance when he said, "I am, by His grace, become now so like Him, as to be pleased with what pleaseth Him." He could, without irreverence, play with serious subjects, because he was so much at home amongst them.

Here is one of his shorter poems, which for some reason best known to himself he entitled "The Pulley":—

When God at first made man,
Having a glasse of blessings standing by;
Let us (said he) poure on him all we can:
Let the world's riches, which dispersed lie,
Contract into a span.

So strength first made a way;
Then beautie flow'd, then wisdome, honour, pleasure;
When almost all was out, God made a stay,
Perceiving that alone of all his treasure
Rest in the bottome lay.

For if I should (said he)
Bestow this jewell also on my creature,
He would adore my gifts instead of me,
And rest in Nature, not the God of Nature,
So both should losers be.

Yet let him keep the rest,
But keep them with repining restlesnesse;
Let him be rich and wearie, that at least,
If goodness lead him not, yet wearinesse
May tosse him to my breast.

It is a little surprising that a poet who was a musician should have infused so little melody into his verse. Though he practised a fantastic variety of metre, few of his poems are lyrical. Among the few that are ever sung is the charming little poem called "Vertue":—

Sweet day, so cool, so calm, so bright,
The bridal of the earth and skie;
The dew shall weep thy fall to-night;
For thou must die.

Sweet rose, whose hue angrie and brave
Bids the rash gazer wipe his eye;
Thy root is ever in its grave,
And thou must die.

Sweet spring, full of sweet dayes and roses,
A box where sweets compacted lie;
My musick shows ye have your closes,
And all must die.

Only a sweet and virtuous soul,
Like season'd timber, never gives;
But though the whole world turn to coal,
Then chiefly lives.

There is also the beautiful and musical "Antiphon":—

Vers. The heav'ns are not too high,
His praise may hither flie:
The earth is not too low,
His praises there may grow.
Cho. Let all the world in ev'ry corner sing
My God and King.

The following lines from a sonnet on Prayer afford a good illustration of George Herbert's metaphorical style. To liken prayer to the Milky Way or to the bird of Paradise, or to "reversed thunder" is indeed extravagant, but here are some figures which are spiritual and suggestive as well as fanciful:—

Prayer is—

The Church's banquet . . .
God's breath in man returning to his birth;
The soul in paraphrase, heart in pilgrimage;
The Christian plummet sounding heaven and earth.

Church-bells beyond the stars heard, the soul's blood,
Something understood.

We must not take the poet's frequent allusions to sin and sorrow too seriously. Of sorrow he knew little. Of sin, the foul gangrene of the soul, he knew less, and for that very reason he could talk with transparent artificiality of gathering all the clouds and springs into his head to keep up an intermittent stream of contrite grief. His weeping, indeed, is almost as pleasant as an April shower. His soul was white. His heart was as the heart of a little child. He sheds industrious tears, but keeps on smiling through them. "Childhood is health," he says. It was his own kind of health.

His spirit was wedded to the service of Christ, his Master. That name, said he, was as an Oriental fragrance perfuming his mind. He busied himself with the things of Christ because he dwelt with Christ.

Do all things like a man, not sneakingly:
Think the King sees thee still; for his King does.

To see God in all things was his Elixir of Life.

Who sweeps a room, as for thy laws,
Makes that and the action fine.

Such is a glimpse of a rare soul whose book of devout poetry full of quaint inventions and far-fetched comparisons still invites an intimate and loving study. After all, though Nicholas Ferrar affectionately christened the volume entrusted to him "The Temple"—and for a title no man could have found a better—the spiritual life which it portrayed was to the saintly rector of Bemerton not conceived under the figure of a temple, but rather of an English country church standing in its green, yew-shaded grave-yard. Holy memories hang about it. Sweet bells peal from its towers, and village worship consecrates the place.

Lines from George Herbert's "Temple."

Wealth and Simplicity.

He that needs five thousand pound to live
Is full as poore as he that needs but five.
—Church Porch.

Mirth and Purity.

Pick out of tales the mirth, but not the sinne;
He pares his apple, that will cleanly feed.
—(Ib.)

Truth.

Dare to be true. Nothing can need a ly:
A fault which needs it most, grows two thereby.—(Ib.)

Industry.

God gave thy soul brave wings; put not those feathers
Into a bed, to sleep out all ill weathers.
—(Ib.)

Charity.

Why should I feel another man's mistakes
More than his sicknesses or povertie.

Method.

Summe up at night what thou has done by day,
And in the morning what thou hast to do.
Dresse and undresse thy soul: mark the decay
And growth of it: if, with thy watch, that too
Be down, then winde up both, since we shall be
Most surely judged, make thy accounts agree.

IN mountainous regions the valleys take in more of the sun than do the hills; and our lowliness is His reception.—C. A. Bartol.

THE SOUTH WALES UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

THIS Association dates from 1802. Our Presbyterian forefathers in Wales had held their ministers' meetings many, many years previous to that date, although there are but few, if any, records of them extant. It was on Friday, Oct. 8, 1802, the "Theo-Unitarian Society in South Wales" was established, and our Association is its present representative (Mon. Rep., 1807, p. 445). The following gentlemen formed its first committee :—Josiah Rees, Thomas Morgan, Thomas Davies, David Davis (ministers), and John Rowlands and Edward Williams, laymen. The first publication was an eight-page pamphlet, giving the names of the committee, names of members, &c., and the rules of the Society. One of the rules was that all publications should be of the same size, so that they might be bound together. One of those publications (1804) was a translation from the pen of the Rev. Josiah Rees, which called forth a reply—a thundering one by the way—from the Rev. Joseph Harris. This had a large circulation, and is said to have received the imprimatur of the Bishop of St. David's, though it is doubtful if the bishop understood a word of it. It was enough that it crushed the Unitarian (Evans's "Life of Richards"). In succeeding years several of Dr. Priestley's smaller works were published ; "Elwall's Trial," a catechism by Dr. J. P. Estlin, a valuable tract on Redemption, &c., by Synergus, that is the Rev. Robert Edward Garnham (1753-1802), taken from the "Commentaries and Essays"; a work in four parts on the Atonement by the Rev. John James, and a translation of Belsham's "Calm Inquiry." The publication of this last (1824) crippled the Society to such an extent that it was unable to publish any more for many years. During these twenty-two years (1802-1824) the Society did much necessary and useful work.

The centenary of the Association was celebrated on Wednesday and Thursday last week, at Gellionen, which is one of our oldest churches, its bicentenary having been held in 1892. This church was gathered by some of the martyrs of 1662. When the 2,000 were turned adrift from their livings there were no meeting-houses ready built for them ; but they went about sowing the good seed wherever they found a convenient soil—in caves, in forests, in the distant recesses of the mountains, and, when fairly safe from persecution, in private houses. These latter, however, had to be watched for many years for fear of Government spies. It is a curious fact that in some cases (such as that of Cwm-y-glo, near Merthyr) the meeting-house seems to have had no door. It was entered viâ the private farm-house, up the stairs, and then down into the four-walled plain, barn-like room. After 1672 chapel building began in right earnest. Gellionen stands on the summit of a lofty bleak hill, and hither Sunday after Sunday pilgrims have walked miles for more than two centuries to hear the Gospel preached. The evicted clergy, after peregrinating the country for some years, gradually got more settled and their names identified more or less with certain centres The names of Captain Jenkin Jones and Robert Thomas are connected with the church now known as Gellionen. Mr. Thomas died in 1693; Jones's name is connected with many other churches, but the date of his death is not known. Then comes Lewis Davies, and after him Llewellyn Bevan, who was living in 1715; Roger Howell, whose knowledge of scripture was so extensive that he was called a "walking cyclopædia." He was minister 1722-42; Joseph Simons died 1774 ; Noah Simons, his son, who was his co-pastor for a time, emigrated to America 1794. He had left Gellionen for Neath some years previously.

For many years there were two ministers, and these had charge of other churches besides Gellionen. In 1763, that is two years before he left college, and for nearly forty-one years, Josiah Rees was pastor. Mr. Rees was the son of the Rev. Owen Rees (1717-1768), of Aberdare. He was a good scholar and a very successful minister. He also made good use of the Press, being the projector of the first Welsh magazine, 1770; he translated Mason's "Self-Knowledge," and published some sermons. In his time the chapel was rebuilt, and some idea of the congregation may be formed from the inside dimensions—50 by 25. The present writer has often seen this place full in the distant past on an ordinary Sunday morning. The other ministers were Thomas Rees, LL.D., 1805-06; David Oliver, 1806 (in his time a great division took place, and an attempt was made to lead the congregation back to orthodoxy and to take possession of the chapel); John James, 1816-62; John Evans, 1862-87—in his time (Oct. 20, 1871) the freehold was purchased, the chapel was renovated (1873), and a large schoolroom was built; W. J. Davies, 1887-89; J. Fisher Jones, 1889-92; supplies, 1892-95; Thomas Joseph Jenkins, 1896.

The church at Trebannos dates from 1862, and until 1894, when the new chapel was opened, met in the schoolroom.

The church of Gellionen, of which Trebannos is but a branch, is one of the most flourishing we have in Wales, and the pastor, the Rev. T. J. Jenkins, is one of the most popular and successful of our ministers.

A promised report of last week's meetings has not reached us in time for our present issue.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Acton.—The Rev. T. E. M. Edwards conducted the service on Sunday evening last, his subject being "The Perverted Gospel." The services are now suspended until the first Sunday in October. A Small Executive Committee has been appointed to make arrangements for a vigorous start in the autumn, when it is hoped that some good work will be done in this rapidly-rising town. Special thanks were accorded to the Provincial Assembly for generous help, and to Mr. and Mrs. Wilks for their kind assistance in connection with the musical arrangements.

Atherton (Chowbent Chapel).—The School Sermons were preached here on Sunday last, afternoon and evening, by the Rev. Charles Hargrove, M.A., of Leeds. The children's service in the morning was conducted by the Rev. E. Savell Hicks, M.A., of Bolton. There were large congregations, and the collections during the day were upwards of £58.

Colwyn Bay: North Wales.—The Missionary Conference has again engaged the Pavilion, Victoria Pier, at this attractive watering-place, and will hold a series of Sunday morning services, beginning July 27, similar to those which proved so successful last year. The preachers will include the Revs. E. W. Lummis, M.A. ; C. J. Street, M.A., LL.B. ; W. C. Hall, M.A. ; and J. E. Manning, M.A. The secretary of the Conference, the Rev. W. R. Shanks, Higher Broughton, Manchester, will be glad to hear from any friend disposed to render assistance at the piano or harmonium.

Doncaster.—Flower Services were held in the church, on July 6, morning, afternoon, and evening. The minister, the Rev. Halliwell Thomas, conducted each service. In the afternoon he chose for his subject "The Joys of Summer Time," and in the evening preached on "Floral Growth, a Symbol of Moral Growth." The afternoon service was especially a children's one, each child bringing offerings of flowers, which were distributed afterwards among sick persons attached to the congregation, district nurses' patients, and the infirmary of the Doncaster Union. The music was very effective, the choir being considerably augmented, and accompanied by other instrumentalists besides the organ.

Hinckley.—The annual treat of the Great Meeting School, on July 12, was rendered noteworthy by the fact that for the first time the school joined in procession with the scholars of the Local Sunday School Union. The school, which was given middle place in the procession, was headed by its banner and the Boys' Drum and Fife Band. Tea was served al fresco, and the singing of the National Anthem ended a happy and memorable day.

Kingswood, near Birmingham.—The anniversary services in connection with the school and chapel were held on Sunday, July 13, the preacher being the Rev. W. J. Clarke, of the Hurst-street Mission, Birmingham. Beautiful weather favoured the occasion, and there were very good congregations. The musical portions of the services were very well rendered. The collections, in aid of school and chapel funds, amounted to about £10. The meetings of the Guild of the Good Shepherd are being held fortnightly during July and August. At the meeting on July 3 a very interesting lecture on "Constantinople" was given by Mr. Organ, who has recently been travelling in Turkey. Much information concerning the historic place was given by the lecturer, and several views of various parts of the city were handed round for inspection. The meeting was much enjoyed by those present. The actual membership of the Guild is now forty-seven.

Leicester: Great Meeting (Resignation).—The Rev. Henry Gow, B.A., having accepted the pulpit of Rosslyn-hill Chapel, Hampstead, has resigned that of the Great Meeting. The announcement was made last Sunday after morning service, by Mr. E. F. Cooper, chairman of the Great Meeting Vestry, on whose motion, seconded by Mr. Fielding Johnson, a resolution was passed, sorrowfully accepting the resignation as inevitable in view of the importance of the position to which Mr. Gow has been called, and adding the following words of acknowledgment :—"They tender to him their high appreciation of, and heartfelt thanks for, the nine years' faithful service he has rendered them, and wish him every happiness and prosperity in the larger sphere of usefulness to which he has been called."

London: Bermondsey (Appointment).—The Rev. Eustace Thompson, late Senior Student at the Unitarian Home Missionary College, has accepted an appointment as resident minister, and expects to take up his new duties about the middle of August.—The Rev. W. G. Tarrant begs to acknowledge, with sincere thanks, the following additional donations for the Scholars' Excursion :—G. C., 10s. ; Miss B., 5s. ; Mrs. T. (Brixton), 5s. ; and to make two corrections in his last week's list, where C. S. K. should be read for C. L., and A. P. for M. P.

London: Hampstead.—The Rev. Edgar Daplyn, who in the summer of 1899 joined Dr. Brooke Herford in the ministry of Rosslyn-hill Chapel, and since the retirement of the latter has been in sole charge, having resigned, will conclude his ministry at Hampstead at the end of September. Dr. Herford, as we announced last week, is to be succeeded by the Rev. Henry Gow, of Leicester.

Saffron Walden.—On Sunday, July 6, the 191st anniversay of the General Baptist Chapel was commemorated with special sermons, preached by the Rev. J. A. Brinkworth. Reference was made to the foundation and history of the congregation and its connection with Audley End Place in 1700, also the many public uses for the welfare of the town to which the chapel was put before the Town Hall was erected. The chapel stands on the ridge of the "Repell Ditches," and inside the rectangular parallelogram of the town. The interior has been greatly improved since Easter. Collections were made on behalf of the funds, and one more successful anniversary closed with the Communion service.

Yorkshire Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The thirty-fifth annual meeting of this Union took place on Saturday, July 12, at Leeds. The afternoon service was conducted in Mill-hill Chapel by the Rev. J. J. Wright, of Atherton, who preached an instructive and practical sermon. He compared the Sunday-schools of thirty or forty years ago with those of to-day, showing that though the difficulties had considerably increased since 1870, the work was now important and responsible, and he believed was being more successfully carried out than ever before. Though in the old days our teachers taught reading, writing, and arithmetic, they also in some measure taught the necessity of living good and true lives. The art of right living, though it might be difficult to teach, should be the primary object of all the teachers in our schools. Right living and the building up of character should be the basis of every lesson prepared, and the machinery of the schools should in every possible manner be made to bear upon the lives of the scholars. Sunday-schools were, indeed, doing a good and noble work, and he concluded by urging upon all teachers to persevere in their grand and solemn undertaking, assuring them that God would bless and prosper their efforts. Tea having been served in the schoolroom, a public meeting was subsequently held in the Priestley Hall, the President of the Union, Mr. Councillor Conyers, occupying the chair. He was supported by a number of ministers, and ladies and gentlemen living in the district, including the Rev. John Harrison and Mr. F. Blackwell, who represented the Manchester District and North Midland Associations respectively. The report and financial statement, both very satisfactory, were adopted, on the motion of the President, seconded by the Rev. J. Hanson Green, B.A., of Lydgate. The delegates having been thanked, the Rev. J. Harrison and Mr. Blackwell responded. Other resolutions included a vote of thanks to the Rev. J. J. Wright for his admirable and helpful sermon. The singing of a hymn and the benediction, by the Rev. C. Harvey Cook, of Holbeck, brought the proceedings to a close.

ABERYSTWYTH

("The Biarritz of Wales")

Is highly recommended for invalids, and possesses the most equable temperature, its shore being swept by the Gulf Stream and S.W. breezes of the Atlantic. The drainage is perfect, and the town is supplied with the purest water from Plymlimmon. The late Sir James Clarke, M.D., says: "A fortnight is equivalent to a month's residence in most watering places." Guides on application to the Town Clerk.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE autumnal meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association is to be held at Newcastle-on-Tyne, Oct. 6 and 7; and, as at the Leeds meeting last year, the Sunday School Association will arrange that a conference on Sunday-school work shall form part of the programme. The Rev. R. A. Armstrong is to preach in the Church of the Divine Unity, Newcastle, on Sunday, Oct. 5.

THE kindly greeting of M. Fontanès on the occasion of THE INQUIRER'S "diamond jubilee" is the more interesting to us since we find it coincided with his own jubilee in the ministry. Friends from afar have joined with his countrymen in testifying their hearty gratitude for his life-long work, and in this number, in the name of numerous English admirers, we beg to enrol ourselves. May he still flourish and bring forth fruit in old age!

THE King's health appears to be so fully restored that his advisers do not fear the results of the fatiguing Coronation service and attendant procession, which are fixed for Aug. 9. There will be far less outward jubilation, no doubt, when the deferred festival occurs than was expected in June, but probably there will be much deeper feeling and more serious thought. It is one part of the misfortune attending the deferment that a good many people will be from home about the time fixed, and ministers are a little doubtful as to the expediency of announcing special coronation services. Surely, the right course is to accept things as they are, to hold services for those who remain, and to blend special thanksgiving with the thoughts of national consecration which naturally arise on such an occasion. The President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, who is at present on a holiday in Denmark, will return, we hear, to take his place as representative of our community at the service in Westminster Abbey.

WE are glad to announce that the Rev. Joseph H. Wicksteed, M.A., of Padiham, has been appointed to the important office of district minister and lecturer by the Committee of the London District Unitarian Society, and that he hopes to enter upon his duties in October. The appointment is an interesting one on account of his father's long connection with London; and there are many who will recall the invaluable missionary labours of his grandfather, the Rev. Charles Wicksteed. The metropolitan area offers a large field and a great opportunity for our word and work, and Mr. Wicksteed, who will prove a welcome addition to our preachers and labourers in London, will carry with him the earnest sympathy and cordial God-speed of all.

THE Presbyterian Board, as the governing body of the Presbyterian College, Carmarthen, offer a number of Scholarships which have been founded to enable graduates to study for the degree of B.D. at the Welsh University. This step marks an important advance in the work of the College. We understand that several applications have already been made for Scholarships, and students who wish to obtain a divinity degree while remaining theologically free will do well to consider this opportunity. It should be added that with a view to equip the College for all requirements, the professorial staff has been increased, and as the entrance examination for ordinary students is shortly to be raised to matriculation level, the friends of the College may reasonably anticipate a general improvement in its academic work.

BY way of Geneva and Boston, U.S.A.—but what is space in these days?—we have received an interesting note respecting the pastor of the liberal German Church at Denmark Hill in South London. Pastor Wysard, we hear, came from Switzerland a quarter of a century ago, as a young man imbued with liberal views in theology, not understanding that the congregation to which he was invited to minister was of a marked Lutheran type. So much, however, did the great majority of his hearers appreciate his talent and devoutness that they would not hear of his leaving them. The case was somewhat difficult, for the statutes of the congregation obliged its minister to preach the Gospel of Jesus "according to the Augsburg Confession" and to administer Baptism and the Lord's Supper in the prescribed Lutheran form. Well, possessed of a happier liberty than some old foundations, the Church resolved to alter its statutes, and simply required the minister to preach the Gospel of Jesus "in the Spirit of Protestantism." The people's confidence was not misplaced, and they have recently celebrated Pastor Wysard's twenty-fifth anniversary amongst them with every mark of affection and esteem.

The Times, in its obituary notice of the late Mr. C. Kegan Paul, the publisher, speaks of him as having been a Unitarian at one point of his changeful theological career. That he came into close sympathy with eminent Unitarians at the time of the formation of the generously-conceived but short-lived Free Christian Union is true; but it is doubtful whether the ordinary connotation of the term "Unitarian" would allow of its fit application to him at any time. When the Union was formed (1867) he was vicar of Sturminster-Marshall, Dorset; he was one of about a score of signatories to the circular (Dec., 1867) inviting persons to join, amongst the rest being the Revs. W. Miall, P. W. Clayden, J. Martineau, J. J. Tayler, J. H. Thom, and S. A. Tipple George Dawson's name came among the "Messrs." who signed. It is interesting also to recall that Mr. Goldwin Smith presided at a conference in June, 1868. In June of the next year an anniversary service was held, Mr. Kegan Paul being one of the preachers. His sermon, which was sufficiently startling for a vicar of those days, was never published; that of his fellow-preacher, M. Athanase Coquerel, originally delivered in French, was issued in a translation entitled "The One Thing Needful."

THOUGH elected to the committee, Mr. Kegan Paul never qualified as a member of it. It may be pleaded that he had not long to consider the matter, for a year later (June, 1870) it was resolved "That it is expedient to dissolve the Union," and the formal dissolution took place in December of the same year. After that time Mr. Paul's views passed through a stage of acute scepticism, but ultimately his poetic temperament found its home in Roman Catholicism. He must be honoured as one who had the full "courage of his convictions." A story current in those days illustrates this trait. He had contributed to the Theological Review, and conceived the hearties admiration for one of the brilliant Unitarian writers in that magazine. "Come," said the Vicar, "and stay awhile with me, and bring a sermon to preach for me next Sunday." "But what will your Bishop say?" "I don't care what he may say," said the Vicar. "Well," said the unordained heretic, "I don't care any more than you seem to do about the Bishop, but I have a wholesome dread of Quarter Sessions!"

We have received a very handsome copy of the "Essex Hall Hymnal, Revised," bound in leather, with gilt edges and marker. It makes, with its broad margins and clear type, a fine pulpit book. The smaller size may be had in similar binding, price half-a-crown; the copy sent to us costs three-and-sixpence. More sumptuous copies, bound in "solid morocco," may also be had. But the true value of a hymn-book lies elsewhere than in the binding; and we are glad to hear that this Hymnal (which was noticed by us, June 21) has been already adopted by several congregations.

The exasperation caused by the education policy of the Government appears likely to result in much more than verbal remonstrances. Prominent leaders of the Evangelical Free Churches have long since sounded the note of practical defiance of the Bill should it become law; and a stiffening disposition shows itself among the rank and file. Plans of pledged assistance are being discussed, and defence committees are proposed to be in full organisation when the day comes for refusing to pay the rate. All this may die down into nothing, or into very little—the course of recent history would seem to indicate that the tough fibre of the fathers has grown slack in the children with easier times. But we incline to believe that a chapter is at hand which will long be memorable in the history of the struggle for religious equality. The Committee of the Liberation Society has passed the following resolution:—

That this Committee expresses its amazement at the reiterated assertion of Mr. Balfour that Nonconformist grievances are "enormously mitigated, if not removed," by the Education Bill; and indignantly denies that that is the case. The Bill proposes to stereotype the Clerical control of so-called Voluntary schools, while securing their entire maintenance from public funds; and also the perpetual exclusion of Nonconformists from the teaching profession in 13,000 out of the 20,000 public Elementary schools of the country. These and other grievances, instead of being mitigated or removed, are confirmed, and even extended by the Bill, and warrant the solemn declaration of Free Churchmen that they will not submit to the Government proposals."

The International Co-operative Alliance has been holding its Fifth Congress during this week, at Manchester. The reports on the position of Co-operation in various countries show a very general advance, though full and reliable statistics are not in all cases obtainable. In England the increase is in the volume of trade done by existing societies, not the formation of new ones, and co-operative production has increased chiefly through enlarged manufacturing activity of the Co-operative Wholesale Society, not in the formation of distinct societies of workers in each trade. In France co-operative production continues to be most characteristic, and is to a considerable extent aided by State funds, but in the two years since last congress distributive trade has made most notable advance. Germany reports a rapid increase in recent years; co-operative credit and banking, which have taken no hold in England, are widely developed there, as also to a lesser extent in France and other Continental countries. In Belgium co-operative organisations have been seized upon and used for political purposes. In Austria and Hungary and Switzerland there is continued growth; while in Russia, Spain, United States and Canada, for various reasons, the movement has as yet no great place in the practical industrial activity of the people. One of the most remarkable and rapid developments of recent years is that of Co-operative Creameries, especially in Denmark and Sweden, and also in dealing with eggs, bacon and meat, and other farm-produce.

Profit-sharing was one of the earliest subjects for discussion. Delegates showed themselves by no means of one mind. Although the resolution moved by Mr. G. J. Holyoake, affirming the desirability of propaganda in favour of profit-sharing, especially among employers, that they might realise the advantages they would derive from it, was carried, the voting for and against was nearly equal. It was objected that if the workmen shared in the profits made by their employers they lost interest in their common welfare, and looked more to their own interests, and that this would retard true co-operation.

Very important subjects are to be considered before the end of the conference: the Housing of the Working Classes, Land Settlement and the Peaceful Solution of Social Questions. Co-operators have the opportunity and resources for dealing effectively with all these questions, and their deliberations have the greater significance because, if they choose, they can give immediate practical effect to their resolutions. Attendance is restricted to delegates and members of the Alliance, and a few invited guests; and voting is strictly confined to delegates commissioned for the purpose by co-operative societies connected with the Alliance. The votes, therefore, do not merely show which way the wind blows, but which way co-operators intend to move.

Unity (Chicago) says that the election of the Rev. Franklin W. Southworth to the Presidentship of the Meadville Theological School "takes from the Western Unitarian Conference a secretary of growing efficiency and puts the school into the hands of a young man whose training, both academic and ministerial, warrants the expectation of efficient work." Our contemporary adds the reminder that the best men possible are needed, for divinity schools in the States "represent the only department of education that, so far as numbers are concerned, is absolutely on the decline."

Mr. C. E. Maurice sends us the appeal of the South African Women and Children Distress Fund for further aid in refurnishing homes desolated by the late war, and providing for orphans. The need is urgent, the potencies for good immense. Particulars will be supplied on application to Mr. Maurice as secretary, 32, Bedford Hotel-chambers, W.C., and contributions may be sent to the Lady Farrer, 3, Whitehall-court, S.W.

MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD.

Our readers will learn with great regret that Professor Upton, who has passed the advanced age of three score years and ten, has resigned the Chair of Philosophy in the College. Upon receiving the resignation, the Committee passed the following resolution:—

That this Committee, having received the resignation by Professor Upton of the Chair of Philosophy, held by him for twenty-seven years with so much distinction, and with such benefit to the College and its students, place on record their grateful appreciation of the services which he has so long rendered, with an intellectual power and philosophical acquirement and a moral and spiritual insight into the great problems with which he was called upon to deal, that have made him a worthy successor of his great teacher, Dr. Martineau. That, in regretfully accepting Mr. Upton's resignation, to take effect at the close of the Session 1902-3, the Committee request him to hold the position of Professor Emeritus, giving occasional courses of lectures on religious philosophy, or other topics connected with his chair, on terms to be arranged. That the Committee hope that he may thus long remain associated with the College, and continue to exercise that inspiring personal influence which has won for him the deep affection of so many generations of students.

East Cheshire Christian Union Grand Bazaar.—Following upon resolutions passed at the last annual meeting of the Union at Ashton it has been decided to hold the grand bazaar in Manchester in October, 1903. Its main objects include the provision of a fund the interest of which shall be used as supplementary to the ordinary income of the Union in its missionary undertakings, which may then be immediately extended; the grant of a sum sufficiently large to enable the Ashton congregation to proceed with its building scheme, and grants to churches in the Union which require special assistance in the discharge of building debts already accumulated. For these objects it is necessary that a sum of not less than £5,000 should be raised. As in the case of the Manchester and London bazaars, it is anticipated that liberal support will be given from many outside sources. The Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire at its last annual meeting at Altrincham passed a resolution pledging its assistance, and, we understand, has already communicated with its Churches. In the Union itself the various congregations are forming local committees of ladies and gentlemen which will be in direct touch with the General Bazaar Committee, a strong executive has charge of all preliminary business, and a number of sub-committees are practically formed for the oversight and control of the various departments of the bazaar. It is expected that the whole organisation will be in definite working order by the end of next September. The following officers are elected:—President, Rev. H. E. Dowson; Chairman of Executive, Rev. B. C. Constable; Treasurer, W. Hudson, Esq.; Secretaries, Rev. W. C. Hall and J. W. Wells, Esq. At the last meeting of the General Committee Mr. James R. Beard specially attended to deliver an address on the methods and working of the Manchester Bazaar, and his suggestions were received with great interest and cordiality.

THE REPROACH OF THE MINISTRY.*

BY THE REV. CHARLES HARGROVE, M.A.

"Study to show thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, handling aright the word of truth." —2 Timothy ii., 15.

"Seeing we have this ministry we faint not. By the manifestation of the truth commending ourselves to every man's conscience in the sight of God."—2 Cor. iv., 1, 2.

IT is for the ministry of religion we are met here to-night; some of us already engaged in it as the business of our lives, some just undertaking its duties and its responsibilities, some preparing themselves by study and practice for recognition in its ranks, all of you by your presence here giving countenance and support to the calling to which others have devoted their lives.

Money, time, thought, labour, zeal, how much there goes to the maintenance of the ministry year by year!—and lives of men!—hundreds of thousands making this their whole work, staking upon the worth of it the salvation of their souls. For is not he saved who at the end, all circumstances and conditions considered, has turned his life to the best account? And he lost whosoever has devoted his time and talents to the support of vanity and delusion and superstition?

How much do we ministers give? Even our very selves. And how much is given to us in return:—the means of decent living, the disposal of our time and labours, the general respect of the public as for no other ordinary occupation; and most of all—that which we take for granted but is the most extraordinary—a hearing: tens, scores, hundreds, sitting silent and at least outwardly attentive while one speaks! And that not because he is so learned or good or eloquent, but simply because of his profession, because he is a minister. Verily in presence even of one of our smaller congregations may a preacher take to himself the reproach of the great Apostle of the nations, "Who is sufficient for these things?" "Five barley loaves and two small fishes" our mean provision of spiritual nourishment even at apostolic fulness. "What," indeed, O Philip, "are they among so many?" That one fellow-man should listen, while I speak of things which concern equally him and me and of which he may know as much or more than I, that were an honour and responsibility from which the best of us might well shrink; yet we deem a congregation of twenty or a hundred small, ourselves all unworthy that so many should wait on our word.

Yes, every one of us receives Sunday by Sunday a deference of which not the best dare profess himself worthy. My thoughts, my beliefs, my aspirations, my hopes, they are much to me: what are they to any other man or woman or child, that they should come to partake of them not occasionally but regularly week after week? It's an honour done to no other class or profession of men, an honour which may well make us blush and be ashamed for our unworthiness.

And yet the more sensible of us have none so great temptation to unduly exalt our dignity, for this same public, which supports us and pays so much apparent regard to our office and attention to our word, is agreed to hold and to express but a mean opinion of us in other respects. We are or ought to be something more than other men, they think. That we are for the most part something less, much better and yet not quite as good—this is what their speech and conduct commonly imply. It is the case as respects all kinds of ministers. Roman Catholic or Unitarian, the parson would be thought at once more and less of if he were a layman. And the same sentiment prevails through all classes of society from the peer to the labouring man.

It was one of the most distinguished of recent bishops—and to be a bishop of the Church of England is probably the most comfortable and dignified position to which any minister of religion can attain: he has not to make a prisoner of himself like the Pope, and he is better off than a cardinal: he is a peer of the realm, he has a palace and a large stipend, and is held in highest respect in his own diocese and without it by both Churchman and Nonconformist—well it was such a one, and one eminent among them all, who wrote when the debate on the Burials Bill was in progress:—"I was greatly struck with the tone of suspicion and dislike of the clergy and bishops that ran all through the debate. If the clergy wish to see lay alienation they should come to the House of Lords."* And again the year following:—"I am thoroughly sick of Episcopal life in Parliament, where we are hated by the peers as parvenus whom they would gladly rid themselves of if they dared, and only allowed on sufferance to speak now and then on Church questions after a timid and respectful sort."* And this from one of the best speakers of his time, who never failed to command a respectful and eager hearing whenever he addressed the public from the pulpit or through the Press.

Nor was this due entirely to the aristocratic haughtiness of the Upper House. It is remembered in the annals of the Commons how a great Prime Minister, trying to make a better man than himself appear ridiculous, alluded to John Bright as "the honourable and reverend gentleman." But why should it have been so universally condemned as an outrage on the decencies of political life this insinuation that a member of the House was half a parson? It was literally true in the case of the great Quaker orator; and if it had been otherwise, why should it have been deemed insulting to be called reverend? Or those who professed Christianity and listened every Sunday to preachers, why should they have been indignant if one of themselves was pointed at as talking in the manner and expressing the sentiments which are generally associated with the pulpit? Nevertheless, the expression was taken, as it was intended, for an insult and a sneer. The implication tacitly accepted by all who heard it was that where men of the world had come together to discuss the affairs of a nation, it would have been unbecoming and ridiculous to intrude considerations which were in place only in church and from the mouths of professional preachers.

And is not this a quite common assumption among all classes? Call a grave remonstrance "preaching," and all the force is taken out of it. "He talks just like a parson" is generally the opposite of a compliment. A friendly working-man with whom I fell into conversation in the train the other day told me how working-men in general disliked and distrusted ministers of all kinds, and how a sneer would be the usual quiet remark as one passed by. Does not the very name "parson" carry with it just a suggestion of not being quite sensible and manly? while "dissenting minister" is a qualification which needs no adjective to make it a term of reproach.

And among ourselves, where the distinction of clergy and laity is less recognised than in any other religious body, is it not frequently hinted that ministers like cobblers should stick to their last, that they are incapable in matters of business, that they should above all leave politics to the laity? (I am not speaking of "politics in the pulpit," that is another question, and for my part I hold that while a minister has no right to intrude as a politician where he has obtained a hearing as preacher, he is bound before God to declare boldly in season and out of season the great principles of justice and mercy by which all nations as well as all individuals are bound.) But there is an idea that if a minister engages in politics he is sure to be a little odd and impractical,—indeed is by his very profession obliged to be so if he is consistent. So that I have known people who looked upon the late war as necessary and just say that it was quite right for ministers to be opposed to it. Men might see that bloodshed could not be avoided, but ministers ought to see only the horror of it and protest against it.

Now this supposed, and I incline to think real, inaptitude of the minister of religion for political life explains the curious mixture of three parts of respect with perhaps one of contempt which is the common attitude of the British public towards us. We are too good for common life, and at the same time we are not as good as we ought to be. It is not merely that we eat and drink and laugh and talk and enjoy ourselves like other men, but we have all the usual faults of our fellows. We are indiscreet, foolish, jealous, ambitious, unforgiving, self-seeking. Make a catalogue of faults and vices, and there is none which is not represented among us. Even the grossest crimes from time to time are proved against one or other of our lot, and suggest the suspicion of other crimes which escape detection. They are no more saints than they are angels, the fifty thousand or so of Englishmen who call themselves ministers of religion. And yet there is throughout them—putting aside the few score such as may be found in every body of men (there was one among the twelve apostles) who are hypocrites and scoundrels—a certain leaven of unworldly principle. The lump is common enough dough, just what ordinary men are made of; but there is working in it and throughout the whole mass of it this superhuman leaven of religion. True, of course, that this is not confined to them. If only ministers were religious there would be no ministers, for there would be none to minister to. But it appears in them as something visible and conspicuous and constant. The white neck-tie, or round collar, or sober garb which does not conceal the calling, they are an affirmation of God's claims upon men. They are like the soldier's uniform; we are all supposed to be loyal to king and country, but this man goes about among us proclaiming by his very dress that he is ready to give his life at their bidding. And we, we declare that God is our king, and our true country not of this world, and its laws supreme over all human expediency, public or private. We may be, like Hamlet, "but indifferent honest," could accuse ourselves each one of offences and follies in abundance, but we are witnesses for God and His Law.

And so we are, or certainly ought to be, what the world calls impractical, difficult to work with. Ours to point out the straight course of right, to denounce all turning therefrom to the right hand or to the left, not to be deterred because individually and collectively we may be accused of having done that which we forbid to others. The saint is ever an awkward man to deal with, and though we are far from being saints in conduct, yet the perfect life is that which we uphold to men. One doesn't wonder that Herod in the end got rid of John the Baptist, albeit "he heard him gladly" and "did many things" at his bidding. If he could have been a little more complaisant and tolerant in that matter of Herodias the brother's wife, or kept his eyes prudently closed to the scandal! But John had not the discretion of the man of the world, he stood for the law of God, and to the man who had power over him of life and death, dared say as a matter of course, "It is not lawful for thee to have thy brother's wife." For which imprudent remonstrance he lost his head. And every minister of religion is for ever addressing the world with the same stern reminder, "It is not lawful for thee." Interest, honour, public opinion, expediency, party advantage and the like are everywhere recognised as motives for doing or not doing. But the minister is bound by his profession to intrude on every debate the peremptory consideration of divine law. With his sentence, "It is not lawful," to pass his veto, final and conclusive, so far as his co-operation is concerned, on every proposal not in accord with the supreme laws of justice and goodness and mercy.

No wonder that the world sometimes resents it. All the more so that he who lays down the law is himself by no means either infallible in his interpretation of it, or without sin in his observance of it. Nay, still more so, because it cannot refuse to recognise the obligation—obligation, not by any means to the parson's statement of the Law, but to the Law itself which he represents,—Law which is over parliament, over armies, over chambers of commerce, over every business small and great, over international relations, over private acts and intercourse.

It is of this Law we are the guardians. This is "the word of truth," committed to our handling, that we should proclaim it, explain it, insist upon it, not as from ourselves—who are we to pretend to be law-givers to our fellow-men?—but as speaking for the human soul, what it feels in its best moments, what it approves when it retires within itself, and shuts out the discordant voices of the world and is alone with God, "commending ourselves to every man's conscience in the sight of God."

And if there is a certain depreciation of the parson's office—beyond that which is justified by our insincerity, our unfaithfulness, our inconsistencies, and the manifold failings of which we are all conscious—and such undoubtedly there is—it is nothing of which we need be ashamed. It is "the reproach of Christ" in which we should rather glory,—reproach, which Religion itself shares with us; for while all men are in some way religious, almost all are more or less ashamed of allowing it. It is partly shyness, partly fear of seeming hypocrites, partly fear of seeming afraid; but for one motive or another, it is rare outside of religious assemblies to hear God appealed to earnestly in public or private life, or His Law assigned as reason for a course of conduct. It is not that men do not believe in God, or that they do not recognise His Law. But they don't like to confess it. "The natural man," as Paul calls the animal, concerned with nothing above this world and its interests and pleasures, this man, which is first and strong in us all, "receives not," he says, "the things of the Spirit of God; for they are foolishness unto him." It is of this "foolishness" we are ministers. "The things which are seen are temporal, the things which are not seen are eternal." It is of these things unseen we are witnesses. Can we complain if sometimes we are despised for such seeming foolishness? Indeed we have nothing to complain of. On the whole we get more than is our due. For ourselves it is little we dare claim; we stand to be judged not by men but to be "approved of God." If in his sight we are found workmen that need not be ashamed of our work, it is well with us though we should share on earth the reproach of him who was "despised and rejected of men."

But for our calling, the calling to which you, my brethren, to night dedicate yourselves, for the supply of which this college exists, there is no higher on earth. "Son of man, I have set thee to be a watchman unto the house of Israel; therefore thou shalt hear the word at my mouth and warn them from me." It is the mission of every humblest minister of religion. We are no prophets, we have received no special revelation on our own account, we know nothing which all men may not learn, we have no authority except that which the sanction of our hearers' consciences gives to our words, we are distinguished by no consecration from the laity we preach to, but it is ours to proclaim aloud what all know, "to warn the wicked from his way that he die not," and assure the forgiveness of God to those that "turn from their wickedness and do that which is lawful and right." It is ours to uphold the eternal law and promise salvation to those who heed it and walk thereby. There were no need of guide or warning if the way were easy and all men walked therein of their own accord. It is because oftentimes it is unpleasant and unprofitable that we are set to warn men, "This is the way, walk ye in it." And because the warning is unwelcome our message often brings upon us reproach: happy shall we be if the reproach fall not upon us that we ourselves have not followed the way we have pointed out to others!

Oh, my brothers, sharers with me in this glorious ministry of which we are all unworthy, "faint not!" As workmen that need not be ashamed, let us stand to our business, eager not for applause, not for remuneration, but to make God's Word prevail. "Say ye of the righteous that it shall be well with him," and pronounce "the woe of the wicked that it shall be ill with him," and though your hearers be few and your success small, yet noble shall be your work and great your reward from Him who set you to be His watchmen.

ARMENIA.

THE committee of the Women's Armenian Relief Fund have just issued a fresh report of their work drawn up by the Hon. Mrs. Arthur Henniker. From it we learn with pleasure that the people of Van and its province are showing the usual Armenian power of recuperation after stress and storm—that trade is reviving, that Van itself is being partly rebuilt, that schools are prospering. Indeed, by way of proof we hear that as many as twenty-nine native graduates from Dr. Reynolds' Orphanages are now working as teachers of village schools, and that there is an increasing demand for young men who have been taught in the missionary schools. As for the orphan girls, we are told that in consequence of the training they have had they are being sought after as wives, and that upon Mrs. Reynolds usually devolves the task of arranging the marriages. This she naturally feels to be a heavy responsibility. As money is now only urgently needed by the committee for the support of the orphanages, Mrs. Henniker specially pleads for help to continue efficiently Dr. Reynolds' excellent work—"for it would be tragic if it were crippled in any way, the possibilities being so splendid." Although the Women's Armenian Relief Fund has raised and transmitted only the small sum of £20,000, the good achieved cannot easily be estimated. It has given work to the broken-hearted, starving women of Van and enabled them to save their children; it has provided tools, implements, seed and oxen to the peasantry. It has repeatedly clothed and fed thousands of refugees; it has helped to build and support orphanages. Above all, the methods of providing work and of paying a regular wage have kept hope alive in the hearts of the Armenian people, and have made them patient and reliant under most cruel suffering. The money entrusted to the committee has gone so far because there have been no expenses incurred, except those of printing, postage and such-like! Not a penny has been spent in advertising—most generous and invaluable help having been given for years past by the Press in inserting letters and appeals from Dr. Reynolds. Subscriptions will be thankfully received by Mrs. Cole (hon. treasurer), "Danehurst," Putney, S.W., or by Francis Buxton, Esq., 50, Cornhill, E.C.

GREAT HUCKLOW BAZAAR.—We are requested to say that this bazaar is, to the regret of the promoters, unavoidably postponed.

Correspondents are requested to note that to be sure of insertion the same week, news must reach the Office by the first post on Thursday at latest, and the earlier in the week the better.

THE EDUCATION CRISIS.

So far as the Bill is concerned the provincial School Boards will, by the passing of Clause 6, cease to exist after March 25, 1903, and Mr. Balfour announced on Saturday, at Fulham, that the London School Board is to follow next year.

On Monday the Government and the Opposition came to close quarters over the question of the future management of elementary schools. For the moment the positions are reversed, and "the fight for the schools" means the struggle for a larger measure of popular control over the Voluntary schools which are to be aided out of the rates. The question of the management of the ex-Board schools, for which a new name will have to be found, and future schools of the same character, will be left directly to the local education authority or to managers to be appointed by them. Mr. Balfour, in accordance with notice previously given, proposed to omit Clause 7 as it stands in the Bill, and to introduce what is practically a new clause in its place, for it is much more than an expansion of the original one. The sections in the proposed clause applying to schools provided by the authority are as follows:—

(1) All public elementary schools provided by the local education authority shall have a body of managers consisting

(a) When the local education authority are the Council of a county, of a number of managers not exceeding four appointed by that Council, together with a number not exceeding two appointed by the minor local authority, and

(b) When the local education authority are the Council of a borough or urban district, of a number of managers not exceeding six appointed by that authority.

The debate on these details is in progress as we write, but we may point out that opinion is divided. It is held by some that it is unnecessary for the local education authority to appoint any managers for their own schools, but that the authority should themselves be the managers, as is the case in some School Boards. This would bring the authority into direct contact with the schools, and lessen the number of bodies dealing with elementary education. It is also doubtful if the appointment of two managers by the minor local authority would tend to efficiency, though much can be said in favour of local representation, but too often the principal aim of a minor local authority, such as a parish council, is to save expense and to keep down the rates. We agree with those who think that the local education authority should be directly responsible for the management of their own schools. Some measure of liberty in the matter will probably be allowed.

The remaining sections of the clause refer to schools not provided by the authority, i.e., Voluntary schools. This is spoken of as the vital part of the Bill—it may be so as far as the religious question is concerned and the proper control of public money—but other parts of the Bill are just as vital in respect to education. The sections are—

(2) All public elementary schools not provided by the local education authority shall have a body of managers, consisting of a number of trust managers not exceeding four, as provided by this Act, together with a number of managers, not exceeding two, appointed

(a) When the local education authority are the Council of a county one by that Council and one by the minor local authority; and

(b) When the local education authority are the Council of a borough or urban district, both by that authority.

(3) One of the managers appointed by the minor local authority, or the manager so appointed, as the case may be, shall be the parent of a child who is, or who has been, during the past twelve months, a scholar in such a school.

These new sections introduce with Clause 7 a substitute for a section in Clause 8, which gives the local education authority power to appoint as additional managers to the extent of one third of the whole body "such persons as they think fit."

Mr. Balfour's amended clause shows that the Government have determined not to increase the number of representative managers of Voluntary schools, but of this more will be heard. Further, certain restrictions are to be placed upon the choice of managers; the one third are not to be such persons as the authority think fit, but only one half of one third; the other half is to be appointed by the minor authority, and is to be a parent of a child in the school. This might appear to be a concession, but in reality it is a limitation. The minor authority may be much less competent to select a manager than the Council, while the parent, in many cases at least, may be under the thumb of the parson. But whoever these representative managers are, the "trust managers" are to be as two to one.

As to what is meant by "trust managers" it does not appear that there can be any question; at least if the statement of a vicar of an Gloucester parish is to be taken as typical, and he has admitted in print that the form of Trust he quotes is that under which the vast majority of the Church's school are held; the statement was published to show why the clergy must retain the supreme control of the schools. In it the writer states:—"The Managing Committee shall consist of the vicar, the assistant curates, and five other persons, who shall sign a solemn declaration that they are members of the Church of England." This enables us to see whom the representative managers will have to meet, though possibly they also will have to be members of the Church of England. To describe this as a measure of popular control which ought to satisfy Nonconformists is preposterous.

Over this Clause 7 the fight in Committee really began on Monday, and no one can say how long it will last. The Leader of the Opposition urged that consideration of the clause should be postponed, as it was quite impossible at the fag end of a session to deal with this vital part of the Bill. Mr. Balfour retorted that if the discussion was postponed the House might have to sit over Christmas. In spite of this veiled intimidation, one Member after another urged delay, in order that time might be given for full consideration of the proposals.

Sir H. Fowler pleaded very strongly for some compromise which would obviate the necessity of attacking and destroying the fundamental principle that popular control should accompany the expenditure of public money. If the discussion were forced, all chances of compromise would be swept away — it was practically a declaration of war. Mr. Balfour affirmed that the Government had pledged itself to the denominational control of the Voluntary schools, and it would not betray those who had sent them to the House. This was an unintentional confession that the Government are the delegates of the clericals.

Mr. G. White urged a point about which enough is not said—it was outrageous that teachers wholly paid by the State should be entirely in the hands of the managers of denominational schools.

Mr. Broadhurst voiced the objections of the Nonconformists to the proposal to leave two-thirds of the control to the present managers—they had always protested against contributing to denominational schools over which they had no control. He warned the Government against the wave of passion which would be raised unless the Bill was modified.

The proposal to postpone the discussion was of course defeated, and Mr. Balfour's proposal to amend the clause came up for consideration. The most important utterance in this part of the debate was that of Dr. Macnamara. He was glad that the Government had determined to put these schools on the rates, for wherever the rates were spent they must have the control of the ratepayers. He foresaw it meant that in a short time the Voluntary schools will become national schools in the truest sense of the word. The supporters of the Voluntary schools only contributed one-eleventh of the cost, and yet the people who paid the one-eleventh were to have two-thirds of the representation in the management. It was an untenable position; the Government proposition was impossible; there would be trouble, and the sooner it came and they had a national system the better.

Dr. Macnamara is not alone in the opinion that the granting of rate aid to the denominational schools is the beginning of the end of a system which has become obsolete, though it is struggling to survive. We have heard the same opinion expressed by churchmen, many of whom would be glad to be entirely relieved of the burden and the responsibility of keeping up the schools. It is becoming clearer every day that the only solution of the education question is the establishment of a national system in which the secular education must be separated from religious instruction; the Churches will have to provide the latter in their own way. No doubt there are difficulties in the way, and much opposition will have to be faced, but it appears to us that this is the unavoidable issue. Compromise might postpone it for a longer time, but the proposals of the Government will surely hasten it.

Mr. Bryce, as was to be expected, made a weighty speech, but all his serious arguments were met by Mr. Balfour with a flippancy which was discreditable to a statesman and only calculated to create increased irritation on the part of the opponents of the Bill.

The debate was continued on Tuesday with considerable earnestness and warmth on the part of the Opposition. Attention was chiefly directed to the grievances of Nonconformists in villages in which there is only a Church school. Striking instances of these grievances, almost amounting to persecution were adduced. Mr. Balfour admitted the existence of the grievances, but declared himself unable to provide a remedy, except by undenominationalising the schools, which he absolutely refused to entertain. Sir Michael Foster endorsed the opinion we have expressed above, that the only solution is to separate secular from religious instruction, the latter to be provided by private effort and cost. The attitude of the Government, however, seems to make all prospect of agreement hopeless; it is war.

In the Wesleyan Conference at Manchester on Tuesday a protest against the Bill was carried by 454 votes to 68.

OBITUARY.

THE REV. THOMAS WILSON SCOTT.

AT the Manse, Glenarm, co. Antrim, there passed away on the 10th, after a distressing illness of a year's duration, the Rev. Thomas Wilson Scott. A native of Scotland, he was educated in New College, London, for the Congregational ministry, but never entered on its active service. His sympathies were very early drawn to the Unitarian body, with its unfettered theology and wide charity. For a time he conducted the services at Paisley. Here he met the lady who became his wife, whose sympathies in his studies and help in his ministerial work were often referred to by him in most grateful terms, and whose loss a few years ago left a great blank in his life.

Coming to England he occupied for some years the pulpits at Lydgate and Horsham. In the latter place we believe he was particularly happy, and a small but earnest congregation fully appreciated his high intellectual gifts. Quite recently the writer spent a few days at Horsham, and heard many expressions of sympathy and esteem fortheir former minister.

Mr. Scott retired for a time from the ministry and went to live at Lochmaben. But meeting with pecuniary losses, he accepted the pulpit at Glenarm, a picturesque village on the Antrim coast, all the dearer to him because the shores of Scotland could be seen from it, and there for the last eight years he has lived a quiet but useful life, going in and out amongst an attached people.

Mr. Scott was an ardent student. He had read widely, and was ready with his opinion on most of the theological, social and political questions of the day. He retained his interest in books to the very last. Only a few weeks ago the writer on a visit found him reading a work of Plato in the original. To those who knew him well it often seemed strange that one with his attainments should not have found more conspicuous spheres of labour. Perhaps the strong Scotch accent, which he never attempted to overcome, was an obstacle; but to his friends the retention of this disability only emphasised his unworldly spirit and entire freedom from anything like affectation. His long illness, in which for many months he looked forward to the certainty of a fatal termination, was borne with a brave spirit and with Christian resignation and faith.

On Monday, the 14th, the funeral took place, the service in the church being conducted by the Revs. A. Turner, of Templepatrick, and F. Thomas, of Cairncastle. At the cemetery prayers were said by the Rev. Laurence Storey, of Christ Church, Belfast, for some time rector of a neighbouring parish, and an intimate friend of Mr. Scott's.

MRS. BOOTHROYD, OF BRADFORD.

To the long list of the most prominent members of the Chapel-lane congregation who have died in recent years must now be added the name of Mrs. Boothroyd, who departed this life on the 9th inst., at the age of eighty-five. Like her son, Mr. Byron Boothroyd, she had taken a deep interest for many years in our church and its institutions. At the time of her death she was President of the Ladies' Sewing Society. She was interred on the 12th at Undercliffe Cemetery, where a number of her fellow-worshippers had assembled to pay their tribute of affection to her memory. The service was conducted by the deceased's minister, the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, who said, in the course of his address:—

To-day we are laying in the grave the mortal remains of a friend to whom we were deeply attached. For many years she had been our oldest friend in point of age, and whenever we were privileged to be in her company, we felt that her presence was a benediction to us. Under any circumstances the pain of separation from old and dear friends is hard to bear; but to-day it is doubly so, for we are paying our tribute of love and affection to the memory of one the charm of whose strong personality attracted us in no small degree, whose zeal for truth inspired us, whose devotion to every good cause which she could help was an example to us, and whose happy and buoyant old age encouraged us on life's rough pathway. She was one of those who, under favourable circumstances, become the world's heroines. Setting aside the traditions of her family, and following the dictates of her reason and conscience, she occasionally attended the services at the old chapel as far back as forty years ago. For twenty-five years she has been one of our most devoted members, and within that time she concentrated the zeal and enthusiasm of a whole life. While she had strength she was a devout worshipper at the "dear place," as she called the chapel in her last days. As the shadows were gathering round her, and she knew that the night was coming—a night after which she hoped to see a glorious morrow—it was her only regret that she had not been able to the last to join her friends and fellow-believers at the "dear place" where she commanded the respect and won the affection of all alike. A few days before she passed into the higher life, when she had scarcely enough strength to make herself heard, she desired her dear ones who ministered to her to bid for her an affectionate farewell to all her fellow-worshippers, both young and old. With her it was not a final farewell, but only "till we meet again," where death cannot touch us. She also sent an earnest message to us all, calling upon us to be true to our cause. It was her dying wish that all who in this district profess the faith that was so dear to her should do their utmost by word and deed to extend the influence and usefulness of our Church.

Mr. Jones also referred to her undiminished interest in public affairs as she grew old, and concluded by a few words of personal affection and exalted hope.

On Sunday morning, July 13, a memorial service was held at the Chapel-lane Chapel. Mr. Ceredig Jones chose for his text, Judges v. 7—"I arose, a mother in Israel," and alluded in feeling terms to the virtues of the departed.

SYMPATHY WITH MUSLIMS.

SIR,—Some time ago you were good enough to insert some letters on sympathy with Muslims. I have just received a communication from my Muslim friend at Madras, which contains some paragraphs which may interest your readers. A. D. TYSSEN.

The Muslim gentleman writes:—

Here in Royapettah we have opened a lecture hall called the "Unity Hall," where lectures on liberal religion are delivered. The hall for the present is maintained by a liberal-hearted gentleman, Mr. White by name. Should an energetic gentleman from England of the Unitarian Church come and work he will have here a good field.

In this connection I should like to invite the attention of the Unitarian Christians to their co-operation with Muslims, and working for the good of the human race. Mussulmans, as a rule, are more kindly disposed towards Unitarian Christianity than any other; since there is very little difference between the two.

We are, indeed, very sorry to hear of our dear King-Emperor's illness. Public prayers are offered in all Muslim mosques here for His Majesty's speedy recovery. Every true Moslem is convinced that if Mussulmans should ever work their regeneration it should be under the British régime.

THE UNITARIAN HOUSEHOLD OF FAITH.

SIR,—With reference to Miss Sharpe's letter in your last issue, kindly permit me to express my belief that many others of your readers have "discarded all theologies," yet consider themselves Unitarians, and continue to be warmly interested in Unitarianism. Such persons approve the Unitarian interpretation of the Scriptures and admire the reverent rationalism and the tolerant spirit that have been characteristic of the denomination throughout its course of well-nigh 200 years. Nor are they unmindful of its valuable service to the cause of reasonable religion, by affording weekly opportunities to some 300, for the most part, highly educated men, to illustrate and advocate freedom of speech, to preach an enlightened theology, and teach a simple ethical religion.

Thus can those who have outgrown a spiritualistic and authoritative religion find a home where their best thoughts and noblest aspirations may expand in a society congenial to their tastes and sympathies, even though it be founded on assumptions they do not share, and beliefs which they no longer hold.

To make men and women who have in all honesty and sincerity come to these conclusions and adopted these opinions feel that they are outside the Unitarian household of faith would be neither just to them nor beneficial to the cause of free religion. G. BEWLAY DALBY.

THE FRIENDS AND THE MINISTRY.

THE July number of Present Day Papers opens with an editorial article on "The Need for the Summer School Movement," apropos of the Friends' Summer School held at Windermere during the present month. To raise the level of religious culture among the laity, so that the advance of knowledge may be appreciated and its power made effective in the life of the community, is recognised as a serious need, which the Summer School may serve to some extent to meet. While the need is general in all religious bodies, it is keenly felt among the more thoughtful Friends, in whose Society the conditions of ministry leave the question of intellectual training more indeterminate than among others, and effective ministry is looked for from the whole body of members. "It is one of the extraordinary facts of Quaker history," says the writer of this article, "that the responsibility of a free ministry has been undertaken without any properly-sustained recognition of the intellectual qualifications for a searching ministry."

Friends have been more ready to recognise the direct spiritual needs of the minister, than the place and importance of his mental equipment. They have set emphasis upon the fact that the Truth is most compelling when the Spirit speaks through human character. And, of course, such emphasis is not misplaced. A message, however true, whether delivered from a "ministers' gallery," or a pulpit, must fail unless it expresses some reality in the spiritual life of the speaker. When a man fires at a mark with blank cartridge there will be smoke and noise, but nothing will be hit; and it is firing with blank cartridge to preach a sermon without experience. If we forget this we ignore the true root of ministry, but we must not also forget that an informed mind and an intelligent outlook are conditions of power. The weakness of the Quaker ministry, which in spite of all its peculiar qualities must be confessed, its comparative failure notwithstanding the unique opportunities which the times and the message afford, has in part been consequent upon the neglect of the human conditions of spiritual life.

Only faithlessness and folly can be indifferent to the progress of knowledge in religious matters, or ignore what has been accomplished by modern scholars. As to an apologetic resistance to the results of criticism, it is said in this article in Present Day Papers:

We may keep out the waves for a little time with walls of sand, but a rising tide has an inexorable force, and our castle must be levelled at last. Yet after all it is only the sand castles that will disappear: what is living rock will remain. For in the long run criticism is constructive, and we shall yet come to welcome it as another generation welcomed the "New Learning."

A genuine enthusiasm for learning and confidence in the power of truth declare that in the work of the modern interpretation of the Bible "enough has been done to quicken faith and to vindicate the work of the critics as the greatest and most potential reformation since the first centuries of the Christian Era."

The Bible was loosening its hold through our ignorance and misinterpretation. To the mass of men it is already an unreal book. It is the much-maligned critic who is restoring both its reality and its power. Yet the work is only begun. The mistakes of orthodoxy still bear their fruit, and on the other hand, as even the critics are fallible, there s room, with growing light, for much correction and revision. As this process develops, the ferment in religious thought must become more general, a ferment, however, not of dissolution, but of stirring life. We err when we deprecate criticism on the ground that it disturbs faith. The faith of the majority will be saved or quickened only by compelling thought and fearlessly seeking the truth.

This number of Present Day Papers contains also an article on "The Rise of Institutions amongst the Early Christians," by Mr. Vernon Bartlet, of Mansfield College, Oxford; some interesting "Notes on the Evolution of Morals," by Mr. Lawrence Richardson; an article on "The New Biblical Cyclopedias," by Dr. A. Grieve, and some book notices.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

IF when you are older, children, you ever have a chance to go to Norway, be sure and go; for nothing more delightful could happen to you.

We went from Newcastle across to Bergen, and then all up the magnificent coast, into all the large Fjords, winding in and out amongst the endless rocky islands, with great mountains both on the islands and the mainland. There were great glaciers, and the mountains were most of them thickly covered with snow. Look at the map and try and picture to yourselves what it must be like.

When I was a child we used to learn in our geography about the tropical zone, the temperate zone, and the Arctic zone; but I little thought that I should ever visit the Arctic zone! But after we left Trondhjem (which is a fine flourishing town, with a fine cathedral), we still went further north, and presently passed within the Arctic circle! And when we got to Hammerfest, which is the most northern town in Europe, we were actually further north than the point where Sir John Franklin's ships were abandoned, because they had been laid fast in the ice for a year and a half; and we were more than 350 miles further north than Nansen was when he crossed Greenland.

Well, we went on to the North Cape, the most northern point of Europe, and climbed the Cape, and looked out over the daylight sea at midnight. We had several times seen the sun at midnight far above the horizon, and stopped up to see him visibly rising again without setting at all. We could only go to bed by broad daylight, as there was no night.

But I want to tell you of just one walk which we took. We had steamed up the great Hardanger Fjord and up the Sör Fjord to Odde, where we went on shore; then we walked up a steep and hilly road, and beside us rushed a great bounding, leaping stream of beautiful green water with white foam; it came out of a lake above, called the Sandvenswand; and when we had walked beside the lake a little way we got into a tiny steamer, which took us across the lake to a lovely little village of wooden cottages, where the roofs were covered with sods, and were purple with lovely little wild pansies, and where the cherry and apple and plum and pear trees were all white with their beautiful bloom. Then we walked up a beautiful valley to see a glacier at the end of it.

When we got a good way up, we heard the tinkle of cow-bells, and presently from among the trees came dear little cows, with large wondering eyes, gazing at us; they came to be patted, and seemed glad to see us. And then a little further on came the sound of bells again, and then came bleatings, and out of the woods came running sheep and lambs, and one little black and white kid. They greeted us like friends, rubbed against us and asked us to pet them, and licked our hands. The little kid was specially friendly. They ran with us a long way, and you would have laughed to see the friendly little crowd running close beside and behind us, rubbing up against us, looking up in our faces, and bleating with all their voices! On they went with us, till at last the sheep and lambs stopped to nibble a little grass, and gradually all dropped behind except the little kid. He ran on before us, a long way further, looking back often, and bleating to us with his tiny voice to ask us to come on, and when we called "Kiddie" to him he always bleated in answer. We passed a nice broad-faced Norwegian boy, leaning against a great rock, guarding the cows; and the little kid ran up the rock behind the boy and rubbed his little face against the boy's face, and he kissed and petted it. At last the kid turned off from our path, and crossed a little wooden bridge over the stream, to some huts; but when he saw that we did not cross the bridge he turned and bleated to us. We could not accept his invitation, and when we came back again he was gone.

But the funniest thing was that when we came back again down the valley, after we had seen the glacier, the sheep and lambs seemed to be waiting for us, and joined us again, and came a long way back with us. We thought how nicely they must be treated, and how kind the people must be to their animals for them to be so tame and friendly. The Norwegians have the most charming little light-coloured ponies, with dark manes cut short, and forelocks hanging over their faces, and dark legs; and they fly along at a wonderful pace, and rattle down the steep hills with the little carriages behind them. They need no whip, and never stumble; and sometimes a pony has a little foal that runs along beside its mother all the way. I wish THE INQUIRER put in pictures, and then I could show you mountains, lakes, glaciers, cottages, ponies, goats and kids, and sheep and lambs, and more charming things than I can tell.

How sorry we were when we had to leave it all. But we shall never forget dear beautiful Norway!

You older children should read "Feats on the Fjord," by Harriet Martineau. It is a story about Norway, and is very charming, and helps one to realise the country and the life of the people there.

But there is nothing like going there!

THE "INTERNATIONAL."

OUR ever-alert friend, the Rev. C. W. WENDTE, of Boston, U.S.A., who adds to his numerous and successful efforts on behalf of harmonious worship that of linking together in concord the diverse notes of Liberal Thought in many lands, writes to us as general secretary of the Executive Committee of the "International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal and Religious Thinkers and Workers." He tells us of many signs of growing interest in the work of the Council, and he points forward to its next assembly. True, the date fixed is still distant; but it is not too distant for consideration. Great movements like this need careful organisation. The meetings which were held in London last year were wonderfully successful, as Mr. WENDTE says, and in saying so he very courteously acknowledges the good services rendered by our Association. As preparations were made in London long before the date of that meeting, so already in Amsterdam, where the next meeting is to be held, arrangements are being carefully made. We presume the precise point at which Mr. WENDTE aims in making his communication to us is that of securing the attendance of as many of our readers as possible. We very cordially share his wishes in this direction, and take this opportunity of bringing forward the claims of the "International."

We have spoken of it as a great movement. No one who was present at the meetings in London needs to be convinced of that. It was not only that large numbers were present, though that is much to a people accustomed to gatherings together of twos and threes. But as one after another from distant lands rose to address us, we felt the unity of the spirit as, perhaps, never before. A sense of the greatness of our heritage, our responsibility and our legitimate hopes, dawned upon minds long apt to miss such inspirations. Mr. WENDTE'S record shows that what was felt by us, who were in some sense the hosts, was evidently felt by our guests, and found an echo in many who could only read the printed addresses and sympathetically "share the triumph from afar." Our own pages did duty in diffusing these addresses, and in many other journals a similar service was rendered, in this country, in America, and on the Continent. The secretary enumerates, with pardonable exultation, the lands where "their sound has gone out"—Holland, Switzerland, France, Germany, have each one journal or more in which the meetings have been reported; he adds Hungary, Denmark, Italy, Norway, India, and Japan, as countries where friends have taken "encouraging notice" of the Council and its doings. He refers also to the volume in which, as he very properly says, "through the generous co-operation of an English friend," the proceedings were embodied under the auspices of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. Gratifying as was the generosity of the friend alluded to, it is equally pleasing to say (what Mr. WENDTE may not know) that the volume has been so widely bought that the cost of the issue has been practically met without touching the guarantee so promptly and so kindly made. The book is, indeed, rendered one of permanent interest by the notable utterances it preserves; and so steady has been its sale that we expect that, as the date of the next assembly draws near, there will be a demand, all in vain, for copies of this worthy memorial of the first meeting.

That meeting is fixed for September 1, 1903.

It seems far off, but it is really only one summer holiday away! And that remark may suggest to many—we hope it will—that in arranging their plans for next year's trip abroad they should keep the first week in September well in mind as a time when they should be in Amsterdam. No doubt between now and then some busy heads, such as arranged the recent trip to Transylvania, will enter into council as to how a large party of English visitors may be safely and economically conducted to Holland. The Hungarian tour was a great success, and if the numerical strength of the party to Holland be (as all physical science suggests) inversely proportional to the square of the distance to be travelled, we ought to show our Dutch friends that, whatever has happened elsewhere to wound their hearts and ours, there is abundance of affection here towards them, and of grateful admiration for the splendid services rendered by their race to the cause of civil and religious liberty.

Mr. WENDTE defines the aim of the International Council as that of bringing "into closer union, for exchange of ideas, mutual service, and the promotion of their common aims, the historic liberal Churches, scattered liberal congregations, and isolated workers for religious freedom in many lands." He repeats the invitation of last year:—

All under whose eyes this notice may fall, of any Church or no Church, who are willing to come together for the study of the essentials of religion as things of the spirit and purpose, things too great for dogmatic expression and too exalted for creedal affirmation or denial, all those who desire to see the world become better, and are willing to work together for this betterment, are cordially invited to unite with us. Our aim is fraternal, not sectarian. We will erect no walls of separation not already existing. We will endeavour to ignore them all, while emphasising the great commandment: Love to God and love to man.

With such ideals, the Council is undeniably pledged to a great work. The tides of thought throughout the world are swelling under the influence of the Spirit of Life. Amid the seeming chaos there is order. At times we see the law of advance betokened unmistakably. At other times we are fain to trust where we cannot see. May our word and work, our whole life, strengthen in others the conviction that it is really best to trust the truth, and not to shrink from it behind the shelter of anything that has been held dear, or that promises an æsthetic solace! If the world should see Liberalism to be only another name for Indifference, and detect a real Selfishness in those whose gospel is universal Brotherhood, who shall measure the injury we should do our generation? The salt must not lose its savour. The best way of honouring the common cause is to be faithful to our duties as individuals.

LOWELL'S COMMEMORATION ODE.

BY E. M. M., IN THE Christian Register.

ON the twenty-first day of July, thirty-seven years ago, Harvard University held a commemoration in honour of its sons who had died in the Civil War. Few even of those privileged to be present were able then to realise the full significance of the day; and many who might have been there and were not have looked back upon it since as the laggard soldiers of King Henry V. recalled St. Crispin's. For one thing, it brought first into general notice a young man destined to become an inspiring leader, who set before the people of his generation the noblest standards of thought and life. Phillips Brooks, then not yet thirty years of age, was chosen, few people knew why, to speak the words of prayer in the morning exercises at the First Church in Cambridge. Of that prayer one of his biographers, Mr. M. A. DeWolfe Howe, has said that it brought together and gave forth the whole sense of loss, pain, loyalty, sacrifice, joy, and sorrow which others later in the day were, according to their several ability, to utter. "That," wrote President Eliot, "was the most impressive utterance of a proud and happy day. Even Lowell's Commemoration Ode did not at the moment so touch the hearts of his hearers."

It is because of the Commemoration Ode, however, that the day, now men may look back upon it with the proper perspective, has assumed a national significance. It marked the appearance of the great poem which is considered by many, and with reason, to be the greatest poem yet written by an American poet.

Lowell's own account of its creation is given in a letter written to Mr. Richard Watson Gilder, where he said: "The Ode itself was an improvisation. Two days before the commemoration I had told my friend Child that it was impossible—that I was dull as a door-mat. But the next day something gave me a jog, and the whole thing came out of me with a rush. I sat up all night writing it out clear, and took it on the morning of the day to Child. 'I have something, but don't know yet what it is or whether it will do. Look at it, and tell me.' He went a little way apart with it under an elm-tree in the college yard. He read a passage here and there, brought it back to me, and said: 'Do? I should think so.'"

We have another picture of that eventful night in the words of Mrs. Lowell. She told a friend that, after Mr. Lowell had agreed to deliver the poem on that occasion, he tried in vain to write it. The very last evening before the day itself he said to her: "I must write this poem to-night. Go to bed and don't let me feel that I am keeping you up, and I shall be more at ease." He began it at ten o'clock. At four in the morning he came to her door, literally wasted and worn by the passionate labour of the last six hours, and said, "It is done, and I am going to sleep now."

After such a strain, it is no wonder that a reaction came, in which the poet endured all the bitterness of "those retributive dumps which ever follow such sinful exaltation." "Did I not think, in my nervous exhilaration," he wrote four days afterwards to Miss Norton, "that 'twould be the feature of the day? And, after all, have I not a line in the Daily Advertiser calling it a 'graceful poem' (or some 'graceful verses,' I forget which) which was 'received with applause'? Why, Jane, my legs are those of grasshoppers, and my head is an autumn threshing-floor, still beating with the alternate flails of strophe and antistrophe, and an infinite virtue has gone out of me somehow—but it seems not into my verse as I dreamed. . . . I am gone under, and I never will be a fool again."

Even if it is true that, as Mr. Horace Scudder pointed out, Lowell himself, though a sympathetic reader, had "no such power of recitation as would at once convey to his audience a notion of the stateliness and procession of words which attached to the Ode," it is of course equally true that the poet failed to measure correctly even the general impression made on his hearers by that first reading. Its words fell on hearts deeply stirred by the events of the immediately preceding months and already keyed to a responsive pitch. It uttered the dimly realised feelings of those who could never have written two lines of poetry in their lives, as well as the exaltation of thinkers and poets. It was the actual emotional experience of years, distilled into the strong wine of poetry in as many hours.

Two introductory stanzas plead the right of the living to honour the brave dead,—

Bringing our robin's leaf to deck their hearse
Who in warm life-blood wrote their nobler verse, and utter reverence for the college, whose stern device, Veritas, has proved itself the seed-grain of high emprise in its hero sons. In the third stanza the poet comes straight to the heart of his theme:—

Many loved Truth, and lavished life's best oil
Amid the dust of books to find her,
Content at last, for guerdon of their toil,
With the cast mantle she hath left behind her.
But these, our brothers, fought for her,
At life's dear peril wrought for her,
So loved her that they died for her,
Tasting the raptured fleetness
Of her divine completeness:
Their higher instinct knew
Those love her best who to themselves are true,
And what they dare to dream of, dare to do.

The rising thought of the Ideal, which may transform our slender life with a forward-reaching sense of some more noble permanence, swells in the fourth and fifth stanzas, and leads so naturally up to the magnificent characterisation of Lincoln in the sixth that it is difficult to believe this was not written at the same time. The fifty-nine lines of this strophe are better known than any other division of the poem, and with justice. Its eloquence is not more remarkable than its balanced judgment. How many times in these thirty-seven years have these lines and their successors been quoted!—

For him her Old World moulds aside she threw,
And, choosing sweet clay from the breast
Of the unexhausted West,
With stuff untainted shaped a hero new.

Not only for the noble tribute to Lincoln, but for its expression of deep faith in democracy, is it good that this stanza should be remembered and kept a household word.

Then follows the lofty salutation to the dead, who went and who return not, or come only transfigured, secure from change and beautiful evermore. Even in distant future years, when the single deed has died from remembrance, the value of the national sacrifice will remain an imperishable gain, the divine inheritance of a new imperial race. Lowell confessed (in a letter written to Professor J. B. Thayer) to "a certain narrowness" in the tenth strophe, which counts as poor the outworn coronets of Plantagenets, Hapsburg, and Guelfs, when matched with a single leaf from the civic wreath won by the heroes of the rescued nation. He justifies it, however, as an expression of popular feeling as well as his own (see Horace Scudder's biography, page 66), and adds, "I confess I have never got over the feeling of wrath with which, just after the death of my nephew Willie, I read in an English paper that nothing was to be hoped of an army officered by tailors' apprentices and butcher boys."

Finally, putting aside all traces of anger or pride, the poet breaks out into a triumphant pæan of rejoicing for the country saved, and looks forward to the coming day of peace, when she shall have sent her armies back to their fields and factories and bidden her navies restrain their thunders. "No challenge sends she to the elder world;" but, with room about her hearth for all mankind, "she waits the morn of nobler day, enthroned between her subject seas." Then after a word of solemn gratitude the Ode closes with the now familiar strain of impassioned patriotism and the pledge of eager service:—

O Beautiful! my Country! ours once more!
Smoothing thy gold of war-dishevelled hair
O'er such sweet brows as never other wore,
And letting thy set lips,
Freed from wrath's pale eclipse,
The rosy edges of their smile lay bare,
What words divine of lover or of poet
Could tell our love and make thee know it,
Among the Nations bright beyond compare?
What were our lives without thee?
What all our lives to save thee?
We reck not what we gave thee;
We will not dare to doubt thee,
But ask whatever else, and we will dare!

The history of the Ode is not complete without Lowell's own word in regard to its form. Mr. Scudder quotes from a letter written in 1877: "My problem was to contrive a measure which should not be tedious by uniformity, which should vary with varying moods, in which the transitions (including those of the voice) should be managed without jar. I at first thought of mixed rhymed and blank verses of unequal measures, like those in the choruses of 'Samson Agonistes,' which are in the main masterly. . . . I wrote some stanzas of the Commemoration Ode on this theory at first, leaving some verses without a rhyme to match. But my ear was better pleased with the rhyme, coming at a longer interval, as a far-off echo, rather than instant reverberation, produced the same effect almost, and yet was grateful by recalling an association and faint reminiscence of consonance."

LORD ACTON.

II.

Liberals in the Church.

LASTLY, we have to deal with the small band to which Acton himself belonged. It was chiefly recruited from converts whose first enthusiasm had cooled down a good deal, men who were really devoted to learning and eager to unite Roman Catholic belief with a genuine love of truth. The most notable of these were Acton himself; Renouf, of whom I have already spoken; Simpson, who had a minute knowledge of Elizabethan history and is best known by his excellent life of Campion and his essays (less valuable, I take it) on Shakespeare; Paley, the classical scholar, and Oxenham, who week after week attacked the pretensions of the Papal extremists in brilliant articles contributed to the Saturday Review. These men were the champions of a movement which had its representatives all over Europe. Their object was the reconciliation of Roman Catholic belief with modern ideas. In France the movement was chiefly political and was associated with the "Avenir" and with the "Correspondant" and with the names of Montalembert, Lacordaire, De Broglie, Gratry, etc. In Germany the movement was learned; it was led by the professors of the Catholic faculties in the mixed universities and opposed the attempt to introduce the narrow seminary system for the training of ecclesiastics—that miserable system which has done more than anything else to alienate men from Christian faith and to make religion the exclusive interest of pious women. The liberal movement in England was of a wide character. It advocated a candour and scientific method in inquiry; it pleaded that Roman Catholics should send their children to Oxford and Cambridge, which were now thrown open to them by the law; it looked upon the Pope's temporal power as an accident which had come in the providence of God and might go in the providence of God.

Their Attempts rejected.

Such were the attempts at reconciliation, and one and all were rejected by the highest ecclesiastical authority. As far back as 1832 Gregory XVI. had denounced "the absurd and impious, yea rather insane opinion, that liberty of conscience is to be asserted and claimed for all." In 1863 a great congress of Roman Catholic theologians met at Munich to discuss theological questions in a scientific spirit, but with entire and cordial submission to the dogmas defined by the Church. Thereupon Pius IX., in a letter to the Archbishop of the city where the congress had been held, declared that this acceptance was most insufficient. A Catholic, he said, was bound to accept not only the formal decrees of councils and Popes, but also the decisions of Roman congregations as well as opinions ratified by the general opinion of theologians. Even this was not enough. Not only must a good Catholic reject opinions branded as heretical, he must also put far from him such as deserved one of the minor censures, i.e., which were "scandalous," "offensive to pious ears," or the like. Plainly the Pope was determined to make short work with the amiable attempt to reconcile science and faith.

End of the "Home and Foreign Review."

In answer to this brief Sir John Acton put a stop to the publication of the Home and Foreign Review. It had gone on from 1861 till 1864, had attracted the favourable notice of distinguished Protestants, notably of Max Müller, and in point of learning might fairly claim to be ahead of any contemporary publication in England. Its raison d'être had ceased to be—for its first principle was to draw a sharp line of demarcation between articles of faith on the one hand, the decisions of Papal congregations and popular opinion upon the other. The Rambler, which preceded the Home and Foreign, and with which in its later days Acton had been connected, incurred the denunciation of Cardinal Wiseman for its "uncatholic" attitude, particularly with regard to the Pope's temporal sovereignty. That, however, was a much less serious matter than a Papal condemnation. Now the Pope had spoken, and Sir John Acton bade his readers a dignified and impressive farewell. His views were unchanged, but he felt that it was no longer expedient to utter them. A forlorn attempt to maintain some remnant of liberty was made by the Chronicle, which ran its brief course in 1867 and 1868.

Against the definition of Infallibility.

Then came the council of 1870. Sir John Acton had many allies in his effort to prevent the definition of Papal Infallibility. The names of Bishop Dupanloup of Orleans, those of Bishops Hefele and Haneberg, by far the most learned bishops in Germany, will occur, among many others, to those who knew anything of the council and its history. Sir John Acton wrote the famous letters of Quirinus in the Allgemeine Zeitung. The sympathies of the great majority among English Romanists were enlisted on the side of the opposition. Dr. Newman spoke, though in a private letter published surreptitiously, of the "insolent and aggressive faction" which was endeavouring to force the definition. Many learned and prudent ecclesiastics in Germany and the United States were of much the same mind. But in the council as in other popular assemblies votes are not weighed but counted, and we all know on which side most votes were cast.

Lord Acton's subsequent Attitude.

With 1870 Lord Acton (Mr. Gladstone had raised him to the peerage in 1869) ceased to write on theological subjects. True, the council itself was not absolutely final for him. He had held and advocated the view maintained even in the later Middle Ages by schoolmen of acknowledged orthodoxy (e.g., by the great Carmelite Waldensis), the view that infallibility resided neither in Pope nor council, but only in the collective judgment of the Church at large. It was plain, however, that even here there was no escape for him. For a brief space a few bishops, notably Hefele and Haneberg, withheld their assent from the Vatican decrees. But ere long they were induced to submit, and the great body of priests and laymen followed the same course. There was "a moral unanimity" in assent to the new dogma, a unanimity as complete as had ever been given to any council whatsoever. The larger question as to the œcumenical character of a council from which the Greek and Anglican bishops were excluded was one which Lord Acton never seems to have entertained. He did not attach himself to the "Old Catholic" Church which was founded and still exists in Germany. For a brief space there was some talk of founding an "Old Catholic" Church in England, but nothing came of it. Such a movement would have had no leader.

Newman's Position.

Newman in 1870 was the one Englishman of commanding intellectual power who had opposed the definition. It was, however, the opportuneness of the definition, not the truth of the doctrine defined, which Newman denied. He was, no doubt, far more moderate, candid, and learned than the extremist party. Yet there was no substantial difference between his position and theirs. I remember most distinctly hearing Lord Acton say two or three years before the council, "Newman has always taken the Roman (i.e., Ultramontane) view; he has never even been able to understand the Gallican theory."* There was indeed one point on which Newman differed from extreme Ultramontanes like Ward and Manning. He limited the extent of infallibility; if even he did not confine it to definitions of faith, at least he declined to admit that the Pope's infallibility covered the numerous and miscellaneous condemnations of the Syllabus. But the council left this part of the question where it was. A scheme was drawn up and circulated among the bishops which, if it had obtained conciliar consent, would have defined the extent of Papal Infallibility. Whether this consent would have been given is very doubtful. As a matter of fact it never was given. Before the matter arose for discussion the Piedmontese troops entered Rome and the council was prorogued.

* This, of course, is quite consistent with the fact that he had strong personal sympathy with many persons who did not believe in Papal Infallibility.

Lord Acton as historian.

There is every reason to believe that Lord Acton continued to live and died a faithful son of the Roman Church. A friend of his has recorded Lord Acton's statement to himself, that he had never doubted a dogma of his Church. This settles the question, though we may take for granted that he minimised the sense of the Vatican decree. For the rest he gave himself to historical pursuits, leaving, alas! little more than a great reputation and a stimulating personal influence which outlives him. He was not successful as a member of the House of Commons (he represented Carlow from 1859 to 1865) or subsequently in the House of Lords. None of his projected books were written, and his only finished work is an inaugural lecture delivered after his appointment to the Chair of History at Cambridge in 1895. He also gave the Romanes Lecture in the University of Oxford. His few and occasional essays in periodicals were spoilt by obscurity of style. He did not seem to understand the art of writing clearly without ceasing to be learned. Yet a lecture of his which I heard at Bridgnorth just after the death of Maximilian and the French disasters in Mexico was a model of lucid and interesting statement.

The Future of the Church.

Lord Acton never despaired of the Roman Church. Was he right? On the whole I am inclined to think that he was. I do not believe that the Roman Church has any shadow of a claim to be the whole Church of Christ. Yet with all its defects, which are grievous and many, it fosters a beautiful type of devotion to God and man. It can, indeed, furnish little which is not given with far greater purity, with more chaste and perfect beauty by the Church of England. Still it offers a home to many who have to choose between it and the baldness and coldness of, e.g., foreign Calvinism or foreign Rationalism. Fallen it is from its high estate, and it is no longer the light of Western Europe. Nevertheless, it is beginning to show some disposition to learn from the scholarship and criticism which have arisen outside of its own borders. Priests like M. Loisy, prelates like the Archbishop of Albi, are hopeful and surprising signs that the Roman Church may still have a great and beneficent future in store for it. Faxit Deus.

WILLIAM ADDIS.

THE BRAHMO GIRLS' SCHOOL BUILDING FUND.—The Honorary Secretary, Brahmo Girls' School Building Fund Committee, Calcutta, under date July 3, 1902, wrote as follows to Mr. Ion Pritchard:—"The following resolution was adopted at the meeting of the Brahmo Girls' School Building Fund Committee, held in Calcutta on June 21 last, presided over by the Hon. Mr. B. L. Gupton, I.C.S. 'Resolved that the Building Fund Committee wish to place on record an expression of their lively appreciation of the generous help (£205 5s.) from the subscribers in England, and to express their gratitude for the interest and sympathy they have evinced in the cause of female education in Bengal.'"

MANCHESTER DISTRICT ASSOCIATION.

IT may interest some readers of THE INQUIRER to know something of the latest scheme of work launched by the above-named Association for the purpose of stimulating the life of its constituent churches, and increasing enthusiasm for the common cause we all ought to desire to advance. There are those who insinuate that we try too many new things. We answer that we prefer harnessing a fresh horse to whipping a tired one. We do not claim to have yet reached perfection in our methods; nor do we wish it to be understood that any of our schemes have proved failures. Nothing of the kind. We have broken new ground, started new movements, and although in some cases development has been slow, each effort has more than justified the time and money spent upon it. Our Forward Movement is neither completed nor abandoned; but our tactics have changed to meet new conditions and growing needs. The recent scheme of special services and lectures in our own churches as well as in public halls served its purpose and did much good; but even then we had another scheme in embryo waiting for a favourable opportunity for elaboration. One scheme at a time is enough if the requisite energy is to be thrown into it. The one to which I am about to refer in detail was suggested by an earnest member of our Governing Body whose intimate connection with several of our struggling churches revealed to him the fact that many of our churches already in existence wanted stimulating from the centre—wanted, amongst other things, the strength which comes from a full sense of association with other congregations banded together for the advancement of the same religious life. Although here in Manchester our churches are comparatively close together, yet they are not so close as to prevent a discouraging feeling of isolation creeping in, and an impression that each has to fight for its own hand. In face of the vast populations growing in all directions, and of the apparent indifference to the appeals of religion, this tendency is all the more lamentable. The District Association, however, exists primarily for the purpose of making the various churches feel that they are sympathetically united in common aspiration and work, and that interest is taken by all in the difficulties and achievements and needs of every one; and so a "scheme for extending the influence and usefulness of the Association" has been carefully elaborated and launched, and certainly its inception has been blessed. Its preamble runs as follows:—

Conscious of having a glorious gospel to preach for the saving of souls from sin and superstition, believing that the Association may be the means of renewing the zeal and enthusiasm of our churches in the propagation of the great principles of the "Fatherhood of God" and the "Brotherhood of Man," and recognising the desirability of a revival of interest among the members of the churches comprising the Association, the Governing Body offers to visit in rotation all the churches included in the Association.

These visits are to be monthly, and the churches that decide to join in the movement are to be taken in the order of their applications. There is nothing stereotyped; and although a certain order of procedure is suggested, there is too keen a desire to render real help for any expectation of a particular arrangement suiting all cases. It is, however, suggested that there should be a religious service in the church visited at 3.30 P.M., tea at 5 P.M., and a public meeting at 6 P.M., under the chairmanship of the President or one of the Vice-Presidents of the Association; such meeting to be opened with hymn and prayer, and to be addressed by two or three speakers—one of whom the visited church should appoint. Three weeks or a month before the visit it is suggested that a member of the Governing Body should give a suitable address to the Sunday-school, so as to secure the interest of scholars and teachers. All concerned in both church and school are urged to co-operate in securing the success of the gathering:—

A syllabus of visits, arranged as far ahead as possible, will be printed and issued to each church and Sunday-school in connection with the Association, with a request to the respective ministers and superintendents to exhort their members and teachers to accompany the members of the Governing Body in their visits to the churches with a view of connecting the bond of friendship between individual members, and of encouraging by their presence and sympathy the work of all the churches.

The objects of the religious service and the public meeting are to be:—

(a) To realise more fully the joy and privilege of our Gospel, the need of personal devotion to our ideals, and of zeal and sacrifice in bringing that Gospel to the knowledge of others:—

(b) To emphasize the need of seizing every opportunity for united work, having in view the individual freedom enjoyed by our churches, which makes the voluntary manifestation of loving sympathy in each other's labours all the more necessary and helpful; to this end it is most desirable that loyalty to the District Association should be assured in all its arrangements for joint meetings and services.

The first church to avail itself of the scheme was Urmston. The weather was unfortunately very inclement during the afternoon and evening on which the meetings were held; yet, notwithstanding, the attendances were highly encouraging. There was the true ring in all that was said, and the right spirit was manifest in those who came to listen. The resident congregation felt that they had derived great good from the meetings, in which members of other churches joined them in a true brotherly spirit. This took place in June, and it was thought that the following summer months, which are given up so much to holidays, would not be favourable for the holding of succeeding gatherings; so a continuation of them is postponed until the autumn. Meanwhile a number of other churches have sent in applications; in fact, commencing in October next, meetings are already fixed and arranged for, enough almost to carry us on to next midsummer. Does not this fact indicate the existence of a keenly felt need for the deepening of our spiritual life, for neighbourly co-operation in religious worship and service, and of a yearning to extend the influence of our corporate religious life? Ministers and laymen are heartily joining in this scheme, and willingly undertaking the work which they are called upon to do in connection with it. No one is so foolishly sanguine as to suppose that this is going to prove, by itself, the cure for all our ills, and the supplier of all our wants; but some of us, if not all, do believe that it will stir us up emotionally, give us heart, banish any lurking sense of isolation, and make us feel that we are unitedly engaged in the advancement of a cause which is worthy of all our strength and resource, and which will in due time reap its harvest, if we, the labourers, grow neither weary nor faint-hearted.

CHARLES ROPER.

NOTES OF THE TEACHERS' SUMMER SESSION AT OXFORD.

As an appendix to Miss Pritchard's account in last week's INQUIRER of the Summer Session for Sunday-school Teachers, held at Manchester College, Oxford, July 4 to 12, we may add here a few notes of some of the lectures:—

The Sunday-school.—Failure or Success?

Mr. Ion Pritchard, in his lecture on this subject, said at the outset that there was no ground for any talk of absolute failure. Statistics were useful, and should be carefully kept. Where in some instances figures had shown a falling off it simply meant that the statistics were more accurate than formerly; and, on the whole, of recent years their numbers had been fairly maintained. Statistics, however, could tell very little of the most important results of their work in the building up of character.

There had been searchings of heart in all religious bodies as to the causes of comparative failure in Sunday-school work. Of these Mr. Pritchard gave some instances, with suggestions of remedy. To counteract the negligence and indifference of parents quarterly reports of the children's attendance were recommended to be personally delivered by the teacher, thus affording a natural opportunity for friendly talk. To counteract cheap literature of the penny-dreadful type the school library should be improved; and in matters which were a drain upon the teachers' resources, which ought not to be allowed, the congregation should step in, with a keener sense of responsibility to supply the need. The deterring effect of compulsory attendance should be met by making the school really attractive, with as little monotonous routine as possible. Care should also be taken not to present the Bible to the children in an unattractive form. The matter of good print should be attended to, and Dent's Temple edition of the separate books, though unfortunately in the Authorised version, was to be recommended. The unfortunate effect of the negligent teaching of an antiquated theology was also noted, and a plea made for the raising of the status of teachers, seeing that their work was deserving of more honour than, as a rule, it received. The school, as the Rev. E. A. Horton had said, was the educational department of the Church; it was essential, above all else, that the right atmosphere and good temper should be maintained; too much care and devotion could not be expended on such work.

Music in our Sunday-schools.

The last of the practical lectures given during the session was on music, by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant. He quoted from the Apocrypha an exhortation, "When ye praise the Lord, put forth all your strength," and asked whether they had always done what they could to make the children appreciate the best music of the church. Of good tune-books he specially commended the "Hymns and Choral Songs" published by the Manchester District Sunday School Association, and a volume of "School Hymns" by the Sunday School Union. It was good also to train the children in chanting, and much could be done with the help of special music, such as the series of parables set to music by Mr. Hugh Atkins, one of which had been published in the first volume of "The Helper." The following five rules were laid down :—

(i.) In every Sunday-school let someone make it his or her special business to attend to the music.

(ii.) Attend to the words. See what they mean, and do not think that every common metre tune will fit every common metre hymn. Attend also to the expression in different verses. Children were very quick to follow such guidance and greatly enjoyed the result in their singing.

(iii.) Aim at truth both in tone and in time.

(iv.) Let all join in the music. This was better than having a select choir chosen out of the school, to whom the rest were then inclined to leave the singing. Variety in the singing might be secured by letting the boys and girls occasionally sing verses alone, and other exceptions might be made; but all should have a share in the singing.

(v.) Utilise the instrument and do not let the instrument utilise you. Sometimes an enthusiastic organist was so carried away that no voices could be heard through the thunder of his playing; that should be avoided, for the instrument was made for man, not man for the instrument.

In the subsequent discussion more than one speaker bore testimony to the value of Mr. Hugh Atkins' musical setting of the parables, and to the pleasure the children took in learning them. Mr. J. L. Haigh urged that more attention might be given in school to the teaching of good songs, in preparation for the summer excursions, that they might be spared the wearisome reiteration of songs picked up by the children in street or music-hall. More attention should be paid to cultivating the children's taste; much could be done by maintaining a wholesome control even over their recreation.

The Sunday-school Code Book.

On the last morning of the session a brief conference was held on the subject of the Code Book, a first edition of which, edited by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, was issued last year. A number of suggestions for a second edition were made.

Mrs. W. TUDOR JONES, who introduced the discussion, spoke of the value of the Code Book, as calculated to remedy the great lack of organisation and method from which many of their Sunday-schools suffered. When they had often only an hour a week for that vitally important work of influencing the children's characters for good, and training them in the knowledge of the right principles of religion, it was essential that their efforts should be concentrated and directed in the best possible manner. To this end she emphasised the following suggestions :—

(i.) No teacher should be absent without providing a substitute.

(ii.) Lessons should be very carefully prepared. For this the Code Book could be of much help.

(iii.) The visiting of scholars, to manifest a real interest, and if they were absent, to see why it was. Teachers should also come into closer touch with the children, by interesting themselves in weekly classes, in the Band of Hope, gymnasium, singing and other social meetings, and so become their friends and advisers as well as teachers.

This would be valuable for cementing the children's daily life to that of the school and so to the church. Often the children, although they might have received intellectual information as to the teaching of Unitarians, grew up with no interest in the Church and were of no service to them or, indeed, to any religious body. The reason was that while their intellects had been fed, their emotions had been starved; the cementing power must always be in emotion, and this the teachers would awaken in the children by coming into close touch with their daily lives and making them feel the power of a genuine religion.

In the course of the discussion which followed, Miss Pritchard warmly recommended a little book by Mr. J. Gunn, on "Sunday School Teaching: Practical Lessons from the Study of Children," published last year by Nelson and Sons.

THE INFLUENCE OF PERSONALITY IN RELIGIOUS INSTRUCTION.*

I SHALL introduce this difficult subject by referring first to the influence of personality in that intense and powerful form which we call "genius." Professor A. C. Bradley, in a recent lecture on "Inspiration,"† said that there is a tendency in the present day to speak as if the Man of Genius were of no great moment to mankind; a tendency due partly to revolt against some exaggeration in Carlyle's doctrine of heroes and hero-worship—partly to the predominance of the idea of evolution, which appears at first to diminish the importance of individuals. It is perfectly true that the great man, in whatsoever sphere, is not a thing independent and apart; that generally he concentrates, intensifies, and realises more fully feelings and ideas which are active all around him; he gives clear and powerful expression to a spirit which manifests itself in the lesser minds of his age. This is true, and doubtless Carlyle omitted to lay sufficient stress on the fact. But this truth diminishes scarcely at all the supreme importance of the man of genius. Imagine him away; deprive those feelings and ideas in lesser minds of that heightening and that utterance which they gain in him; remember in addition that those very feelings and ideas are mainly an inheritance from preceding men of genius; and then see what the world would be without its great men. In truth, the man of genius is the main factor in human progress. Be his sphere that of religion, or science, or art, or of practice in morals or politics, or even industry, he comes; and something hitherto unrevealed breaks into the light. That which he brings, the new insight, begins its work upon the world, often, alas! in pain and conflict, struggling through clouds, and losing, as it conquers them and brightens on the common mind, much of the ineffable purity and radiance of its dawn. But even so it does its work; like a stream from a mountain spring, his idea divides and spreads. Slowly it distributes itself along the hundred channels of minds less original, and then along the thousand channels of minds less original still, till it has irrigated or fertilised a country or a continent. We are in our spiritual substance the spirits of the great dead. Let any one of us attempt to banish from his own mental being everything that emanates from their influence, and he will find left within himself scarcely anything that he would not wish away.

What Professor Bradley said is especially true of the Prophet, the religious genius, who utters truths that will never pass away, and makes them strike root in the heart and mind of the men around him. Such teachers, as Cardinal Newman said, are placed upon the watch-tower and light their beacons on the heights, where others kindle their little lamps, receiving and transmitting the sacred flame.

Why have I spoken so much of the man of genius and his influence? The work of those whose lives and words are a lesson to the ages—what has that to do with the work of teaching a small group of children, or men and women—children of an older growth? The truth is, that the humblest, lowliest worker in the most obscure sphere is made of the same stuff as the most highly endowed genius or prophet. The difference is great, but it is a difference in degree, not in kind. It was a difference of degree only that the Psalmist had in mind when he said that man at his best is made "a little lower than the angels." And as a useful metaphor, we may say that there is a difference of degree, not of kind, between, the acorn and the oak. In literature and art, at least, this doctrine is no novelty. However high we may place the genius of Shakespeare, we could never appreciate his works unless there were something, however little, of Shakespeare in us; and the music of Mozart and Beethoven could never move us if there were not in ourselves some faint beginnings of the power by which that music was made.

This is a truth based on the soundest scientific foundations; and it is a truth full of encouragement for life. The way that the great man, the teacher or leader of the world, works when he accomplishes (perhaps after a desperate effort or struggle) some labour of vast consequence for mankind is the way you and I work whenever we accomplish anything good and useful in our little corners of the world. If we are privileged to be instruments of good, it can only be to those who personally know us, who must ever form a small circle. But we are not shut out from doing, in our measure, what the greatest and best have done. Indeed, it has happened before now that comparatively retired posts have been filled by those who have exerted a real influence upon the times following them; just as in the arts and pursuits of the world, great and beneficial results, seen by all, have sprung from the work of persons utterly unknown.

Experience teaches us how all-pervasive, and yet how impalpable, is this personal influence in teaching of every kind. Every speaker, in a conference like this, is sure to allude to it; yet, if anyone tries to lay his finger upon it, so to speak, and to point out exactly how far it goes and how it may be controlled, he realises the difficulty of discussing it. The very word which we use to describe it has had an extraordinary history. In the early days of the Roman drama, the actors sometimes wore masks, more or less hideous, concealing their faces. They spoke through an opening for the mouth; and such a mask was called a persona—that through which the sound came. Such was the beginning of the word "person." What will be the end of it? A German thinker has used the word to signify human nature in its perfection, so that the two great commandments of life are—"Be a person, and learn to respect others as such." For our present purpose we mean by the word, something between the two extremes of outer mask and inner ideal. We mean by personality "the man's actual self, the man as he is in the eyes of his Maker"—so our fathers would have expressed it. It includes not only his character, but all his habits of thought and feeling, the stored-up results of his life's experience, and nobody knows how much derived from mental and physical "heredity"; and by a "person" we mean all this "inner life" in closest connection with the physical body through which it must express itself. Much of your personality is unknown even to yourself; it displays itself in the direct effect produced by life and action. This is what we call "personal influence"; and it is a well-established psychological fact that personality is contagious, both for good and for evil. "Imitation" is the name that psychologists have given to this fact; and they mean not crude, intentional imitation, but imitation of a pervasive unconscious kind, by which we literally "catch" from one another ways of thinking and acting which may form the seeds of a character.

All will agree that whatever good we do is and must be based more on our personality in its fulness, more on what we are, than on what we consciously say or do. But this fact has one result which is not often thought of; and to this I wish to direct attention in the secoud and practical part of this paper.

UNDER THE SOUTHERN CROSS.

IT may interest some of the readers of THE INQUIRER to hear a few words about the first Unitarian church in New Zealand. The Rev. G. Walters has told us of its opening services, and predicted the time when this simple little place of worship would be too small for its congregation. That time seems to have arrived already, for on the occasions when I was privileged to hear two of Mr. Jellie's lectures on Evolution, the church was crowded with a most earnest, attentive and appreciative audience; not a seat empty. He seems to be the right man in the right place, and keeps his audience spell-bound until the close of the service. The services are bright and cheerful, the music and singing excellent, and the pretty little pinewood church, with its bowls of fragrant lilies, and eager and helpful congregation, must be a great encouragement to its founders, and will, I trust, ere long be the parent of many other churches throughout the land. A member of the congregation assured me that there was an appreciable difference in the happiness of home and family life in the district since Mr. Jellie commenced his work there. The church is situated in the midst of a busy and populous district, in Ponsonby-road, Auckland, but some of the worshippers have eight miles to walk, and four trips on a ferry boat, in order to attend the services, for there are no trams in Auckland on Sundays, and the cabmen charge double fares. I also attended a meeting of the women of the congregation, called to discuss the advisability of their taking their share of the work in the church and district, and was both surprised and pleased to hear the young people express their opinions and offer suggestions as freely as their elders. It was decided to form a "Women's Society," for the dissemination of literature, sewing meetings, reading and discussion, &c., &c.; and the first task undertaken by the Society is an attempt to pay off the debt on the building of the church, and to provide funds for completing it by means of a bazaar, to be held in a few months. I need not say that any little help from the Mother Country towards this object will be gratefully acknowledged, as the congregation of the Ponsonby-road Unitarian Church, Auckland, is anything but a wealthy one, except in brotherly love and mutual self-help.

CENTENARY OF THE WELSH UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

THE meetings in connection with this centenary were held July 9 and 10 at Trebanos and Gellionen respectively. The first meeting was held at Trebanos, a communion service preceding the evening assembly. There were present the Revs. W. James, B.A., J.P., the president of the Association, Lloyd Jones, Liverpool, the vice-president, John Davies, Allt-y-Placa, R. C. Jones, Lampeter, David Evans, Cribin, T. A. Thomas, Llandyssul, R. L. Williams, Rhyd-y-Gwin, R. J. Jones, Aberdare, Hathren Davies, Cefn, D. J. Williams, Merthyr Tydvil, Tudor Jones, Swansea, W. J. Phillips, Nottage, David Rees, Rhondda, David Evans, Cwmbach, T. J. Jenkins, Trebanos, Jenkin Thomas, Pendleton, J. P. Kane, Dowlais, L. Jenkins Jones, Plumstead—representing the B. and F.U.A.; and the Sunday School Association—Mr. Simon Jones, Manchester College, and Mr. Lewis Williams, Aberdare.

Inspiring addresses were delivered by the Revs. R. J. Jones (Aberdare), Tudor Jones (Swansea), D. J. Williams (Merthyr), J. Davies (Allt-y-Placa), and L. Jenkins Jones (London).

On Thursday the meetings were held at Gellionen, beginning with an executive meeting at 8.45 A.M. (!) and including a Sunday School Committee and public meeting, President's Address, two services, and four sermons. The opening parts of the services were conducted by Mr. Simon Jones and the Rev. J. P. Kane, and the preachers were the Revs. R. L. Williams, R. C. Jones, T. A. Thomas, and J. Davies. The President's Address was full of encouragement, being based on the undoubted signs of theological change in Wales. Some descriptive notes of this interesting occasion will be given by "A Visitor" next week.

SOUTHERN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE annual meeting was held at Portsmouth on Wednesday, the 16th inst. The proceedings commenced with a luncheon, presided over by Mr. J. COGAN CONWAY, the President of the Association.

After luncheon the annual business meeting was held in High-street Chapel, the President being in the chair. The Secretary, Mr. F. PINNOCK, presented the committee's report:—

This, after referring to the great losses sustained by the district by the deaths of Field-Marshal Sir Neville Chamberlain, G.C.B., Mr. R. Belben (Poole), and Rev. E. S. Anthony, M.A., B.D. (of Poole), briefly summarised the reports of the individual churches. Chichester reported the election of the Rev. C. A. Hoddinott to the Board of Guardians. St. Thomas-street, Portsmouth.—An increase of membership. High-street, Portsmouth.—Active work in many directions, and a congregational protest against the Education Bill. Newport, I.W.—Some signs of progress and very happy work, and increased attendance at the Ruskin Society meeting. Southampton.—Mission held in early winter conducted by the Rev. H. Lambelle (of Middlesbrough), with meetings for women conducted by Mrs. W. Carter (of Poole). This effort had resulted in a quickening of the life of the congregation, and the Sunday-school had been re-opened. Ringwood.—Progress of last year maintained, great improvement in the musical portion of the service, and a general feeling of encouragement. Bournemouth.—Improvement in the congregation and very harmonious and helpful relations between minister and people. Poole.—Slight increase in attendance; marked improvement in the Sunday-school due to the constant and unfailing efforts of the late Rev. E. S. Anthony and Mrs. Anthony; the church recently cleaned and redecorated. Wareham.—Attendance about the same as last year; some good week-evening meetings held; occasional lantern services held after evening service on Sundays with satisfactory results. Parkstone.—Emerson Hall, built by Mr. and Mrs. Carter, mainly for temperance and philanthropic work; used since February for religious meetings and services Sunday afternoons and evenings; attendance never below forty and sometimes over 100; Mr. W. T. Bushrod (of Southampton) had been in charge of the movement from the first, and prospects were in every way encouraging.

Miss SPENCER presented the treasurer's report, which showed a balance in hand of nearly the same amount as last year—£51 against £54.

The President moved the adoption of the reports, which was seconded by Mr. H. Blessley, and carried.

An alteration was made in the rules, which will have the effect of making the Association more directly representative of the churches.

Mr. Conway was re-elected President, Miss Spencer, Treasurer, and Mr. F. Pinnock, Secretary.

A religious service was held at seven, the devotional part being conducted by the Rev. E. J. Williams and the sermon preached by the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, B.A. It was a striking and powerful enforcement of the value of the doctrine of the pure humanity of Christ, who became a far more precious example and incentive to his fellow-men when regarded as triumphing over their common temptations by the strength of their common human nature than when regarded as protected from the assaults of evil by the shield of special divine attributes, like the Greek warrior of old.

Afterwards a public meeting was held, the President, Mr. J. Cogan Conway, in the chair, when encouraging addresses were delivered by the Revs. C. E. Pike, A. N. Blatchford, W. Copeland Bowie, C. C. Coe, and Mr. George Cosens Prior.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Blackpool: North Shore.—The annual sermons were preached last Sunday to large congregations by the Rev. J. E. Stead, of Park-lane, Wigan, and it was pleasing to note how they had been appreciated. Special music was rendered by the choir; the leading soloists being Miss Bluck, Mr. M. Ingham, and Mr. C. Pollard. In the afternoon Mr. Stead delivered an interesting and instructive address to the scholars and teachers of the Sunday-school on the subject, "A Piece of Moss."

Belfast.—At the first meeting of the General Committee of the Association of the Irish Non-Subscribing Presbyterians since the illness of the King, the following resolution was unanimously passed: "The Association of Irish Non-Subscribing Presbyterians, by its General Purposes Committee, desires respectfully to approach your Most Gracious Majesty the Queen with the expression of deep grief at the recent serious illness of his Most Gracious Majesty King Edward VII., with heartfelt gratitude to Almighty God for the satisfactory progress towards recovery which His Majesty has made, and the prayer that he may speedily be restored to complete health, and may long be spared to reign over a loyal and prosperous empire.—Thomas Andrews, president; James Kennedy, honorary secretary."

Clydach Vale: South Wales.—On Sunday, July 13, the anniversary services of this congregation were held, the preacher being the Rev. T. Arthur Thomas, Llandyssul. The services were inspiring, and the congregations afternoon and evening crowded our little chapel.

Crumlin: co. Antrim.—A floral service was held here on Sunday, July 20, at three o'clock in the afternoon, when the Rev. W. E. Mellone, of Warrenpoint, preached a very beautiful and appropriate discourse on "Childhood." The audience included many of other denominations, and some of the choicest flowers were sent by orthodox friends. Miss Smith, of Antrim, kindly presided at the harmonium.

Devonport.—A special service for the induction of the Rev. G. Leonard Phelps as minister of the congregation was held on Saturday, July 19. The Rev. J. Wain gave a welcome to the new minister in the name of the Western Union, Principal Gordon, U.H.M.C., gave the charge to the minister, and the Rev. A. E. O'Connor that to the congregation. Mr. Gordon said it was imperative, if the new minister wished to succeed in his ministry, to destroy all feelings of worldly obligation, and think only of his duty to God and the welfare of the souls entrusted to his care. The lips should always express the feelings of the heart. When hearts he was trying to move remained cold, and the lives he was trying to inspire were dull and dropping down into the mud instead of soaring upwards towards the sky, he must not think he was labouring in vain, and that he was spending his strength for nought. Probably every true minister had passed through that phase of experience. He must remember that he had entered a vocation which opened to him the performance of deeds of joy, and that there was One who would mark his failures and successes, and be always a strength and refuge to him. In time the congregation would realise that God was with their minister, and they would say, "We, too, will go with you." Mr. O'Connor said nothing took the inspiration out of a minister so much as empty seats, and nothing would help a minister more than regular crowded attendances, thus showing by their presence their interest in the work that was being done. He wanted them to be not only hearers, but interested hearers. There might possibly be occasions for fault-finding with their preacher, but he reminded them that fault-finding was not a profitable occupation. By inviting Mr. Phelps to be their minister they had accepted a great responsibility, and he asked them to be faithful to it. Their minister would probably have but little of the sympathy of his fellow-workers in Christ's vineyard. He knew nothing of their peculiar circumstances at the present time in Devonport, but he based his remarks on what took place in other towns. Their new minister need care little for the coldness of those outside his church so long as he was surrounded by the enthusiasm and affection and the heartiest goodwill of his congregation. In the evening a social meeting was held at a public hall, which, in spite of unfavourable weather, was fairly well attended. Mr. S. W. Wright presided, and among those present were the Revs. Alexander Gordon, M.A., R. C. Dendy, J. Barron, and Mrs. Phelps (Cardiff), Miss Bond, and Dr. and Mrs. Bryan. Addresses of welcome were delivered from the Unitarian ministers of the district, and from the congregation, and after a stirring and characteristic speech from Principal Gordon, the Rev. G. L. Phelps made an appropriate reply, which was most warmly received. The meeting terminated with music and dancing. On Sunday, at 11 A.M., Principal Gordon took the service at Christ Church, and preached an eloquent sermon, which was much appreciated. The evening service, which was well attended, was conducted by the Rev. G. L. Phelps, who took for his text the words, "As much as in me is, I am ready to preach the Gospel to you."

Dowlais.—The anniversary services were held on Sunday, July 13, the preachers being Mr. Simon Jones, B.A., Home Missionary College, and the Revs. T. Lloyd Jones, Liverpool, and William James, B.A., J.P., Llandyssul. The attendances throughout the day were exceptionally good, and the collections much above the average. On Monday, July 14, at 2 P.M., a service was held to install Mr. J. P. Kane, Presbyterian College, Carmarthen, as minister of the church. The lessons were read and the prayer of dedication was offered by the Rev. R. J. Jones, M.A. Messrs. John Lewis and John Jones welcomed the new minister on behalf of the congregation; the Rev. R. J. Jones, on behalf of the ministers of the district, extended to him the right hand of fellowship, and Mr. Kane suitably responded. The charge to the minister was delivered by the Rev. William James, and the charge to the congregation by the Rev. W. Tudor Jones, F.R.G.S. Short addresses of congratulation were also given by the Revs. B. J. Williams, L. Jenkins Jones, J. Ewart Jenkins, H. Fisher Short, David Rees, and T. Lloyd Jones. The evening service was introduced by the Rev. J. Hathren Davies, J.P., and sermons were delivered by the Revs. T. Arthur Thomas and W. Tudor Jones. On Tuesday evening, at 7.30, a lecture on "Why I am a Teetotaller" was given by the Rev. T. Lloyd Jones, Liverpool. This concluded a series of very successful meetings.

Hale (Resignation).—The Rev. T. Robinson has resigned his pastorate at Hale Chapel, and will terminate his ministry there at the end of September.

Ipswich.—An experiment has been tried this month in the direction of open-air lectures on Thursday evenings, in the grounds of the Ancient Chapel. The lectures have been given by the Rev. L. Tavener, and subjects have included "Tennyson," "Browning," and "Omar Khayyam." We shall be interested in learning the results of this enterprising attempt to reach the ear of the people in summer-time.

London: Mansford-street.—On Saturday, July 19, a united gathering, composed chiefly of members and representatives of the London Guilds, was held at Chingford. Tea was taken on Woodbury Plain, fully fifty friends being present. After tea the Rev. John Ellis made a statement in favour of the formation of a local Guilds Union, which it is hoped will include all the senior Guilds in London and the district. The Rev. Frank K. Freeston, Essex Church Guild, supported the suggestion. Mr. Frank Talbot, Mr. Rose, and Miss R. Browning added favourable opinions on behalf of Highgate, Stratford, and Stepney Guilds respectively, and it is expected that by the late autumn of the present year this attempt at closer organisation will have taken definite shape and become fairly established. A charming ramble through the forest to High Beach and back brought a very happy half-day's outing to a close.—The eighteenth annual Flower Show was held on Tuesday, July 22, when a large gathering assembled to witness the exhibition of plants and flowers, and the distribution of prizes to successful competitors. The chair was taken at 8.30 by the Rev. John Ellis, who gave a brief opening address. Miss M. Gould arranged a programme of excellent music. A local gardener, who had been asked to judge the plants, gave valuable hints on plant culture. Mr. G. Foster spoke on the conditions laid down for the competition and read out a list of the successful competitors, Mrs. George Dawes Hicks delivered an impressive address on "The Ministry of Flowers," and afterwards distributed the prizes. Prizes were awarded for plants in various classes, table decorations, vase of home-grown flowers, the drawing of a flower, and a bouquet of wild flowers, and it was announced that a further prize would be given for the best sheet of pressed wild flowers to be sent in during the autumn. A hearty vote of thanks to Mrs. Hicks, Miss Gould, the gardener, and other voluntary helpers, brought a very successful meeting to a close.

London: Plumstead.—At a recent bye election for the Woolwich Borough Council, the Rev. L. Jenkins Jones, our minister at Plumstead, was triumphantly returned, in the interest of Progressive principles, by an overwhelming majority for the St. Margaret's Ward. Mr. Jones's majority of 227 over the Moderate candidate will be seen to be a victory for religious freedom in Plumstead, when it is understood that the Moderate party introduced the religious element into the contest, endeavouring to make capital out of the fact that Mr. Jones was the "Unitarian" minister, and stigmatising him as an Atheist, one who denies Christ, and who "positively did not believe in the devil."

Manchester: City Cinderellas.—The Rev. Charles Peach begs to acknowledge the receipt of subscriptions to the above amounting to £12 12s. He has, as far as possible, acknowledged all through the post, but two subscriptions came anonymously—namely, Darlington, 10s.; and "A Mother's thankoffering for the conclusion of the war in South Africa," 10s. For these and the others Mr. Peach expresses his sincere thanks.

Manchester: Upper Brook-street.—The Rev. C. Peach, in a recent sermon on "Reaction," said: A people spiritually free may even circumvent or transcend a bad fiscal system. But let the spiritual life of a nation be fouled, then you touch the springs of its being, and nothing but utter ruin must follow. And with what less than that are we threatened in the Education Bill now before Parliament? The Bill is the consummation of a process which has been in operation for the past thirty years. The School Boards are to be destroyed; the Sectarian schools are to be quartered entirely on public funds, while remaining under priestly control; and, finally, such inducements are held out to the ratepayers as to ensure that every new school of the future shall be a Priest's School. This is a sinister attempt to bolster up the Establishment. It is a violation of every sound principle of modern government, and a betrayal of the cause of Religious Equality. And yet I find some people dismissing our protest as a mere quarrel between Chapel and Church. That is how they read history. These children of the religious freedom for which their fathers suffered have lived so securely in its day that they do not recognise the approach of the night of reaction. Let them call it a quarrel between Chapel and Church if they will, but the chapel here stands for those principles of civil and religious liberty, without which no people can be free, and no nation strong.

Pentre: South Wales.—The annual tea-party was held on Thursday, the 17th inst. It proved an unqualified success.

Southend-on-Sea.—On Saturday last the Congregational and Sunday-school Excursion took place, when a fairly large party visited Hockley Woods. Favoured with delightful weather, the outing was very much enjoyed by all.

Swansea.—On Sunday afternoon, July 20, the anniversary of the school was held. There was a large attendance, and the meeting was presided over by the minister (the Rev. W. Tudor Jones). Recitations were given by the children, and an excellent programme of music, under the leadership of the Superintendent (Mr. W. H. Davies). Mrs. Reid and Mr. C. H. Perkins gave valuable addresses to the scholars. On the following Thursday the annual outing of the school (to Killay) took place. It was the largest party on record in connection with the school.

Yorkshire Unitarian Union.—The quarterly record of the Union—Forward—has now completed a year's work, and although its financial account leaves something to be desired, it appears to have done excellent service as a link between the churches in the Union. The editor, the Rev. C. Harvey-Cook, says:—"Amid much that depresses us in our corporate and individual church life, it is gladdening to record that during the last three months Dewsbury and Pudsey churches between them raised nearly £400, and this, too, without lessening their general incomes. Well done!" The Rev. E. C. Jones, of Bradford, gives an address pleading for "increased loyalty to our cause," pointing to the devotion of the Hungarian brethren, whom he saw last year, as a bright example. Addressing the laity especially, he says:—"You, my brethren, can do much to satisfy the claims of our cause by strengthening the hands of our ministers. This is especially needful in the case of our isolated churches. We have to 'tread' the wine-press alone. Scarcely any of us have a brother minister in the same town to whom we can go for encouragement and sympathy. For this reason I would call upon all who profess our faith in this great county to throw the whole weight of their influence on its side, to speak kindly of their church and its institutions in the presence of their children, and to their best to induce them to take part in every good work. If we thus honour our faith by our undivided loyalty, the time will come when our faith will honour us."

THE SOUTH SHORE UNITARIAN CHURCH, BLACKPOOL,

has purchased, at a cost of nearly £600, a plot of freehold land, and they now appeal for help to erect a plain, substantial building to serve for all purposes. It is hoped to be able to do this for £1,500, making a total cost of £2,100. The land, thanks to the generosity of Mrs. John Grundy, of Summerseat; Miss S. Scholes Wrigley, of Windermere (on her own and her late mother's behalf), and Mr. R. T. Heape, of Rochdale, is entirely paid for. The Congregation have themselves promised over £300 towards the erection of the building. They carry on the Services and the Sunday School without any grant, and they feel that the remarkable success of their efforts justifies them in asking friends to help them to carry on their work under more favourable circumstances than at present. Their appeal has the full approval of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, the North and East Lancashire Mission, and the North Lancashire and Westmorland Unitarian Association; and the B. and F. U. A. has promised £25 to the Building Fund.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

IT is with profound regret that we hear, as we go to press, of the death of Mr. Frank Taylor, J.P., of Bolton, which occurred at Southport on Thursday morning. Though Mr. Taylor's health had been failing for some time, the news of his death will come as a shock to his many friends throughout the country. He was only fifty-eight, but had done a long life's work. Deep sympathy will be universally felt for those upon whom this loss, real to all, will press most heavily.

THE education policy of the Government, as the local Conservative newspaper admits, was the central battle-ground in the North Leeds election. The return of a Liberal, by a poll that shows a turnover of more than 3,000 votes, is, under these circumstances, a matter of the greatest significance. If the Prime Minister could, even at the last moment, accept this intimation of popular feeling and, instead of seeking to please Convocation, could see his way to a conference of parties with a view to settling this matter in a worthy manner, much strife and ill-feeling would be prevented. Party men are cynically hoping that he will still leave to the Opposition so powerful a rallying cry. But there is more at stake than the fortunes of a group of politicians.

THE Rev. J. T. Sunderland, who describes in this week's issue a new way of teaching the Bible, has had an experience that will strike some of our ministerial readers as distinctly unusual. It should be premised that in Toronto, where our friend now ministers, the municipal authorities hold themselves answerable for the safety of audiences not only at theatres and concert-halls, but at churches and chapels. On several occasions recently his church-building was so crowded that the watchful officials felt it their duty to call on him to ascertain that the means of egress were satisfactory—a precaution, perhaps, fitting to our anniversary occasions here, but otherwise not seriously required.

THE Rev. Joseph Wood, whose labours in connection with the Birmingham School Board during the last ten years have been characteristically strenuous, has had to withdraw from this part of his public work in obedience to considerations of health. On Thursday week he was entertained at a banquet, at which the Lord Mayor of the city presided, and many of Birmingham's foremost citizens were present. Mr. G. H. Kenrick, in proposing Mr. Wood's health, drew attention to the good services rendered by him, not only to the elementary schools, but also to the technical schools and the University. He associated Mr. Wood's name with those of Dawson, Vince, Dale, and Crosskey—a roll of "great divines" to which he added new lustre. Mr. Wood, in reply, expressed his gratitude for the privilege he had enjoyed of serving the community in matters of such vast importance. He said :—

To give the children of the country a taste for reading was, he held, about the best thing the community could do for them. When they came to think of what it meant, how it opened up to them a new world of fancy, truth, and imagination, all the stores of science, philosophy, poetry—they saw that it was the key to a treasure house wherein were more valuable things than all the mines of South Africa could produce. To have been permitted to have some small share in the divine work of human education, to have worked, perhaps not unsuccessfully, in that great cause, and to have had one's efforts so gracefully and generously recognised, was to have had a full measure of life's happiness.

THE Wesleyans are heartily to be congratulated on the success of their Twentieth Century Fund, by which over a million has been raised. Their enterprise in buying up the Royal Aquarium for a central hall and offices is also a subject for congratulation. No doubt they will accept their proximity to Westminster Abbey as a challenge to do their best, architecturally and otherwise, with their new building. In another part of our paper this week an article will be found dealing with the most interesting debate, from an outsider's point of view, that has arisen at their great Manchester Conference. Among the other points worthy of special notice we mark the address of welcome given by the Bishop and clergy of the city, surely an encouraging sign of the times.

THE address of the president, Dr. Banks, was filled with earnest missionary zeal. He admitted the many signs of ardour, but, said he :—

The one thought which has literally oppressed my mind and heart for a good many months is the way in which the demands of the work both at home and abroad outstrip the present supply. "The harvest is great and the labourers few." We know what the abnormal growth of the population during the last twenty years or twenty-five years has been, and the great displacement of population that has taken place. Cities have grown up around the old cities. The people who used to fill the centres of the cities have migrated to the suburbs, and their places have been taken by an equal number of people of a very different class, and this process is going on to an increased extent. . . . . It is impossible for us to know when this process will stop, and this immense growth of people in the great centres of the country creates terrible problems for the economist, the philanthropist, and the legislator ; but, I venture to think, very much more serious problems for the Christian and for the Church of Christ. We have seen within recent months and weeks some most disquieting phenomena in our large centres of population, and if these people who are guilty of these acts of wrong and violence to their neighbours only once learn, as other classes have already learnt, the power of combination and organisation, the prospect not merely for the Church but for the country is very serious indeed.

DR. BANKS pleaded for two things in order to do something to meet the needs of the times ; first, "great elasticity of administration," and secondly, an order of "high-class Christian Evangelists." The latter point recalls the Rev. L. P. Jacks's suggestion in his Manchester College address, and since it is ever easier to "call spirits from the vasty deep" than to secure that they will come, it is worth while remarking that Dr. Banks, with all his eagerness for the rise of the great Evangelists, declared that God's best gift to their Church would be the re-baptism of their 2,000 ministers and 20,000 lay-preachers already in the work.

IN connection with the review of the third volume of the "Encyclopædia Biblica," by Mr. Addis, which will be found on another page, and to which special attention may be directed, it is noteworthy that Professor Cheyne, the editor of that work, was the subject of a vigorous attack in last week's Pilot, the moderate Anglican newspaper. The writer of the article says :—

It is time to speak plainly about this matter. The truth is that Professor Cheyne is using his position to popularise and promulgate non-Christian beliefs. Freedom of thought and speech are permitted in the Church of England—and we thank God for it—to a degree unheard of in any other Christian community. But there are limits to such freedom—limits which men cannot be permitted to exceed without serious disaster. No candid person desires to suppress free discussion, even of the subjects most dear to the heart of Christendom. But plain men, who themselves believe that our Lord was more than an ordinary human being of exceptional talents and gifts, will not tolerate the endowments of the Church being used to propagate teaching which cuts at the root of the Christian faith. Dr. Cheyne's position would be quite defensible if he were a "free lance," and if he had not voluntarily undertaken obligations, both as a priest and a professor, to serve the Church of England. But when a man finds that his intellectual convictions no longer harmonise with the doctrines which he is paid to teach, it is high time for him to consider whether he should continue to hold the positions of dignity to which he has been appointed by the authorities of the University and of the Church.

Nobody can deny that there is something incongruous between the position implied in the editorship of such a work and that of an Oxford Theological Professor and Canon of Rochester, so long as the pretence is kept up that the Professor and Canon is a pledged teacher and champion of orthodoxy as it was defined centuries ago. We have ourselves repeatedly expressed our wonder that scholars and thinkers whose utterances are plainly inconsistent with the creeds and articles should be able to justify their remaining in the Church. But in view of Dr. Cheyne's case, and that of other respected men who have frankly accepted the conclusions of the best modern Biblical investigation, and who still retain a connection with the Anglican or other orthodox communion, the question that arises is how far the supposed orthodoxy of the communion at large is a working fact. Is there not a general feeling that the Church's dogma is less tenable than it was; and are not most people who profess and call themselves Christians sensible that their theology is undergoing a profound change—into what they cannot yet clearly see? It seems so to us, and if things are so it seems unfair to attack the men who speak out. The question of doctrinal pledges is quite another one.

The Congress of the International Co-operative Alliance held in Manchester last week received reports from various parts of this country and from abroad on the Housing Question and the Settling of Small Cultivators on the Land. Co-operative Societies in England have the opportunity of doing much towards the solution of these difficult problems. They have large sums of accumulated capital which they do not know how to invest safely and profitably, and they can readily develop their activities in these directions with their present organisation modified from time to time as circumstances require. No less than 224 Co-operative Societies in England and Scotland have instituted building departments, and some are on a large scale. There are three general schemes of operation: the Society builds and owns the houses, or builds and sells them to members, or lends to members who build houses for themselves. It was stated that collective ownership by the Society was becoming more general, but in many cases all three methods are in use. A paper was read by Mr. Omer Lepreux, Director-General of the National Savings Bank in Belgium, showing how, through the agency of this bank, Societies whose object was the acquisition, sale or letting of workmen's dwellings, could obtain a large part of their capital from the State. Landrath Berthold of Hanover showed how enormous sums of money accumulated by the Old Age and Incapacity Pension Funds in Germany were available to build healthy houses, the capital thus being used to reduce the demands on the fund by supplying more healthy conditions of life, and therefore diminishing the demand for Incapacity Pensions.

Little has been done by British Co-operative Societies towards the solution of the Land Question; and in the reports of successful efforts made by other societies or individuals, very little was shown that went to the root of the matter. To lease an expanse of ground, divide it into small plots and re-lease it to small users till it goes back to the landowner, may do some temporary good to a few individuals and enhance the value of the landlords' property; that is all. And the purchase of an estate and re-sale in smaller pieces merely increases the number of landlords. The Garden City project, it was explained, would make the city and the agricultural land round it wholly the joint freehold property of all the residents—truly going to the heart of the matter. It is well within the power of English or Scotch co-operators to form a Garden City of their own for their Productive Factories which are rapidly increasing in number and size; and it would not be difficult for them to find the necessary capital with which to buy the land out and out. A resolution passed at the close of the discussion on Land Settlement was modified so as to satisfy those who did not see in Peasant Proprietorship or Allotments a solution of the Land Question, believing that the land should belong to the community.

At the last sitting of the Congress Co-operation was considered as a means of drawing together those who desire the solution of social questions by peaceful means. M. de Boyve submitted a definite statement of the aims of the Alliance which, as modified by the Congress, was adopted. It was as follows:—

1. That we preach union among all men, whatever may be their class, their religion, or their country, with the object of perfecting commercial and industrial organisation on co-operative lines in accordance with the principles of the Rochdale Pioneers. This Alliance has its foundation in true brotherhood which knows of no distinction between classes.

2. It does not aim at the disappearance of distinct nationalities, but at their moral and intellectual development, with the idea and hope of instilling into all a horror of murderous and barbarous wars, in order that such may be replaced by peaceful struggles of nations vying with one another in harmony to carry the loftiest principles of co-operation into realisation.

The enthusiasm shown for the humanitarian principles of Co-operation by delegates of all nations represented in the Alliance should help to keep before co-operators the principles and ideals of the movement which is in danger of dwelling too much on dividends, and appearances of profit sometimes in part delusive. The Congress adopted a resolution affirming its readiness to enter into relations with the International Peace Bureau and to co-operate with it for the establishment of universal peace, and another in favour of a permanent arbitration treaty between England and France. Señor Anton, of Barcelona, expressed what was manifestly the feeling of the Congress, that the world could not be considered civilised while wars were still possible between nations which possessed more effectual and peaceful means of settling disputes.

In a recent number of the Protestantenblatt was published a letter from Professor Holtzmann, of Strassburg, in response to an address which he received on his seventieth birthday from the Liberal Protestant clergy of the city of Bremen. Rejoicing to be recognised as a comrade, devoted to the cause of liberal religion, Dr. Holtzmann enlarges on the contrast between their position and that of men who have not the same confidence in the power of Truth. He quotes on the one hand the warning of a prominent churchman, lately deceased, to a young theologian troubled over some question of truth, "not to make an idolatry of his search for truth," and contrasts with that the nobler word of another theologian, one of the greatest of the present time, who concluded a recent rectorial address with the declaration: "The service of Truth is the service of God." That is a grand word, Dr. Holtzmann adds, which we shall all gladly repeat. And he proceeds:—

Indeed, there is no sadder experience than to see men who think that to enable them to serve their God in His Church, they must first suppress their desire for investigation, do injury to their sense of truth, give a twist to conscience, and do violence to their inborn uprightness of disposition. And all this only to force themselves into a world of things incredible, merely handed on to them by tradition, to torment themselves with what professes to be a higher truth, which yet to those concerned never can be truth, because truth before all else implies that a man must be truthful with himself. Jesus certainly desired to train his disciples under the discipline of his spirit to inward self-dependence, and God desires to have plants that grow straight upward in His garden. They will not for all that reach too quickly up to heaven, if their hearts are really under the humbling discipline of that spirit.

Yet, says Dr. Holtzmann, we are to lift up our heads and rejoice, even in the time of discipline, with full confidence in the future. A true manhood, in conscious relation to the source and end of all being, will find the solution of every inward crisis, and it is the task set us by the decisive earnestness of the present day, thus to arrive at a conception of life in harmony with every achievement of historical research, and every result of natural science. Final achievement may be in the distant future; but God, who is the source of all personal life in the world, will form for Himself "true and trustful hearts" that will not succumb to the inevitable pressure of material things, but in action as in suffering will discover the yet higher and victorious power of the spirit, of will and of love, and will declare it to the world.

LITERATURE.

THE ENCYCLOPÆDIA BIBLICA.*

We find it very far from a pleasant task to give our readers some account of this volume. It is easy enough to point out the faults of worthless books; easy enough to praise such as are good and helpful; easy, sometimes, to apportion alternate praise and blame. Here, however, we have a volume so full of profound and varied learning that a student hardly dares to blame in any way which may seem trenchant or supercilious. Yet, if we are to speak of it at all, we must not shrink from speaking out frankly, and the present writer does so with a certain measure of confidence. He has read a great part of the third volume through; some of the important articles he has read repeatedly. He has also read many reviews of it in leading periodicals, and has heard a considerable number of competent scholars discuss it in private conversation. Substantially the opinions given have been identical with each other and with the impression left upon himself by patient study of the volume. The learning displayed is unquestionable and accurate; it is indeed surprising how seldom the least mistake in detail has been brought home; even the correction of the proofs has been done with marvellous care. This is no small praise considering the extent of the book and the vast multitude of the references. Further, we gladly acknowledge that some articles are masterly and instructive in the highest degree. We must, however, add that there are other articles, and these on subjects the most vital for comprehension of the Old Testament or the New, which are marred by extravagance of theory and utter recklessness of assertion. The principle on which they are written is apparently a very simple one, and it may be fairly stated thus: for a traditional opinion no amount of evidence, however cogent, will suffice; for a new and revolutionary theory any semblance of proof, however flimsy and fanciful the semblance may be, is more than enough. When no shadow of argument can be found, a liberal use of the adverbs "clearly," "obviously," &c., is substituted. But we shall also have to say something of a feature which occupies great space, and for this feature recklessness and extravagance are not the appropriate terms. Eccentricity is a mild and quite inadequate description, though we shall content ourselves with that. The eccentricity to which we refer is the attempt which the editor has made to rewrite the text of the Hebrew Bible, everywhere and always introducing the name "Jerahmeel." Turn where we will in the Old Testament articles, we meet with Jerahmeel; he is everywhere, everything is done to him or else by him; he is the explanation of all that ever happens. The misfortune is that the faults of which we have spoken are so pervading. Even when more sober scholars are allowed to speak, the restless energy of the chief editor intervenes and makes characteristic additions in flagrant contrast with the matter that has preceded. We must add that the utmost confusion is occasioned by the fact that most of the long articles are by many hands. True, the initials are added to the paragraphs, and there is a complete list of them at the end of the article, but the type is the same, and the reader, to his extreme discomfort, has always to be asking himself who it is that is speaking. Of course, nobody would complain if quite different branches of a great subject were entrusted to different hands. But the plan adopted goes far beyond this. For example, the articles on "Names," "Prophetic Literature," and "Palestine," are each of them written by four authors. "Moab" is written by three authors. These instances are taken almost at random, and might easily be multiplied.

Let us begin with that which is pleasant to say, and alas! can be said most briefly. We have nothing but gratitude for such excellent summaries of ascertained fact as are to be found in the articles on Phœnicia and Persia. Dr. G. A. Smith has described the geography of Moab with that fulness of knowledge and charm of style which were to be expected from him, and scarcely any praise is too high for the map of Moab which accompanies the article, and which is made still more useful by the appended index of place-names. Nestle has contributed a most interesting and exhaustive series of parallels to the petitions of the Lord's Prayer from Jewish sources, while he wisely reminds us that "even if for the separate parts, words, thoughts of the Lord's Prayer parallels may be adduced from Jewish sources, as a whole this prayer remains unique. Moreover, it is difficult to be certain of the exact age of the parallels adduced." Not less excellent are the articles on the "Lord's Day," by Deissmann, and on "Presbyter," by Canon Armitage Robinson. Of the elaborate essay on the "Ministry" we are inclined to speak with more reserve. No doubt it is, as Schmiedel's work is always sure to be, learned and acute. But it is wearisome; it abounds in the assumptions of radical criticism; it is badly arranged, and it is written in that colourless English which is to be looked for in articles by foreigners. We may remark, by the way, that there are serious disadvantages in the employment of foreign scholars on so large a scale. It is not only that their English, or the English of their translators, is far from easy or natural. Their way of presenting a subject is not ours, and illustrations appropriate in Germany do not appeal to us. We had almost forgotten to mention Professor Toy's exhaustive treatise on the Book of Proverbs; it is a model of lucid statement and sober method.

We pass next to articles of another kind, to articles which, as we venture to think, are thoroughly uncritical and reckless. Professor Van Manen supplies the most flagrant instances of work done in this spirit. The encyclopædia contains an account of St. Paul by the late Dr. Hatch which will be welcome even to those who believe it to be unduly sceptical. It needs to be supplemented by the history of criticism since Dr. Hatch's death, and this work has been committed with disastrous results to Professor Van Manen, who holds that "we possess no epistles of Paul," that the real Paul was a tent-maker and itinerant evangelist moving in a circle where there was "as yet no idea of any breach with Judaism." It "does not appear," so we are told, "that he wrote epistles of any importance." The epistles which go by his name are all "according to the later criticism pseudepigrapha." "Everything" in them "points to later days, at most the close of the first or the beginning of the second century." If confident assertion is to be taken for proof, then assuredly Professor Van Manen has a good case. But he has not, so far as we can see, brought forward any objection to the principal epistles except this, that St. Paul's view of Christ is not Professor Van Manen's, that St. Paul does not write, as Professor Van Manen thinks he ought to have written. How did the Christians come to invent the difference of opinion which brought one Apostle into sharp conflict with another? Surely the whole tendency of later times was to ignore or forget any such conflict among the "holy Apostles." To this question no answer is given, let alone the psychological impossibility of inventing such an epistle as that to the Galatians. We may well ask also by what right Professor Van Manen claims to speak in the name of "later criticism." The modern authorities to which he refers are only a countryman of his, Loman, a German critic, Van Steck, whose book on the Galatians has had scant success, and another German who published the first part of a work on the Pauline epistles in 1890, but who has gone no further. We are informed with ludicrous solemnity that all surveys of Paulinism based on the Acts and Epistles, "whether taken in their entirety or limited to the 'principal epistles' alone have irrevocably passed away"; "all of them have disappeared;" "they rested on a foundation of shifting sand." We answer to this that they have not disappeared from the "Encyclopædia Biblica" itself, which in its two first volumes has built its whole conception of Christian history "on the shifting sand." Nay, one of the most famous scholars who has contributed to this third volume, Dr. Jülicher can see nothing but "pseudo-criticism" in the new light from Holland, and he has a practical unanimity of German, French, and English opinion on his side. Van Manen himself laments that as yet "the labourers are few," though the "later criticism" has been "adopted by Professor W. B. Smith, of Tulane University," who is to write the article on Romans for Vol. IV. But enough of this. We have more of the same sort of thing in an elaborate article also by Professor Van Manen on "Old Christian Literature." Here we turned with curiosity to the section on the Ignatian Epistles, for one would have thought that Bishop Lightfoot deserved to be seriously answered by an author who boldly places the Epistles in question about 150 A.D. No answer is even attempted. Instead of this we are assured that conservative arguments are "of no avail" and are "baseless suppositions," that the position of Harnack is "contrary to all tradition," &c. Evidently the "new criticism" is intuitional, not inductive. Again, the first epistle of the Roman Clement is placed about 140, and here we have for once an example of reasoning, though it is reasoning in a circle. The date assigned by the general assent of scholars to the epistle of the Roman Clement is dismissed as untenable, because its author is acquainted with the Pauline epistles. On the other hand it is urged that these epistles cannot be genuine because "we never come upon any trace in tradition of the impression which the supposed letters of Paul may have made." Of about equal value with these speculations of Van Manen are the editor's suggestions that perhaps Christ never lived at Nazareth, and that, indeed, there was in reality no town of that name, that Christ was born at Bethlehem in Zebulon, that Nathanael may be "that exquisite creation of a devout imagination 'the disciple whom Jesus loved.'" It is an ominous circumstance that the editor is turning his attention to the emendation of the New Testament text on the method already applied by him to the Hebrew Bible. Who can foretell the amazing discoveries which the fourth volume may have in store for us?

Lastly we have to speak of that mighty factor in the true history of Israel Jerahmeel. We have of late been asked by several persons who would usually be thought to have an average acquaintance with the Old Testament who Jerahmeel was. Thus put, the question admits of easy answer: Jerahmeel was a descendant of Judah, and his descendants occupied part of the southern portion of Judæa. Smith's Bible Dictionary tells us all that was known of him forty years ago in a dozen lines. Hastings' Bible Dictionary deals with Jerahmeel in the same niggardly fashion, only adding that the tribe was most likely of non-Hebrew origin. Nay, the "Encyclopædia Biblica," in its second volume, though it devoted three columns to him, does not go beyond a modest hint that the Jerahmeelites were "much more important than we have imagined." But how is it with Jerahmeel now? His history goes back to the creation. According to the "emended" text "The Lord planted a garden in Eden of Jerahmeel." Instead of "The man called his wife Eve because she was the mother of all living," we are to read "Jerahmeel called the name of his wife Horith, that is a Jerahmeelitess." Adam is a corruption of Jerahmeel, the deluge "covered the whole land of Jerahmeel," the tower of Babel was in Jerahmeel, Nimrod's kingdom was in Jerahmeel. The name Horeb may be "mutilated from Jerahmeel." Solomon is said (1 Kings iv. 30) to have been "wiser than the sons of Jerahmeel." Elijah and Micaiah are "nothing else than popular corruptions of Jerahmeel," and Elijah (now Jerahmeel) is in many respects the double of Moses. The long and deadly struggle of Israel with the Syrians of Damascus is a mistake for a similar struggle with Jerahmeel in the extreme south; at least the chief struggle of the Israelites was with the latter. The form of religion which Ahab introduced was not from Tyre, but from Jerahmeel. Amos was a native of Jerahmeel and prophesied there, not at Bethel. The prophecy in Isaiah xiv. is directed not against Tyre but against Jerahmeel, which should be read in place of Lucifer. These surprising results are culled from various articles, and we might add much fresh matter from the article on the Psalter, where the "true text" is rich in pointed references to Jerahmeel. There is also in the article in Prophetic literature a long section entitled "Jerahmeelite Theory," i.e., of prophecy. But we abstain from further quotation, feeling that our readers may have too much of a good thing.

Once more we desire to express our genuine admiration for the erudition of the Encyclopædia and for the restless ingenuity of its indefatigable editor. One thing his work lacks, a sound and balanced judgment. For the most part the scholar will seek in vain for an impartial statement of the evidence, for a summary of ascertained fact on the great subjects of Biblical history and religion. Let anyone compare the article on Prophecy in the Encyclopædia with the masterly treatise of Dr. Davidson in Hastings' Bible Dictionary and he will feel the difference between a scholar who learns by sympathetic study of the facts and a scholar who lives amidst the phantoms of his own imagination. Without sobriety of mind the most brilliant gifts and attainments are all in vain. "Scribendi recte sapere est et principium et fons."

William Addis.

Dr. Amherst D. Tyssen has issued a collection of forty-eight original pieces under the title of Occasional Hymns, which very well describes about half of the contents. In addition to these special hymns a group of general hymns opens the booklet, which closes with poems on "Thoughts in the Koran" and "Incidents in the Life of Mohammed." Here, no doubt, the attentive reader will find helpful suggestion, but obviously the chief aim of the poet has been to supply a suitable hymn for each of the special festivals, ceremonials, and "collection Sundays" in the ecclesiastical year. The directness and lucidity of Dr. Tyssen's verses distinguish them from the mass of vague and misty poetry that offers itself to the seeker for good hymns; if only his lyric power had proved equal to his perspicuity and devout sentiment his poems would have been widely welcomed. As it is, we must confess our fear that hymn-lovers will miss in them, for the most part, the indefinable quality that lifts irreproachable verse into acceptable psalmody. The pamphlet containing these hymns may be had at 5, Furnival-street, Holborn, E.C., and the author's generous temper is indicated by a note on the cover which says:—"Free leave is given to any person to reprint or adapt in any way all or any of these hymns."

A NEW WAY TO STUDY THE BIBLE.

Everyone who has travelled knows how much new interest is given to history and literature by visiting the localities where great events have taken place, or where distinguished men have been born or have done their work. For an American to travel in England is for him to find English history suddenly taking on attractiveness and meaning which before he would not have thought possible. An Englishman travelling in Germany is likely to find his interest in Luther, Goethe, Frederick the Great, Wagner, and all the other illustrious names which that remarkable land has given to the world, quickened to a surprising degree.

The Unitarian Sunday-school in Toronto, Canada, during the past year, has been availing itself of this travel-idea to add to the interest of its study of the Bible. Of course it was not possible for the school to go to Palestine, and actually journey up and down the land, visiting the places made sacred by their association with the great characters and events of Bible history. But something else nearly as good was possible, and this has actually been carried out.

At the beginning of the year the pastor of the church laid out nine months of work for the whole school, including the adult Bible class. (One of the advantages of travel-study is that all ages can be interested in it; it may be made simple enough for the child of eight, and yet the maturest minds cannot exhaust it.) The idea set before the school was that of a year of travel and study in Palestine, for the purpose of getting all the knowledge possible of Bible history, Bible geography, Bible men, women and events, and Bible life, by going in imagination to the very places where the people lived and the events transpired, and studying the Bible in the land of its birth.

The pastor arranged to supplement the work done by the school by giving monthly Sunday evening illustrated lectures on Palestine, covering the ground which the classes had been going over during the preceding four weeks, exhibiting stereopticon pictures of localities and scenes, and describing his own visits to the places under consideration. The titles of these lectures will give an idea as to how the work was laid out. They were as follows: Lecture I. "From Toronto to Palestine; Scenes by the Way; First Views of the Holy Land; from Joppa to Jerusalem." Lecture II. "Jerusalem as it is To-day, and the Jerusalems of the Past." Lecture III. "A Christmas Visit to Bethlehem." Lecture IV. "Southern Judea, or a Visit to Hebron and the Homes of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob." Lecture V. "A Trip to Jericho, Jordan, the Dead Sea, the Desert, Mount Sinai and Egypt." Lecture VI. "Excursions round about Jerusalem." Lecture VII. "On Horseback from Jerusalem to Samaria, Southern Galilee and Nazareth." Lecture VIII. "With Jesus at the Sea of Galilee, amid the chief Scenes of his Public Ministry." Lecture IX. "To Damascus; over the Lebanon Mountains to the Sea; Farewell to Palestine; Lessons gathered from our Tour; Off for Home."

It would be hard to tell which were the more interested in the pastor's lectures and in the school lessons, the children or the adults. A constant appeal was made to the imagination. The Bible was the lesson-book in study and guide-book in travel. Maps of Palestine were made constant use of both in the class work and in the lectures, until the mountains, coast-lines, streams, valleys, towns, and principal physical features of the land generally, became almost as familar as the streets of one's own city. (All scholars in the school above the primary classes should draw maps for themselves, filling in the details as the study goes on, and marking all the places visited; and it would be well to give small prizes at the end for the best of these.) The pictures, of course, were a great help and quickener of interest from first to last; they made the places and events seem real to an extent that would have been impossible without them.

Of course the lessons and lectures were planned to illustrate and help each other all the way through. For example, during the month preceding the illustrated lecture on "Jerusalem," the school studied the Bible stories, events, and characters connected with Jerusalem, and the effort was to make all the scholars as fully acquainted as possible with these stories and characters, as a preparation for the lecture. Thus when the lecture came, everybody was eager for it, and prepared to understand it and get the most possible from it. In like manner when the illustrated lecture was to be "A Christmas Visit to Bethlehem," the preceding month was devoted to the Bible stories connected with Bethlehem. When the lecture was to take the school to Hebron and the Homes of the Patriarchs, the subject of preparatory study was the Bible stories about Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. And so on. Thus in course of the year the scheme studied all the different sections of Palestine historically; or, if we choose to express it differently, it studied all parts of the Bible geographically. In other words, it studied all the more important characters of the Bible in connection with the places where they were born, did their work, and died, and all the principal stories of the Bible in connection with the localities with which they are associated.

The results were gratifying in a very high degree. Palestine became to young and old (what to many it had never been before) a real country, a part of this world. The Bible became a living book, its history as real as that of Germany or France. Bible characters became flesh and blood, men and women. Bible stories took on a wholly new interest. The knowledge of the Bible gained, I should think it safe to say, was two or three, if not five, times as great as in a year of ordinary Bible study. Moreover, through the illustrated lectures the whole congregation was reached; for the lectures were given in the church and drew large audiences.

Is such a method of Bible study practicable in other places besides Toronto? Of course such a plan cannot be carried out with the very best results except in places where the minister or Sunday-school superintendent has travelled in Palestine; for nobody can talk quite as well about a country that he has not seen as about one that he has actually visited. And yet this difficulty is by no means insurmountable. Indeed, my own first experience in conducting a Sunday-school through a year of Palestine travel-study similar to that which I have outlined was had before I ever saw Palestine; and the results were by no means discouraging. Much better helps are obtainable now than could be obtained then. Indeed, English Unitarian Sunday-schools are now particularly favoured in this respect. The Sunday School Association at Essex Hall a year or two ago provided itself with a very carefully selected set of about 200 coloured lantern slides, designed to illustrate just such a study of Palestine and the Bible as has been described above; and these slides it loans to any schools desiring them. It has also published a series of five lectures to go with the slides. With these helps, and a printed leaflet, which any minister or intelligent Sunday-school superintendent can prepare, grouping the Bible stories and characters geographically for class use, it would seem to be entirely practicable for any Unitarian school in England, which so desires, to carry out a plan of work similar to that of the Toronto school, and to do it with success.

GARDEN CITIES AND PORT SUNLIGHT.

THE Garden City Conference which was held at Port Sunlight last Saturday had the advantage of meeting where some of the benefits of the scheme are already realised. Part of the intention of the promoters of Garden Cities is that instead of towns and cities growing up haphazard, row after row of houses, factory added to factory, without any general plan following the requirements and purposes of manufacturing firms, speculative builders and small owners, there should be from the first a plan and purpose in the laying out of the whole district, and careful provision all along for the well-being and happiness of the inhabitants, in accordance with a carefully considered scheme. This method is seen carried into effect with excellent results at Port Sunlight. The cottages are all built with a view to the comfort and health of those who dwell in them and the general beauty and convenience of the village. There are excellent public buildings, schools, halls, baths, shops, and provision for the various social, educational and religious needs of the people, all so placed and designed as to be accessible and beautiful, with wide roads, gardens, trees, flowers, playgrounds, and small parks in among the houses; so that there is not a building that is crowded in by other buildings, not a house that has not a pleasant outlook, nor one that is not itself a beautiful object as seen from any point of view from which it is visible.

The charm of Port Sunlight, when it is approached from the common type of cheaper suburb which adjoins it on the outskirts of Birkenhead, is heightened by contrast, and an afternoon spent in the village is cheering and restful to that part of one's nature which requires beauty to feed upon and in our ordinary manufacturing towns is thwarted and abused at every turn. How wholesome it is for the settled inhabitants may be judged by many outward signs, notably the bright, healthy, cheerful faces of the children, among whom, as they marched past in single file last Saturday, scarcely a sickly or careworn face was to be seen—how different from the general condition of children in the schools of any ordinary manufacturing population!

Many results of Port Sunlight life would be worthy of examination. One more must be mentioned now. The death-rate, according to latest returns, is nine in the thousand, and that of Bourneville, the village founded by Mr. Cadbury, is almost exactly the same. Let the reader turn for himself to the returns periodically published from our large towns and see what is the rate at Liverpool, Birkenhead, Manchester, Birmingham. The rate at Port Sunlight and Bourneville is considerably less than half. What a saving of life is here! And it should be remembered that the lengthening of life is the less important part of the benefit of greater healthiness and pleasantness of conditions. Not only are the lives lengthened, but they are more vigorous and happy while they last; life is altogether better worth living, and more capable and productive; the workers can do more and better work while they are at it, and are in a position to use and enjoy their leisure more rationally and cheerfully.

The foundation and proprietorship of Port Sunlight is not, however, in accord with the Garden City scheme. The whole village, land and buildings, belong to Messrs. Lever Brothers, who provide houses for a large number of their workpeople rent free, but do not pay the rates and cost of maintenance. The public buildings for general use are also freely provided, but the cost of coal and gas is paid by those who use them. Mr. W. H. Lever explains that the firm of Lever Brothers, at whose factory the people are employed, consider that in providing good houses and pleasant and healthy surroundings for their workpeople they are at the same time serving their own best interests and paying to their workers a fairer share of the wealth they have gained in association together than is represented by their wages alone. He holds that beyond the recognised wages of the trade, this is a more satisfactory way of adding to the benefit the workers get than a money bonus or profit-sharing in cash would be, one reason, among others, being that the women and children are sure to have their share of the profit, when it is paid in the form of better homes. He also says that it pays the firm well to maintain their workers in healthy and cheerful conditions, better work compensating for the increased outlay.

Both Mr. Lever and Mr. Cadbury disclaimed emphatically any intention of patronage or philanthropy in what they had done at Port Sunlight and Bourneville. And yet, while one fully accepts their assurance given on Saturday that they did not establish their villages as schemes of charitable relief, it is certain that the love of man is beneficently shown in the thoughtful care for the welfare of those who are under their influence. To get hold of their principle that every human being can serve the rest better if he himself is provided with the possibility of a full and wholesome life, and to apply that principle in all the affairs of the world, would be to bring a much larger measure of Christianity into our dealings and of joy into the world.

The Garden City project, however, is not the provision by wise and considerate employers of good homes for their workpeople, but the laying-out and erection of beautiful, convenient, and healthy cities of moderate size, with ample provision for health and recreation, and surrounded by agricultural land; the whole to be owned eventually by the inhabitants themselves. Bourneville leads the way to this consummation more efficiently than does Port Sunlight, but the scheme has the very hearty support of both Mr. Lever and Mr. Cadbury, as was made abundantly evident last Saturday, when both expressed themselves so well on the subject and the wide and generous hospitality of Mr. Lever was experienced by so many people.

The proposal is to buy land in a district where it now can be obtained at its agricultural value, with money to be provided by a company formed for the purpose, whose dividend to shareholders will be strictly limited to something like 4 per cent.; to buy a considerable estate which will be large enough for a city with all its institutions, parks, playgrounds, gardens, houses, factories, and also leave a considerable expanse of land all round it for market gardens, farms, &c., so that the city can never be overcrowded, never be separated from country life and the ready supply of fruit and vegetables in their seasons, never have any slums.

It is intended that the city shall never grow beyond a pre-determined area, unless by the addition of yet more land on the outside, the small proportion of land allowed to be used for actual factory sites being always kept in a recognised relationship of size to the much larger expanse intended for agricultural uses, parks, gardens, and that can never be built upon.

The intention is that the company which in the first instance provides the capital shall arrange to transfer the land to the accredited representatives of the inhabitants, in effect to the citizens, to be held by them jointly for the common good, so soon as the city is organised. That is to say, the ultimate aim, essential to the scheme, without which it will never have been tried, is that the land on which the city is built, including its open spaces and the large belt of agricultural land around, shall be municipalised and the increment of value resulting from the building of the city and the concourse of workers shall all belong jointly to the people who make it, and shall be used by them as free citizens in a self-governing city for their own benefit.

Such, in general terms, is the scheme of the Garden City Association. There are innumerable questions which practical men will naturally want to ask: probably there are very few of them which have not been asked and considered and answered already. Prudent and wise men who have made a success of their own business have been considering details, and no one will be doing other than good by putting any serious question and propounding any difficulty. It is intended as a practical measure, capable of early adoption. Some manufacturers have intimated a wish to join in such a scheme and to remove their factories. It is expected that it will pay them well in money as well as otherwise, to get away from dearer land to cheaper, from congested areas to those where they will be able to extend their operations, to have healthy instead of sickly workpeople. And which among the many thousands of employers who must live within easy distance of the works would not desire for himself and his family the advantage of residence in a Garden City rather than the conditions of their present home life.

The scheme takes the general economic state of society for granted. Though many who are interested in the movement look for a time when the steam-power factory shall not be the common means of doing the world's work, they join those who accept it as inevitable, and those who desire nothing different, in the wish to develop a better condition of general life, while, as is certainly the case at present, the factory system is general. Whether it will last for generations to come, or give way to something different, it is here now, and will not be eliminated in a generation. The Garden City project seeks to make the best of it while it is here, and not allow it to be destructive of the vitality, the joy, the character on which depends the value of any civilisation.

The Garden City Conference held last Saturday at Port Sunlight was remarkable. The previous evening a large public meeting was held in the Picton Lecture Hall, Liverpool, and heard the purposes of the scheme set forth and voted approval. On the Saturday the people who assembled in response to the invitations of the Garden City Association and Messrs. Lever Brothers must have numbered a thousand persons—deputations from corporations and councils, housing committees, trades societies, co-operative societies, prominent public men, those who are interested in the scheme, and those whom it is desirable to interest in it. The sight of the village, and the opportunity of wandering at will in and out of its public buildings and grounds and around the houses, whose privacy was preserved, cannot be without influence on those who were present, and the large meeting held in the schools was an undoubted success. All present were either prepared to support the society or desirous of judging whether or how far its purposes were practicable. It was just the kind of assembly desirable, consisting of large numbers of people of influence and many of the pioneers of social improvement. A number of the delegates who had attended the International Co-operative Congress during the week went over to Port Sunlight; among the number were some of the foreign delegates.

Modifications of the Garden City idea may be adapted to the building of a Garden Suburb by a municipality or a company, essential elements in the plan being the general laying-out of the district according to a pre-arranged plan, securing ample open space and beauty and healthy conditions, and avoiding any possibility of overcrowding, and the vesting of the freehold of the ground (which should be of considerable extent) in the community. But it is understood that while the Garden City Association welcomes and encourages every such effort, as also all such industrial villages as Port Sunlight where open-minded and generous employers understand their responsibilities and are wise, its own activities are now directed to the formation of a pioneer company to bring into existence the first Garden City on the plan that has been indicated in this article.

THE BRUSSELS LIBERAL PROTESTANT CHURCH.

Visitors to "Belgium's capital" would have some difficulty in finding their way to the meeting-place of the friends of Liberal Christianity there unless, indeed, they were acquainted with the minister, M. James Hocart, whose thoughtful face and earnest accents the attenders at the meetings of the British and Foreign Association know so well. Passing through this charming city on our way to the Ardennes, we gladly availed ourselves of the opportunity to renew our acquaintance with M. Hocart and obtain some knowledge at first hand of the work he is doing here.

On our way to the address he had given us, we passed the Cathedral St. Gudule, and, entering, found the beautiful church (more beautiful in its interior than the exterior quite leads one to expect) fairly filled with children, who were filing in from their various schools as we ascended the street and the steps. The noble stone arches, the tones of the organ, and the voices echoing from the Gothic roof and filling the church with beauty of sound—all the accessories here were distinctly in favour of the devotional attitude of mind. Language, paintings, music, architecture all brought to one's mind historically and sensuously the tradition and the atmosphere of worship.

One incident only interfered with the charm when the forest of prayer stools were suddenly turned round and became seats, with a great rustle of dresses and feet. With few exceptions, however, the attitude of most worshippers was listless and unintelligent, though quiet reigned among the children, over whom a sprinkling of priests kept watch.

No contrast could possibly have been greater than that presented by the small gathering at 12, Rue Parchemin. Only a printed card hanging at the door (carefully removed as we departed) conveyed the information to those who passed up the unpretending street that the "Cult Protestant Liberal" held services every Sunday at 10.45 in the room of M. ——. The room was pleasant and bright, the furniture and panels were artistic, if not appropriate, the cushioned side couches along the walls were distinctly more attractive than the familiar cane chairs in the centre. The room bore evidence of its week-day use for dancing. Dancing, though regularised for ecclesiastical purposes by King David and allowed under supervision by up-to-date Missions, has always lingered under a semi-cloud since the Puritanical revival of religion minus dancing. It must be admitted that its accessories do not suggest the devotional frame of mind. All the more remarkable is it that under such distinctly unfavourable circumstances the tone of the short service from the moment when M. Hocart rose to "meditate upon God and in the spirit of true religion" until the close was not only intellectually elevated, but instinct with spiritual and devotional feeling. The service following the extremely short invocation consisted of the reading of the Epistle to Philemon, a description of the movement towards better housing of the workers, and the amelioration of their conditions in England and America, mentioning as instances the Bournville and Port Sunlight experiments, and in France, and an appeal to thoughtful Beligians to do more in this direction under the stimulus of these and similar examples. A prayer followed, during which the congregation stood. Then came the address or sermon without a text, but on the subject of the recent Conference in London, when the experience of the five ministers who had passed from various Orthodox Churches to Unitarianism was given.

This Conference had evidently made a deep impression upon M. Hocart, and he bore testimony at the very commencement of his address to the entire absence of any animosity—nay, to the presence of affectionate regard and respect to their old Churches evinced and expressed by all the readers of the papers, which have become familiar to readers of The Inquirer.

Our knowledge of the French language was not sufficient to enable us to follow M. Hocart in his argument, but this clearly consisted mainly of the reasons given by Dr. Klein for his breach with the authority of the Catholic Church and his gradual adoption of the position of free religious inquiry—the alliance, as M. Hocart put it, between the fearless acceptance of scientific fact and teaching with the deep spiritual truths of a religion as wide as humanity, known in England as Unitarianism, and in France and Belgium as Liberal Protestantism. Those who are familiar with M. Hocart's speeches during Whit-week and on other occasions in England will hardly realise fully the strength of his personality which is apparent as he speaks to his own people, and in his own language. His English is, as we know, cultivated and correct, but in French the variety of intonation and the utterance, instinct with feeling, now rapid, now strikingly intense and slow, these leave a deep impression upon his hearers. Quiet alike in manner and gesture, the earnestness and sincerity of this religious reformer, pursuing his almost solitary way in clerical Belgium, become more apparent among his own people.

We are constantly told in dogmatic terms, by an intellectual autocracy as intolerant as any ecclesiastical hierarchy of old, that man is the creature of his environment. There is no falsehood so pernicious as that which contains a percentage of truth. Our experience this morning proves that this frequently heard "fact" is at best but an ingenious half-truth.

The environment at St. Gudule was all in favour of the devotional attitude of mind and thought. Beauty of form and sound, association of language and idea, all united to create, if it were possible, the religious man, the prayer to God, the service of man. But these we do not hesitate to say were more real in the dancing-room at the Rue Parchemin, without any artistic assistance, nay, in despite of it, with every association—including the loud talking of the concierge and the barking of an intrusive dog—against reverent contemplation and thought. Then out of an unfriendly and adverse environment spoke the soul of man, rising above and beyond it, and appealing by force and intensity of religious aspiration to the higher being, the man inhabiting environment, the germ of the Divine nature claiming its kindred with the great spiritual Creator of all environments.

*The Prisoner's Friend.

I.

The sight of flowers in our dull London streets calls up in our minds all kinds of pleasant thoughts, and when we come upon some house with plants in the window, at once a more cheerful feeling comes over us, and we are grateful to those who have cultivated them and not kept them to themselves, but put them there in the window for everyone to see and enjoy. Sometimes it is not only one house, but two or three together that have flowers, and then one is set thinking as to which of them was the first to start a window garden. Perhaps it was some girl or boy who, like you, brought home a plant from Sunday-school, in the first instance thinking only of gaining a prize, but soon losing that desire in real love of the flower and interest in its growth, and not resting content with his one treasure, but gradually collecting quite a little window garden, a pleasure not only to himself, but to all the neighbours and passers-by, creating in them a like desire.

And what a good thing it is to have something beyond oneself to care for and watch over! How it saves one from idle thoughts, and wrong-doing, and selfishness! This is the lesson I want to bring home to you this evening, and I can best do it by telling you a beautiful story, related by a well-known French writer. It is the story of a Parisian Count who lived in the time of the first Napoleon.

He was a very rich man, but his riches did not bring him any pleasure; he had grown tired of everything, and had lost his trust in men and also in God. Then, for the sake of novelty, he joined in a conspiracy against Napoleon, but the plot was found out, and the Count taken and put in prison. He was shut up in a tiny room with bare white-washed walls, containing a table, one chair, a cupboard, a narrow bed, and a pair of blue curtains which hung by his window, as if in bitter mockery, seeing that the thickness of the bars and the height of the wall opposite quite prevented any fear of curious eyes or the too hot rays of the sun. Outside was a small courtyard, where every day he was allowed to take exercise for a certain time, and from which he could just perceive the tops of the surrounding mountains. From his cell he could see nothing but the stones of the courtyard and the high wall opposite, where, at a little square barred window, he sometimes observed a sad and a gloomy face. There was nothing whatever for him to do, so he spent his time writing and drawing on the walls, carving a thousand strange designs on the table, and thinking. He questioned the jailer about the man at the window opposite, and heard that he too had been a conspirator, and in consequence confined in prison.

One day (it was in the spring-time) the Count was pacing slowly up and down the courtyard. Head down, arms crossed behind his back, he was counting the paving-stones, as he had done a hundred times before, when there, almost under his feet, he perceived a tiny heap of earth, thrown up between two of the paving-stones. He stopped, his heart beat quickly (to a captive all is hope or fear), and in a moment all kinds of wild thoughts flashed through his mind, of deliverance being brought to him by means of secret subways and passages. It was only a momentary illusion, however, and the Count's next thought was that some little animal, a mole, perhaps, had thrown up the earth. To make sure he knelt down, only to discover, to his disgust, that the cause of his excitement was not even an animal, but merely a feeble little seedling, hardly alive, pale and languishing. He was just going to trample it underfoot when a fresh breeze laden with the scent of honeysuckle and hawthorn blew on him and seemed to ask mercy for the little plant because it, too, might one day have perfume to give! Then another thought came, "How had this tender, soft, fragile herb been able to separate, divide and loosen this soil, so hardened by the sun that it was almost like cement between the two pieces of paving-stone?" Stooping down again and examining it attentively, he discovered how well adapted it was for its work, and no longer thought of trampling on it. The story tells how, day after day, he watched the plant and pondered on its marvels,—on the power that weak stem possessed of absorbing the light, of feeding on it, and growing strong thereby, why the leaves were a different colour from the stalk, and again, if it ever had flowers, why they, too, would be different, when all were nourished by the same juices. Of what use were the little hairs all down the stem? And the next morning brought the answer, when he saw them laden with a light frost, and the tender stem kept free and unhurt. One morning he saw the jailer cross the yard hastily and pass so close to the plant that it seemed as if he must have trodden on it. The Count trembled. He must ask him, when he brought his breakfast, to be careful. But how could he ask a favour of this rough common man, and expose himself to a refusal? However, from love of his plant he got over his pride and made his request, and it turned out that the jailer had noticed his interest in the "povera picciola" (poor little thing), as he called it, and had watered it in secret, or else many a time it would have died of thirst. So the plant became the cause of a strong friendship between the jailer and his prisoner, and the latter saw how wrong he had been to judge from a rough exterior. One day during a dreadful storm, seeing his plant almost beaten down by the hail and wind, forgetful of himself the Count bent down, shielding it with his hands and body until the storm had passed. To prevent such a disaster happening again, the very next day he began to save from the small bundle of sticks which was brought him for a fire, so as to be able to make a little fence round the plant.

BREATHING SPACE.

OCCASIONS, like pictures and people, ought to be placed in the most favourable light. The holiday season, now fully come, might easily be deprived of such considerate treatment, and so present a very unattractive aspect. The dusty turmoils of Bank Holiday, and the restless crowds that at this time spend their share of leisure in the least leisurely way, form a spectacle to move one to pity. The breathing space that might mean much is made to yield but little, and even in their respite from work men fail of the wisdom of quiet self-possession. Too many of them, long harassed by their fellow-workers, worry themselves still, and are worried by their poor fellow-players who, being accustomed to toil for that which is not bread, now seek recreation in that which leaves them the more exhausted.

But to the thoughtful, independent man, what a precious boon this brief respite is! The pressure of business is lifted, or resolutely pushed off even if with a struggle. The roar of market and machinery is left behind. The books are closed where fate weaves with figures a web to imprison men's lives. The volumes that only tell of facts are set aside for facts themselves. Another Book is opened—re-opened after being long forgotten, or long and piteously withheld. Man quits his little world, and the great world is his. Or rather, he escapes from the world that possessed him like a slave to the world that owns him as a child. His soul's hunger has not been forgotten. There are the mountains and moorlands, after all, with their generous spaces and bounteous winds; the plashing waters of the valleys, their lights and glooms and flitting wings and mellow music are there; "yonder is the sea, great and wide," and amid its vastness the islands, so little, and so safe. The wise man enters now into his inheritance of this opulent beauty. Or he turns from the narrow limits of the scene where he plays his solitary part to discover afresh the extent of the stage where mankind lives out the world-drama. He is like a sentinel set free for a time from dourly pacing his strip of the citadel's wall; he may now look, on and from, other parts of the ramparts, see other faces and hear other voices, and realise how all are in one order whose "very greatness is a rest."

It needs not to be a great traveller in order to be a fortunate one, and to make significant discoveries. To be sure, people who cross the Channel and ascend the Rhine, still more those who thread the Straits of Gibraltar and make for Sicily and the classic East, have before them an obvious wealth of experiences which it would be affectation to ignore. But within the borders of one's native county—or working county, for who now lives where he was born?—there are certainly footprints of men, monuments of ages gone by, stores of relics, historical and archæological, where the romance and poetry of life, its quaintness, and its deep mystery, make appeal to whomsoever will. In these days of nature-worship and the pursuit of "interesting" outdoor sciences, botany, geology, ornithology, and the like—all most excellent holiday helpers—it feels a little old-fashioned to maintain still with POPE that "the proper study of mankind is man"; and, if it were not holiday-time, we should have to make some sort of defence (if we could) of so unusual a proposition as that one may even be refreshed by visiting cities and pondering their moss-like growth from decaying sub-structures and evanescent generations.

Let everyone be fully persuaded in his own mind. While one man is renewed by a changed direction of energy, the tingling nerves and faint pulses of another call for sheer rest, physical and mental. We heard once of two teachers, poor girls, who, having battled through to the end of school-term, took a cottage in the country and spent a fortnight in bed. There are thinkers and workers whose bruised brains have not another "volt" of work in them. Let them fall mentally asleep—and be thankful if they can do it—on the lap of the great Mother. She is very kind to such people, but they must trust her, and drink her mild yet potent anodynes with grateful acquiescence. Here is a little breathing space fenced round. Let every one of us take breath well before we begin again. He will begin again best who learns anew the blessedness of some such breathing space, not only in each year, but in every week, and in every day, a time when we leave off making haste, and quietly "rest in the Lord."

WHEN one is sad or out of sorts for any cause whatever there is no remedy so infallible as trying to make somebody else happy.—J. W. Carney.

THE WESLEYAN CONFERENCE AND DR. BEET.

THE Wesleyan Methodist Conference, which began its labours in Manchester on Monday, July 21, is still sitting. The work of the Conference is of wide-reaching importance, and includes manifold and complicated interests. Last week, for example, there was a preliminary Guild meeting at the Free Trade Hall; then followed the opening of the representative session (i.e., the session in which laymen take some part) of the Conference proper. The election of Professor J. S. Banks, of Headingley College, Leeds, to the presidential chair was confirmed. Addresses of welcome were received. A resolution concerning the illness of the King was passed; thanks were given to the late President, Dr. W. T. Davison; the place of the next Conference was decided upon; the peace established in South Africa was mentioned; small official business was transacted, and then came a vigorous debate on the education question. The question of foreign missions has received special attention; the Million Guineas Fund could not be set aside in a few minutes; the allotment of 250,000 guineas for the erection of a Central Hall upon the site of the Royal Aquarium might of itself have justified a week's discussion; but all manner of other business has to be attended to, including also the business of keeping down unwelcome discussion.

This last item is one which, with the best intentions in the world, cannot always be managed. There are problems that can neither be hidden nor deferred, and therefore must be discussed and decided however awkward and painful the task may be. This question has, for instance. to be decided in one way or another: Is Dr. Agar Beet to continue in office as theological tutor of Richmond College? Several expedients were unsuccessfully proposed with a view of evading the question. Dr. Beet is a man of whom the Wesleyans have been not unjustly proud. His commentaries on Paul's Epistles are known and read far beyond the bounds of his own denomination. In any list of leading English commentators on the New Testament, Dr. Beet's name would find a place. The Saturday Review's expression of praise, "solid and sober work," may be taken as a representative opinion.

But solid and sober work on the New Testament, or indeed upon almost any part of the Bible, is apt to prepare trouble for the worker. It always does if the worker is the representative of a creed-bound Church. In this case Dr. Beet's theological studies led him to examine the doctrine of Christ and his Apostles concerning the Future Life, the Judgment to come, and that that which shall be "at the end of the age." In a book published some years ago on "The Last Things," he endeavoured to show the limits of revelation upon these topics. In the course of it he denied that the New Testament teaches that the wicked will in the future world be subject to endless torments. He showed that this doctrine could not be maintained without assumptions not furnished in the Scriptures. This work made considerable commotion. Dr. Beet was urged to suppress it. A committee was appointed to deal with it. Finally, upon some explanations furnished by Dr. Beet, and a promise that the book should not be reprinted, the matter was allowed to drop.

But not unnaturally, the subject did not drop from the mind of Dr. Beet. And only last year he renewed and extended his old offence by the publication in The Expositor of a series of articles on "The Immortality of the Soul." In a brief preface to the reprint of the articles in book form he himself styles them "a protest against a doctrine which during long centuries has been almost universally accepted as divine truth taught in the Bible"—the doctrine—namely, of the Immortality of the Soul. One can well understand the alarm which such a work, however soberly written, must cause among the Wesleyans. We must remember that the final authority among the Wesleyans is not the Bible, but "John Wesley's Bible"; in the words of the ex-President of the Conference it is "this Book, especially as interpreted by John Wesley and the faithful men who have followed him." There is no question about it, Dr. Beet's new book is certainly not in accordance with that standard of doctrine.

Those who are acquainted with popular Wesleyan teaching, with the sermons of Wesley, or even with Wesley's hymns, will know that Dr. Beet has struck a discordant note. Readers of this paper may judge after seeing a brief summary of Dr. Beet's essay. The work is very precise and orderly. It contains no rhetorical flourishes; hardly a sentence that could be spared. The moral of the whole is summed up in the fewest possible words; the author relies on his quotations and references to make their own impression; he indicates his own feelings in the matter only by an occasional adjective, as where he tells us that Tertullian took a fiendish delight in depicting the torments of the damned. (When I read that phrase I wondered what adjective would describe some of the Sunday evening sermons I listened to betwixt my tenth and twentieth year, some of which might surely have received approbation from Tertullian himself.) But to our book.

The first chapter shows by a sufficient number of quotations that the doctrine of the immortality of the soul, the doctrine that every human soul, by its very nature, will continue in conscious existence for endless ages is distinctly and earnestly taught by Plato. The phrase, "the soul is immortal," occurs twenty times in "Phaedo." The same teaching appears in "The Republic," in "Meno," and in "Phaedrus"; and in connection with it is the doctrine of moral retribution, judgment to come for the deeds wrought in this life. Authorities are given for the suggestion that while the ancient Egyptians believed in retribution beyond this life, they had not, like the Greeks, any doctrine of the necessary immortality of the soul, but probably believed that the wicked were doomed to lose their existence. Finally, quotations are given to show the beliefs of the Jews on this subject. Note is taken of the small and indefinite place which the doctrine of retribution beyond the grave holds in the Old Testament; and it is laid down that the immortality of the human soul is not there taught or implied. In later Jewish writings, in "Judith," the "Book of Wisdom," and in "Enoch," the doctrine of retribution beyond the grave is more definitely taught; in Philo and Josephus the doctrine of immortality is definitely formulated. But both these writers were influenced by Plato and his school.

In the second chapter the teaching of Jesus Christ on the same subject is examined. For this purpose quotations are made not only from the Gospels but from Paul's Epistles, the Book of Revelation, and other New Testament documents. It would serve no great purpose to reproduce the texts and comments here. The conclusion reached is that "the essential and endless permanence of all human souls, so prominent in the teaching of Plato, has no place in the teaching of Christ and his Apostles."

The author admits that if the doctrine of the endless torment of the wicked were indubitably taught, the doctrine of universal immortality might be inferred. But he does not find that doctrine. What he finds is a threat of eternal ("age-lasting") punishment, which punishment is sometimes represented by figures that suggest extinction (as "he will burn up the chaff with unquenchable fire") and sometimes by figures representing suffering ("weeping and gnashing of teeth," the "smoke of their torment," &c.); but he only finds six or seven passages which would suggest the endlessness of the sinners' sufferings; these can be otherwise explained, and against them there are to be set those which definitely threaten the sinner with extinction. In short, the threatenings addressed to the wicked are not of such a nature that upon them can be built up a doctrine of necessary immortality; nor are they enforced, as in Plato, with the consideration of that immortality as a foregone conclusion.

In subsequent chapters it is shown that Justin and the earlier fathers did not hold the Platonic doctrine; that it does not appear in Christian literature till the latter half of the second century; that when it appears it is, as in the case of Tertullian, in writers manifestly under Greek influence. It is further shown that in modern writers who hold the doctrine of the immortality of all souls there is an astonishing lack of appeal to Scripture for so important a doctrine. In answer to Dr. Pope, whose "Compendium of Theology" is a standard and authoritative work among the Wesleyans, and who seeks to evade the difficulty by saying that Scripture "nowhere asserts or proves the deathlessness of the human spirit any more than it asserts or proves the being of God," Dr. Beet replies that the first chapter of Genesis alone contains thirty statements which imply decisively the existence of an intelligent Creator who speaks and acts; and that no such statements implying the deathlessness of the human spirit are to be found in the Bible.

The appeal in this book, then, is to the Canonical Scriptures. It makes no definite distinction between one Bible writer and another. It aims to prove that the doctrine of universal immortality not being found in the Bible, the alternative of endless suffering or universal restoration does not confront us. It is definitely promised that the good shall share the endless blessedness of God; the wicked are threatened with punishment and destruction; no definite limit is assigned to their unhappiness; and Dr. Beet ends by declaring that we have no right to assert anything in God's name more than can be traced by abundant and decisive evidence to Christ, and the Apostles and Evangelists.

It is not altogether a satisfactory conclusion. But the book itself is a very satisfactory opening. After this book has been once written; after the committee appointed to deal with the colleges have practically censured Dr. Beet by refusing to nominate him for the post he has so long held; after the matter has been openly debated in conference; after so respected a Wesleyan theologian as Dr. Findlay has indicated his sympathies by refusing to become a rival with Dr. Beet for the chair; after the vote of the representative session that decided that Dr. Beet's name should still go before the Pastoral Session, theological lines will not in any case be drawn again as tightly as they have been in the past. Questions will have to be "open" which John Wesley had closed. Young students will be able to examine their Testaments with somewhat less fear of awkward consequences in this life. One single sentence will surely burn itself into the memory of many a reader, and produce results beyond any indicated by this book. "A doctrine which, instead of gaining the homage of our moral sense, drives it into revolt has no moral authority over us." Let all the people, and especially the sons of Tertullian, learn to say, "Amen!"

J. RUDDLE.

[After a long private sitting on Wednesday the case was referred by the Pastoral Session to a Special Committee. —ED. INQ.].

THE EDUCATION CRISIS.

THE debate on the Education Bill was resumed on Monday, but the suspension of the twelve o'clock rule, and the arrangement to continue the discussion on Wednesday instead of Tuesday, with the prospect of it lasting well into Thursday morning, renders it difficult for us to do more than to refer to what took place on Monday. The suspension of the rule of the House which prevents any opposed business being carried on after twelve o'clock is usual at this period of an ordinary session, but the necessity does not appear to exist this year, in view of the fact that the House will meet again in October for an autumn sitting. It was clear, therefore, that the object of Mr. Balfour in keeping the House sitting after midnight was to force Clause 7 of the Education Bill through before the House adjourns prior to the Coronation. For this reason the proposal to suspend the rule was vigorously opposed. It was contended, and with good reason, that to force the most highly controversial part of the Bill through the House at hours when it was impossible for the debates to be reported, and thus leave the public to a great extent in the dark as to what was done, would be most improper; and if the clause were passed in this manner in order to anticipate its discussion in the country, instead of allaying the agitation which the Government appeared to fear, it would only tend to further exasperate the Nonconformists. The proposal to suspend the rule was ultimately carried, but the discussion on it occupied two hours and a-half, which might have been more profitably devoted to the consideration of the Bill in the light of day.

Before this discussion took place two questions were asked which threw a lurid light upon the way in which some Church schools are conducted, and disclosed the urgent necessity for introducing some drastic change in the management of them. The first question was put by Mr. C. McArthur, and referred to a statement that the children attending a certain Church school in Marylebone on May 29 had been taken to a Church service at which incense was used and Holy Communion celebrated without the requisite number of communicants; and Mr. McArthur asked whether this treatment of scholars attending a public elementary school in receipt of a Government grant had the sanction of the Education Department.

Mr. H. J. Wilson wanted to know if it were true that the children of the Church school at Dorchester, Oxfordshire, were required to say the "Hail Mary," to bow to the crucifix, to attend the children's mass on Saints' days, and to bow to the altar; that several children who had refused to bow to the altar had been caned on returning to school; and that children whose parents objected to their going to mass were not allowed to take part in the school treat; and what action the Vice-President would take in the matter.

To the first question Sir John Gorst replied that the Board of Education had no information. In reply to the statements with regard to the Dorchester school, their accuracy was not admitted, though the only part positively denied was the caning of children for refusing to bow to the altar; so that we may take it for granted that the other statements were not far from the truth. Sir John Gorst declared that the Board of Education had no power to interfere, nor did he think its powers in that direction should be extended. "The religious instruction and observances in public elementary schools are subject to regulation by the managers and not by the Board of Education."

This shows the amount of license allowed to managers and the little control the Board of Education has over the schools. It is no wonder, therefore, that the clause of the Bill relating to the management of schools is the battle ground of the contending parties, and it is nothing short of a scandal that the clause should be forced through the House of Commons after midnight and by means of the closure. As Mr. Balfour shows that he will stick at nothing in order to enable the Clerical party to attain their ends, the Nonconformists, no doubt, will feel justified in going to any lengths in resisting the enforcement of a law, passed in such a manner, which at one and the same time deprives the ratepapers of adequate control over the expenditure of a portion of the rate and violates the principles of religious liberty. Other matters occupied the attention of the House for a considerable time on Monday evening, and though the debate was continued till nearly three o'clock on Tuesday morning very little progress was made with the Bill. The amendments discussed were, with one exception, of secondary importance and do not affect the main principle of the Bill, and practically no change was made in Clause 7 as amended by Mr. Balfour. Proposals to give the minor local authorities a larger proportion of the body of managers were rejected, but Mr. Balfour consented to include in the Bill some rule for the periodical election of managers.

The question of importance raised was that of the eligibility of women as managers. Mr. Balfour affirmed that the Bill as it stood would not exclude women; but Sir Charles Dilke pointed out that the Courts of law had taken a view diametrically opposed to the intentions of the House. Mr. Balfour thereupon declared that the Government were absolutely in favour of giving the freest access possible on the part of women to every authority created by the Bill; and later on when the question was raised as to whether this would apply to married women, the Prime Minister gave the assurance that it would, and said it would be desirable either to lay down in some general statute a principle which could leave no doubt on the matter, or they should make it a practice to have a broad statement made at the end of every Bill at all analogous to this that there was nothing attaching either to the sex or position of a woman which was to offer any obstacle or bar to her serving on such bodies. He was prepared to introduce words into the definition clause or other suitable place to this effect. It is satisfactory to have all doubts upon this point removed. An amendment to make the inclusion of at least one woman compulsory on the board of managers was defeated; as was also another to the effect that the body of managers should never be less than six.

Postscript.—On Wednesday afternoon Mr. Dillon moved an amendment based on suggestions made by the Bishop of Hereford in a letter to The Times. It would set up a special board of managers in all parishes where there is only one elementary school. He proposed trustees should appoint one-third, the local authority one-third, and the parents of the children one-third of the members of this board. Mr. Balfour refused to give way, in spite of the "lessons of Leeds" being well enforced by Sir Henry Fowler, Sir William Harcourt and others. Mr. Middlemore (Birmingham, Unionist) spoke vigorously against the Bill, and especially condemned the "parrot-like repetition of formulas" which goes under the name of "religious education" in many Church schools. In vain this and other speeches—at least as regards Mr. Balfour. He moved the closure, and defeated the amendment, but his majority sank to 41. The debate was continued till far into Thursday morning, and was chiefly remarkable for an amendment offered by Mr. Balfour, which left the Trust managers to be "hereinafter provided." This "pig-in-a-poke" policy was strongly opposed, and after getting into a great tangle about the subject, the Prime Minister allowed the House to dissolve. It is obvious that the Leeds election has shaken the confidence of a good many Ministerialists, and greater surprises may yet be in store for the Government.

Largely thy gifts should be restored;
Freely thou givest, and thy word
Is, "Freely give."

Has learned to live.—Keble.

INTOLERANCE AND SOMETHING BETTER.

It is encouraging to advocates of religious toleration to read in The Yorkshire Post (of July 4), a paper whose claim it is to be the foremost organ of the Church and Tory party in the North of England, the following comments upon a recent correspondence:—"The correspondence we have published during the last few days indicates that there are still a certain number of the clergy, and even of the laity, of the Church of England who are ready to justify a Vicar in advertising that on a particular day he will invite his congregation to pray for 'Dissenters and schismatics.' We had hoped we had got a little beyond that kind of arrogance, at all events in its demonstrative form. The revelation goes to show that the religious world moves slowly, and that the mediæval spirit survives in sundry places in its meaner aspect as well as in its lofty spirituality. We cannot, however, believe that there is really a great deal of it left, at all events among lay members of the Church. Even those who have written to defend the methods of the Vicar of St. Martin's, Scarborough, in this particular matter have, we observe, taken some pains to argue the question from the point of view of the formularies of the Prayer-book and literal interpretation rather than from that of its bearing upon manifest Christian duty at this time of day and in this state of Christendom. Just twenty years ago Archbishop Tait sent £5 to the fund raised by Mr. Booth of the Salvation Army to acquire the Grecian Theatre and its dancing saloons in East London and convert them to religious and social uses. Thereupon his Grace received the following letter from a severe guardian of the traditions of the Church of England:—

'Things have indeed come to a pass when the head of the English clergy, the official guardian of our orthodoxy, the man who more than any other is solemnly bound to denounce, and if possible to extirpate, heresy and schism, sends a donation from the Chair of St. Augustine to promote the cause of the Church's most profane and mischievous foe.'

"We can conceive of at least one of the clerical correspondents who have denounced us for questioning the propriety of publicly branding Dissenters as 'Schismatics' writing just such a punctiliously polite remonstrance as that. The ecclesiastical Bourbon who learns nothing and forgets nothing can always say, as he revives some monstrous anachronism of terms or sentiment, 'Behold! it is in the bond.' But still the world moves; even the unreformed Church of Rome no longer burns heretics. The reformed Church of England has relaxed its tone and its method of evangelising the world, and it will not slip back to the old order no matter how plausibly the purists of its communion insist that the diction as well as the doctrine of the Reformation must be slavishly applied. Not to say it flippantly, we have learned that more flies are caught by sugar than by vinegar. We have become a freer people during the last 300 years, and our liberty has rekindled a more powerful spiritual agent in that Gospel of Love and Charity which the Roman Church obscured with its austere terrors. For these reasons we decline the test of Churchmanship which the Rev. C. N. Gray, armed with his theological mechanics, proposes to apply to us.

"But it is not to the humbler interpreters of Churchmanship that we care to appeal. The consecrated modern leaders of the Church, dead and living, are our natural referees on questions like these, and for the most part they are in cordial agreement. As far back as 1876 Archbishop Tait, disregarding the protests and criticisms of the reactionaries of the day, presided over a great conference of Bishops and Nonconformist leaders like Dr. Stoughton, Dr. Angus, Dr. Morley Punshon, and Dr. Newman Hall, at Lambeth, to discuss the best method of combined action in face of 'the progress of irreligious thought in England.' That great and beneficent council of war against infidelity and indifferentism would have been scarcely possible if the Churches of the land had been echoing with organised prayer for 'Dissenters and Schismatics,' and one testimony to its incidental value was embodied in the following letter which the Archbishop received from one of his Nonconformist colleagues:—

'Your Grace's action has done more than you are the least aware of to allay the heartburnings, to disarm antagonism, and to promote the unity of spirit for which we pray. It is not the mere fact of your having done what no one of your predecessors has attempted for the last 200 years; it is the manner of your doing it and the weight and wisdom of the words you spoke. Believe me, the indirect effect of Monday's gathering will outlast our lives.'

"Later on, in his last Diocesan Charge, Dr. Tait expressed his general view of the duty of the Church towards Noncomformity, and touched lightly upon the revival of the 'somewhat narrow system' which was one of the drawbacks of the otherwise healthy Oxford movement, and which it is time we should now make an effort to get rid of. The Archbishop said:—

'The Church of Christ throughout the world would, it must be remembered, be deprived of a vast proportion of its worshippers, if we left out of sight our Christian brotherhood with non-episcopal congregations at home, and the overwhelming mass of such congregations in the United States of America. Thus I trust that we English Churchmen are learning more and more to realise once again that great idea which was so powerful of old to stir men's hearts and make them help each other—that there is a vast community cemented by Christian faith and principle which, amid all national and other special differences, join together the whole body of those who worship God in Christ. . . . The Oxford revival of forty or fifty years ago conferred many benefits on English Society. . . . Still I think this must be granted on the other hand—that the teaching thus introduced or resuscitated, notwithstanding all its claims to Catholicity, was and is based on a somewhat narrow system, and has confined Churchmen's sympathies in the direction in which before they were ready to expand. My predecessors in the Episcopate had, I think, less difficulty than we should experience nowadays in welcoming the co-operation of such men as was Robert Hall in the days of our fathers, and wishing them God-speed in their labours to resist prevailing infidelity.'"

THEN draw me nearer day by day,
Each to his brethren, all to God;
Let the world take us as she may,
We must not change our road;
But fixed to hold Love's banner fast,
And by submission win at last.

THE SUPERINTENDENT'S STANDPOINT.*

BY HOWARD YOUNG, LL.B.

I.

MARK TWAIN somewhere says that when he was a man he always thought that all a master had to do was to stroll down to work at his own convenience and look round to see things were going on all right and spend the profits which his men earned. When, however, he became a master he found that he had not only to earn his own living, but also the living of a lot of people who simply had to do what they were told and as soon as closing time came were free of all responsibility. I know teachers are not free of responsibility when school is finished, but a superintendent should certainly be free of class teaching. He is doing a great deal of good in the school in simply going from class to class taking the names down in his register, inquiring after absent children, possibly on occasion assisting a teacher in his lesson with some illustration or anecdote and generally keeping each class free from outside disturbing influences. In addition there is an abundance of detail work for him to do.

It is hardly necessary to say that it is advisable to have as superintendent one who has had experience in class teaching. He should also have business capacity and should do his utmost to bring to his school the grip that he takes into his business. He must have a certain love of and sympathy with children, and he will find this love naturally increase as the work becomes more engrossing. Unless he has a certain depth of religious feeling he is not likely to undertake the work, but it is quite possible for him to be a good superintendent without having the power of giving eloquent expression to such feeling.

The School Exists for the Scholars.

There are one or two thoughts a superintendent must constantly keep in mind. The first is that the school exists for the scholars. I am not ignoring for a minute the gain the teachers get from it, and I say at once that the training is of great and permanent value to the teachers. It has a tendency to humanise them. It also tends to break down class distinctions. But it also follows from the observation that the school exists for the scholars that we are not doing our duty if we drive awkward children from the school, at all events until we have exhausted all our powers and until we have absolutely satisfied ourselves that harm will result to the other scholars if such children be not sent away. Only to give a couple of examples. One of our most earnest teachers was one of our most difficult scholars. After leaving the school he enlisted and was sent out to India with his regiment. There he was denounced as an Atheist by a Wesleyan minister because he had avowed himself a Unitarian. He communicated with his old teacher, who had lost sight of him, but who thereafter kept in full touch with him. Promptly on his return to England he asked to take up Sunday-school work, and is, as I say, doing excellent work in the school.

Another young fellow of sixteen or seventeen, who had given his teacher so much trouble that he had thought of asking him to stop away, won his heart by saying after an Easter half-holiday, "Thank goodness, it's Sunday-school to-day. I didn't know what to do with myself last Sunday."

It is Voluntary Work.

Another point that both the superintendent and teacher should always bear in mind is that the Sunday-school is conducted on the voluntary system. It is almost amusing to see how paralysed sometimes an ordinary day-school teacher is on attempting to take up Sunday-school work. He is puzzled, for a time at all events, to know how the school can be conducted with the apology for punishment which the Sunday-school teacher has. The teachers, including the superintendent, are volunteers. You remember it was not so at first, for Raikes paid certain old dames for teaching children.

I remember first being impressed with the fact that the superintendent was a volunteer when as a youngster I had been taken to task rather severely for coming late, especially when I ventured to justify myself by asserting that the school doors had been closed before the clock struck ten. It rankled with me during the time I was taking my class, but when the superintendent expressed regret for having spoken sharply it came to me strongly that his work of administering the school and of keeping a number of volunteer teachers in good heart for their duties was a difficult one. I realised, too, that he, like myself, was a volunteer.

Organisation of the School.

To a large extent the organisation of the school is in the superintendent's own hands. The arrangement of classes is a matter to which he has to give a good deal of thought. I personally feel that the most important classes are the very junior and the senior, although I know the importance of the intermediate classes; but the classes which most children enter when they join a school, and the classes from which they naturally leave, should be strongly officered. I strongly feel that the infant class is of very great importance. In anything like a settled neighbourhood, if the children can be caught as infants and the infant class is well conducted, they will get the attachment of the school into their blood, and are likely to remain there throughout their school life. I could tell you of children not particularly well conducted who have entered the infant class, who have been taken away, in one case because the mother believed the report that the Bible was not used in the school, and who have naturally gravitated back. The attachment to the school had got into their bones.

Influence of the Senior Classes.

The senior classes of boys and girls are those that very largely give the tone to the school. One knows the assistance in this respect that even one boy or one girl can give. If the leaders of those two classes have their hearts in the school they can be of great value to it. Recently, when visiting a public day-school to make full inquiries about it, I asked the headmaster, "What are your eldest boys like?" His answer was, "They are a set of sterling fellows, and I am proud of them." That is the sort of spirit one likes to hear of. So much importance does he attach to keeping up the tone of his eldest boys that he regularly every summer takes a large house for the holidays and invites a number of those boys and some of his junior masters to spend a part of their holidays with him. I could tell you of one boy and one girl, both of them brimming over with fun and mischief, whose influence on our own school was splendid.

The tone of the school is, as I have said, largely in the hands of the senior classes, but of course in many ways the superintendent can assist in keeping it up, and probably by nothing more than by checking sneaking. I don't know whether any of you saw some comments by a school inspector on the system of sneaking which a certain headmaster had encouraged. The order in the school was good, but it must have made that headmaster hot to read the scathing remarks of the inspector upon the insult to schoolboy morality which he was committing. Let the superintendent aim for the utmost truthfulness, but instantly check anything like sneaking.

Arrangement of Classes.

In the arrangement of his classes the superintendent can do his utmost, so far as the material at his disposal will allow, to adapt the classes to the teacher. Above the infant class I think it would be found best to limit the size of the classes to eight or nine. It does not naturally follow that a lady teacher is best for taking girls. In fact it has been suggested that the teacher of each class should be of the opposite sex to the members of it. I don't go so far as this, but I know of the best result following from its being done in certain cases. We probably all of us know of teachers excellently adapted for certain classes being practically incapable for others. The teacher who can take with mutual advantage the senior class of girls may be unequal to taking a class of infants.

The Superintendent and the Children.

One of the first things to which a superintendent should devote his attention is the learning of the names of the scholars. Also let him learn as much about them and their home life as possible. He can often encourage a harassed teacher with an awkward scholar by letting the teacher know a little of the scholar's home life. The advantage in the question of order, too, of his being able to identify by name the individual children is very great. It is hardly necessary to add that a superintendent must be strictly impartial. It is almost impossible not to be attracted by certain children, but don't let them see it. Rather keep your kindest words and acts for the shabby, poor, neglected children.

Punctuality and Good Order.

I would recommend to superintendents not simply to be punctual but to be at the school well before the commencement. I don't know what it is, but if children's spirits are allowed to rise during the quarter of an hour before school, both the superintendent and the teachers are likely to have a stiff time; but if the superintendent has been at the school during that quarter of an hour, somehow or other the steam does not get up and a quiet time is the result. Don't, however, try for strict silence during the mustering, but leave open the safety valve of quiet chatting amongst the children sitting in their places, taking care at the same time that there shall be no noise. Children have an innate love of fairness, and if they receive encouragement to chat before school they are prepared for quiet when the hour arrives for commencing.

There are drawbacks to the superintendent's being punctual. A certain number of teachers will rely upon his having their classes ready for them and in good order, and so will put off till the last moment (or later) their arrival at the school.

Among the duties which the other teachers almost instinctively delegate to the superintendent is that of obtaining further assistance in the teaching staff. You know the style of thing. The teacher, perhaps, especially one who has not been very long at it, sends a courteous letter to the superintendent announcing his resignation, ending with "believing" or "trusting" that you will have no difficulty in obtaining a teacher to fill my place "or who will prove himself more capable than myself." That is the time when the superintendent feels sore. The easy assumption that there are a number of individuals only laying in wait for a vacancy among the teachers to jump in and seize the vacant seat is—well, let us say charming. I don't know how it is to be done, but I should like teachers to have to resign in full view of the whole body of teachers, so that they may fall on him and rend him.

THE INFLUENCE OF PERSONALITY IN RELIGIOUS INSTRUCTION.

II.

We have spoken of the amplitude and wealth of contents included in what we call "personality"; of how much there is in our personality more than our own thoughts about ourselves—whether those thoughts are pleasant or the reverse; of the fact that much of what we really are may be unknown to ourselves, while yet it will produce its proper effect through our life, over and above the effect of the words we deliberately utter and the deeds we deliberately do. Personal influence is not indeed an effluence, or something coming forth from us in a subtle, invisible form; but even such a metaphor contains a truth. We might pursue this fascinating theme much further; on the one hand, we might be led into the most advanced speculations of recent psychology, concerning the "subliminal self,"—the mental life lying below the level of clear consciousness; and on the other, we might be led to revive the old idea of the "person" as the mask worn or the part played—could Shakespeare have been thinking of this?—and to speak of human personality at its highest and best as only the mask, the persona, through which the divine voice speaks. But our present purpose brings us much nearer to common earth. It is enough for us to remember that whatever personal influence may be, it is such that personality is catching. It is the foundation of all our best work among our fellow-creatures. Personal influence we needs must acquire, if we are to do anything worth doing; but when we have acquired it, we may for that very reason fail to do many things that we are anxious, and rightly anxious, to do.

In order to illustrate the meaning of what we have just said, we may dwell on one or two familiar aspects of what the minister of religion has to do, and then pass to the special case of one who has to give religious instruction to young people.

One of the greatest preachers of the nineteenth century, Phillips Brooks, gave this definition of preaching: "Truth passed through the fire of personality." A somewhat cynical critic once remarked that occasionally it seemed as if the truth in a sermon had been passed through the water of personality. We need not resist the imputation, for it only serves further to illustrate our point. Whether the "truth" is made to burn and shine, or is watered down to being limp and powerless by its passage through a personality, still that is the only channel through which it can come. This is true of teaching of every kind; but it is more true and more important of religious instruction than of any other. Now, in the average Nonconformist church the minister may have a personal hold on his people in two ways: by his pulpit utterances, or by direct personal intercourse apart from pulpit work. If he is to succeed at all, his influence must excel in at least one of these two ways; to fail in both is to fail indeed. Here we touch a real source of weakness in Nonconformist church-life—more especially in public worship, which is the chief object for which the Church is supposed to exist. It is—to borrow a colloquial phrase—too much a "one man business."

You appoint a man to be your mouthpiece in what should be the highest act of life: he is to express what Worship means for you—or even to make it mean something for you. If the service is flat or a failure, it is his failure, not yours; if he succeeds, if you feel that you have been interested and uplifted, it is through what he has said. Even if he were a religious genius, and deserved to be called an inspired prophet, still the inspiration must come through him, and must be affected by coming so. The truth is passed through the fire of his personality; and even if the essential part of what he says derives its power from that superpersonal source which the word "inspiration" implies, still a great deal of what is attractive in his work is due to his personal and peculiar gifts; due, not to what he says or does, but to the way he says or does it. Hence it so often happens that when a successful minister ceases to preach, many of his admirers cease to worship. The extreme case of this sort is seen when, on the departure of an able and eloquent minister, the congregation which he has gathered round him is scattered within a few months and the church closed and sold—only because one man has gone. It is not well that such things should be possible.

I mention these difficulties, not in order to dwell upon them further; I mention them chiefly because they illustrate on a large scale what takes place, on a much smaller scale, but more constantly and uniformly, in the relation of the religious teacher to his class of young people. Here everything depends on the one person—the class as a rule would rather hinder than help. Your first difficulty, as a teacher, is to gain a personal hold on your class; this is the necessary foundation of any successful work with them. And when you have been privileged to gain that hold, your next difficulty is to prevent its becoming a hindrance. The first difficulty is familiar enough. Your opportunities are so few and so short; and there may be influences at work on your pupils, from their surroundings of every day, which are wholly adverse to you. It may be that, for one hour a week, you have to try to influence children, untaught, ill-trained, from poor and overcrowded homes. Yet, even when you have succeeded in holding and "interesting" them as we say—then the second difficulty springs up: it will be your ways of saying and doing things, more than what you do or say, that is influencing them. You may have succeeded unconsciously in attaching them strongly to your personal ways and methods, and they may be really the better for it; while yet you may have failed to attract them to the things that you deliberately set before your mind to teach them. We will suppose that you wish to interest them in some points of religious thought—particularly in the ideas that a Free Christian Church stands for; you make up your mind as to the form in which this "doctrinal" instruction is to be given; and they appear to be interested. Are you interesting them in the beliefs in question, or in yourself? The better teacher you are, the more likely it is to be yourself: there is the paradox.

And the remedy? We must remember that though the difficulty is both curious and important, it is, for the teacher of the young, not very fundamental. For the minister's work it is most fundamental, but of him we are not now speaking. To the teacher it may be said that though he may miss doing what he consciously tries to do, yet, just in proportion to his real earnestness and sincerity, he will do good, by the way, and far more good than he will know of. In the meantime—and this has some significance for the preacher, too—let him spare no pains to make his teaching as concrete, as objective as possible. He will need tools for teaching—objects independent of himself, on which the pupils may, so to speak, hang the ideas which he imparts.* According to the age of the pupils "tools" will be stories (true or not, as long as they have naturally in themselves a bearing on the life which is familiar to the pupils), pictures, models, any possible illustrations which the pupils themselves can be induced to find and bring; stories of great lives, lives of teachers and reformers, which may make the beliefs which they illustrate seem living realities—the best kind of "doctrinal instruction."

It scarcely needs to be said that this brief catalogue is not exhaustive. But there is no need to labour the point, for we are awake to the value of this concrete teaching now. What we need is probably a great deal more light on the ways of using our tools. A conference devoted to nothing but the consideration of "tools for teachers" would have some useful results. And it is worth remembering that while the caustic remark of the late Master of Balliol is certainly true, that "not even the youngest of us is infallible," it is also true that the most experienced person of the maturest age is but a child of an older growth.

S. H. Mellone.

OBITUARY.

LADY BOWRING.

Our readers will share the deep regret with which we announce the death of the cultured and venerable Lady Bowring, who passed away on Monday at her residence, Baring-crescent, Exeter, after a fortnight's illness. Had she lived till Wednesday, she would have completed her eighty-sixth year. Few faces were better known than hers at our meetings, where, in past years, her voice has often been heard hopefully pleading the cause of a large-minded and practical Christianity. In the West her position and personal influence were unique. Her interest in all that concerned our denominational life was incessant, and as one by one the friends of earlier years were taken away, she extended her kindly affections to a generation that looked up to her with true reverence. Who that has lodged under that hospitable roof, or met there in the pleasant but ever purposeful little reunions which she delighted to arrange, will forget the stately courtesy, the simple womanliness, and the unaffected piety that characterised her? Age had left her lonely and with ebbing forces, but still with rare courage and dutiful directness she persevered, doing what she could, up to the peaceful end.

Lady Bowring was a daughter of Mr. Thomas Castle, of Bristol, and one of a family of fourteen children, of whom she was the sole survivor. She was married in 1860 to Sir John Bowring, linguist, diplomatist, and poet; and, being herself of high intellectual capacity, she helped her husband in the literary labours of his later years, and after his death in 1872 published a collection of his poems which was followed by another a few years ago. She had no children, but found an abundant sphere of work in her household and the world around her. She was in her time an ardent politician on the Liberal side; a member of the Exeter School Board; a member of the Devon Association for the advancement of science, literature, and art; a prominent supporter of the University Extension Movement; a devoted worker for the Royal Hospital; and a warm friend of the Societies for Preventing Cruelty to Animals and to Children. In short, it would be difficult to name any of the educational or philanthropic institutions of the city in which she was not practically interested. She was an apt and dignified speaker, and blended a good deal of humour with her shrewd and graceful remarks.

Lady Bowring was greatly attached to George's Meeting and to its gifted minister, the Rev. T. W. Chignell, and she was never so happy as when some new opening occurred for extending the usefulness of the congregation. She will be much missed. Her remains were on Wednesday interred beside those of her husband in the Higher Cemetery, amid a great concourse of rich and poor who gave many signs of sincere respect and tender memory.

THE LATE REV. T. W. SCOTT.

The Rev. W. H. Burgess, of Accrington, has sent us the following supplementary note on Mr. Scott's work:—In the notice of the life and work of the late Rev. T. W. Scott in your last issue there is no mention of his valuable labours as a teacher. He went as minister to Horsham in May, 1877, having previously held short pastorates at Paisley, Crewe, Alcester, and Sheffield, where he was associated with Dr. Vance Smith as junior minister. Soon after coming to Horsham he began to take pupils. There was need for a good school in the town, for the old Grammar School of Collier's foundation (since reorganised) had sunk to the level of an elementary Church school. Mr. Scott quickly won the confidence of the townsfolk, and the number of boys sent to him rapidly increased. Feeling happy in this work of tuition he resolved to give his whole time to it, and accordingly resigned his pulpit in December, 1879, being succeeded as minister by the Rev. John Taylor. Mr. Scott had married, in the preceding January, a daughter of Mr. Christopher Dunlop, of Paisley, an excellent woman in every way. They took a roomy house on the north side of Horsham, and there for some years the school was carried on. Besides boys from the town, some walked in from out-lying places such as Stammerham and Warnham, others came in daily by train—the Carters and Eversheds from Billingshurst and myself from Crawley, while one of the Crosskeys from Lewes boarded in the house. Mr. Scott did not worry us much with examinations; what he was concerned with was teaching, and that he did right well. He loved his books and his pipe. My recollection of him as he then was is of a tall, spare-built, bearded man, with a fine head of unruly shaggy black hair, and eyes that looked out piercingly from behind his glasses. He had a rich Scottish accent, and delivered his matter at breakneck speed. On his retirement to Lochmaben he still took a few pupils. He subsequently ministered at Lydgate, and then when he thought it well to retire permanently, the financial crash came that made it necessary for him to seek active service once again. Thus in 1894 he accepted a call to Glenarm, where he laboured to the end. That his old friends at Horsham have not forgotten his work as preacher and teacher amongst them was made manifest when at their last Whit Sunday gathering they passed a resolution of affectionate sympathy with him in his painful illness.

[We may add that Mr. Scott was an occasional and valued contributor to The Inquirer; his work, which consisted chiefly of literary and biographical studies, but also included some leading articles, was evidently that of scholarly and original mind.—Ed. Inq.]

Every human soul has the germ of some flowers within; and they would open, if they could only find sunshine and free air to expand in. I always told you that not having enough sunshine was what ailed the world. Make the people happy, and there will not be half the quarrelling or a tenth part of the wickedness there is. —Lydia Maria Child.

THE WELSH ASSOCIATION'S CENTENARY.

A VISITOR'S IMPRESSIONS.

An outline of the proceedings connected with the centenary of the Welsh Unitarian Association, which was celebrated July 9 and 10, appeared in The Inquirer last week. I think that many of your readers may be interested by a few notes by an "Eye-Witness." By way of introduction, let me give a brief historical notice of the Association and its work.

The Unitarian Association in Wales was formed in Neath, on Friday, Oct. 8, 1802. It was then called "The Society of Believers in the Divine Unity in South Wales." Of the twelve counties which form Wales, only two are really and effectively touched by Unitarianism, and those two are in South Wales; consequently in 1802 as in 1902 the Association was geographically limited to South Wales. Its name is virtually "The South Wales Unitarian Association," though our Celtic friends style themselves "The Welsh Unitarian Association." The word Welsh probably refers to the language of the Association rather than to its geographical distribution.

Of the six gentlemen who in 1802 formed the Association, the name of one—namely, Edward Williams, or Iolo Morganwg—is familiar to every Welshman, and also to every scholar interested in questions pertaining to Welsh literature. Another interesting fact connected with the formation of "The Society of Believers in the Divine Unity in South Wales" is that among the fifty original members there are several names well known in English Unitarian circles—namely, the Revs. Thomas Belsham (London), Timothy Kenrick (Exeter), Theophilus Lindsay (London), and Dr. Toulmin (Taunton). Though not financially supported as it should be in Wales by individual subscriptions, the Association is doing magnificent work, and Welshmen, whether in England or Wales, who are interested in the development and spread of an undogmatic religion in the Principality, should certainly come to the support of the few brave men who are pressing forward in the midst of many difficulties. Apart from the religious comradeship infused into the scattered and somewhat isolated churches, the Association is attempting to carry out several important and essential services to the Welsh churches.

In the first place, the ministers, who are sadly underpaid, receive as much financial support as the low condition of the funds will allow. Upon inquiry the information was elicited that no minister in Wales—that is, in Welsh Unitarian Churches—receives more than £2 a week. The majority receive much less. Much may be said of the unsatisfactory financial condition of our Welsh ministers; but there are other matters at present which need mentioning. The existing financial basis of the Association is the work of 1894, and the effort to keep the ministers above the waves of care is worthy of great praise.

In the next place, it is impossible to estimate the service of the Association to the Welsh churches by its publication of a monthly periodical entitled, Yr Ymofynydd—translated into English, "The Inquirer." With its motto of "Freedom, Truth, and Love" the Ymofynydd carries into the homes of the people information on all questions relative to Unitarianism.

Again, the Association has decided to carry on Postal Mission work, and already for this purpose Mr. Armstrong's book, "Back to Jesus," has been translated into Welsh by the Rev. J. Hathren Davies, the highly-esteemed minister of our church at Cefn, near Merthyr Tydvil. There is undoubtedly a large field for this kind of labour in Wales, and with a good selection of appropriate books much real and aggressive work can be accomplished. Such is, briefly, the history and work of the Welsh Unitarian Association.

Trebanos and Gellionen.

The Centenary Meetings of the Association were held at Trebanos and Gellionen, which are two typical Welsh places of worship, governed and maintained by one religious community, one church, and administered to by the Rev. T. J. Jenkins.

Trebanos Chapel takes its name from a small village on the highway from Swansea to Breconshire.

Gellionen, or Ash Grove, is the name given to the other chapel, which is the parent Unitarian Church. It is situated two or three miles from Trebanos on the summit of the mountain. The chapel stands alone on a bleak and exposed moorland, absolutely isolated. Standing in the vicinity of the chapel there is but one solitary house to be seen in the distance, and that originally built for visitors who once frequented a mineral spring in the neighbourhood. The first impression made upon the mind of the visitor is the extreme foolishness of the people who erected a chapel on the summit of a barren mountain, far away from the homes of the worshippers; but a few moments' thought disabuses the mind, for silently, but irresistibly, the lonely chapel becomes an appalling witness to the "Five Miles Act," and the difficulty, on the part of our Nonconformist forefathers, of obtaining suitable sites for their Bethels.

The first meeting of the centenary celebration was held in the valley—in the Trebanos Chapel. The conditions under which we, in modern times, work differ immensely from those of our ancestors. The wise people of Gellionen Chapel saw this clearly, and decided to build a Chapel of Ease, in the valley, on the Swansea highway, and the venture is an unqualified success. To the centenary meetings ministers and laymen came from Cardiganshire and different parts of Glamorganshire.

The evening meeting, preceded by a Communion service, was well worthy the occasion. The chapel was full and the tone of the meeting was that of men—though in the minority—conscious of strength and ultimate victory.

It might be said that the occasion was peculiar—that meetings of the kind would be inspiring in any part of the country. Quite possible. The moment of exaltation is decidedly not the standard for judging the ordinary work of the year. But I availed myself of the opportunity, on the following Sunday and Monday, to visit three churches, i.e., Aberdare, Cefn and Dowlais, thirty miles from Trebanos, and at a distance of some four to six miles from each other respectively, and found the churches visited animated by the same spirit. Welsh Unitarianism—if the spiritual force it now possesses is allowed to perform its work—has a future before it of no insignificant glory.

The meetings on Thursday were held at Gellionen, and a full day's programme from early morning till late evening was provided.

Let it be remembered where Gellionen is—on the moorland, two or three miles from Trebanos. When the minister, the Rev. T. J. Jenkins, announced on Wednesday evening that the meetings on Thursday would be held on the "Mount," one wondered whether it was a joke or an allusion to Mount Zion. Thursday morning, however, revealed the grim reality of "up the mountain." Two or three miles of collar work, along a steep ascent, over a road that the old Romans would have despised, declared it no joke. Nevertheless, it was in reality Mount Zion, for thither the Socinian—a word still used in Wales—tribes came in groups, until the "little church on yon mountain" was full to overflowing. And what a day! The air was no doubt pure, but it was pitched in a high key, and along with its north-west blustering tones it would throw, at intervals, its showers of cold rain in angry defiance against the walls and windows of the chapel. Sixty years ago this was the only Unitarian chapel in the neighbourhood, and thither came the pioneers of religious freedom, in winter and summer, in snow and sunshine, to worship God. Such is the place and such was the day which saw at least 600 men and women gathered together, eagerly listening to the "men of God" who had come to speak to them.

The address of the Rev. W. James, J.P., president, was an admirable one. Mr. James is undoubtedly a tower of strength in Welsh Unitarian circles, and one hopes that he and his brave comrades will long be spared and ably supported to carry on the work which lies near to their heart.

In Wales there is a large field, "white already to harvest," and it would be the greatest evil that could befall our Welsh fellow-workers to allow the opportunity to pass.

The Centenary meetings of the Welsh Unitarian Association were a great success, numerically and spiritually, and it is hoped that we all have returned to our respective fields of labour, not only encouraged, but inspired also, to attempt more, to accomplish more, in the future than has been attempted and accomplished in the past.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Clifton.—On Sunday afternoon, July 27, Dr. Warschauer addressed, by invitation, the men's class at Old King-street Baptist Church on the subject, "Did Jesus Claim to be God?" An audience of from two to three hundred men gave an attentive hearing to an address which purposely treated the theme exclusively from the scriptural point of view; and the discussion which ensued was not only marked by uniform courtesy and good feeling toward the speaker, but showed that a considerable number of those present were either partially or wholly in sympathy with what they had heard. It is a somewhat remarkable fact that a Unitarian should be asked to speak in a Baptist Church on a purely doctrinal and controversial subject; but while the invitation itself bears witness to a growing readiness to give a hearing to heretics, the temper of the audience showed still more clearly how many are prepared to-day to accept a presentation of Jesus which glorifies his pure humanity, and how wide a field there exists for the spread of a reasonable Christianity.

London: Hampstead.—A series of Sunday evening discourses of considerable interest on eminent preachers has been given by the Rev. Edgar Daplyn, and has attracted unusually large congregations. The subject of the first was Canon Kingsley, of the second J. H. Newman, of the third Theodore Parker, and the fourth and last, F. W. Robertson. A fifth discourse on Ernest Renan will be given on Sunday evening next.

London: Stratford.—The annual excursion of the Sunday-school took place on Saturday, July 12, to Forest Lodge, High Beach. One hundred and three children and sixty-six teachers and friends were conveyed by brakes. The teachers desire to thank those friends who kindly contributed towards the expenses. On Sunday, July 20, special services were held in connection with the Young People's Guild, conducted by the Rev. W. H. Rose, of Walthamstow, President of the Guild. There were about sixty present in the evening. On Saturday, July 26, the annual outing of the Guild was held at Chingford, at which there were twenty present.

North and East Lancashire Unitarian Mission.—At a meeting of the Committee of the North and East Lancashire Unitarian Mission, held at Bury, July 17, 1902, the following resolution was unanimously passed:—"That the Committee of the North and East Lancashire Unitarian Mission accepts with regret the resignation of the Rev. A. H. Dolphin, as Missionary at Leigh. It offers to him its warmest thanks for the services he has rendered to the cause at Leigh under exceptionally trying circumstances, and its best wishes for his welfare in his new pastorate."—Mr. Dolphin is removing to Upperthorpe, Sheffield.

Scarborough.—On Saturday, July 19, the annual Sunday-school excursion was held, when fifty or sixty scholars, teachers, and friends spent the afternoon and evening on and about the farm of Mr. Hope, at Cloughton. The members of the choir and friends, numbering over thirty, also had a pleasant outing to Swainton, on the invitation of Mr. H. J. Morton, J.P., on July 26.

Stockton-on-Tees.—The Sunday-school had its annual excursion on Saturday last, July 26, the visit being to Seaton Carew. Both scholars and teachers attended in good numbers. In spite of showers, a thoroughly enjoyable day was spent. On the previous Saturday the Band of Hope excursion was held, a goodly number being taken to the beautiful village of Swainby, at the foot of the Cleveland hills. The weather was all that could be desired.

Taunton.—The annual flower-show and entertainment, on behalf of the funds of the Sunday-school, took place July 24. Miss Venner and Miss Tappe acted as hon. secs., and there was a good attendance of friends. The wild-flower bouquets were especially fine. The prizes were distributed by Mrs. Crook (wife of the minister). A sale of useful and ornamental articles also took place, and a cantata and other musical pieces were performed. The whole proceedings were happy and successful.

ABERYSTWYTH

("The Biarritz of Wales")

Is highly recommended for invalids, and possesses the most equable temperature, its shore being swept by the Gulf Stream and S.W. breezes of the Atlantic. The drainage is perfect, and the town is supplied with the purest water from Plymlimmon. The late Sir James Clarke, M.D., says: "A fortnight is equivalent to a month's residence in most watering places." Guides on application to the Town Clerk.

THE SOUTH SHORE UNITARIAN CHURCH, BLACKPOOL,

has purchased, at a cost of nearly £600, a plot of freehold land, and they now appeal for help to erect a plain, substantial building to serve for all purposes. It is hoped to be able to do this for £1,500, making a total cost of £2,100. The land, thanks to the generosity of Mrs. John Grundy, of Summerseat; Miss S. Scholes Wrigley, of Windermere (on her own and her late mother's behalf), and Mr. R. T. Heape, of Rochdale, is entirely paid for. The Congregation have themselves promised over £300 towards the erection of the building. They carry on the Services and the Sunday School without any grant, and they feel that the remarkable success of their efforts justifies them in asking friends to help them to carry on their work under more favourable circumstances than at present. Their appeal has the full approval of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, the North and East Lancashire Mission, and the North Lancashire and Westmorland Unitarian Association; and the B. and F. U. A. has promised £25 to the Building Fund.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

MISS ROSAMOND DAVENPORT-HILL, who died on Tuesday in her seventy-eighth year, was a woman of singularly clear mind and of a temper intelligently devout. She was a member of the School Board for London for eighteen years, and her share of its work, which was a large one, was most faithfully performed. While not aspiring to a prominent part in its public debates, she never failed to exert a truly liberalising influence upon her fellow-members; but it was in the practical duties of her office that her talents were most conspicuous. It may be said of her, and it is the highest praise, that she was a worthy member of a worthy family.

THE interest taken at Birmingham in the Education Bill is very keen, as indeed it should be. Unionists, like Councillor Titterton, who have strongly supported the Irish and South African policy of the Government are now on the point of revolt, speaking very strongly about the surrender to the clericals. Unitarians undoubtedly differ very widely on many political questions, but we cannot see how any of them can view the proposals of the Government with equanimity, not to say approval. Mr. Chamberlain, in particular, has always been a good friend to national education, and it is evidently extremely painful to many of his admirers and supporters to observe his present attitude.

IN the course of his impressive and strengthening discourse at the funeral of the late Mr. Frank Taylor, the Rev. C. J. Street said: "In the last illness, when as yet it seemed, at least to him, as though he might return to active life in our midst he expressed a pathetic resolve to give himself more thoroughly than ever to the causes which he had most dearly at heart. That determination," said Mr. Street, "must not be taken as thwarted and lost because he is no longer with us, but the sphere in which it can be carried out is changed." True, "the blessed hope of everlasting life" is never more comforting than at such a time. But will not the record of a life so fruitful stimulate hearts here and there to use well the continued opportunities which lie before them? The ministers who so much enjoyed his friendship will assuredly feel new inspiration, and there are laymen who will not fail to feel anew the call to high service.

MRS. HUMPHRY WARD'S attempt to cater for school-children who have to spend their holidays in London streets is deservedly attracting much sympathetic notice. The title, "Summer Vacation School," is the only unfortunate thing about it, and even that is unfortunate only in the eyes of those who do not know how thoroughly many of the little ones enjoy their ordinary school hours nowadays. Mrs. Ward has secured the help of a large staff of teachers, and some 600 little scholars now meet on five days in the week in the rooms of the Passmore Edwards Settlement in Tavistock-street, and in the large and shady garden at the back, the use of which has been obtained from the Duke of Bedford. The children use no school-books, but spend their time in such occupations as singing, drawing, brush-work, nature-study, modelling, drill, dancing, doll-dressing, cookery, needle-work, &c. Half the "lessons" are given in the open air. Such "schools" are already in full use in many places in the United States, and we hope they will multiply here.

THE decision of the Wesleyan Conference in the case of Professor Agar Beet appears to commend itself to the sense of Wesleyans generally, and if so, it is a noteworthy sign of the times. Readers will remember that Dr. Beet, who has taught at the Richmond Theological College for a considerable time, got into some trouble with his brethren through the publication of eschatological views widely different from those of the Wesleyan tradition. More recently he issued a work on "The Immortality of the Soul," in which he challenged the belief that man is by nature immortal. The Conference, after seriously considering whether he should or should not be reappointed to his post at College, has, by a large majority, decided in his favour; and Dr. Beet has engaged not to republish his peculiar views on these subjects without the consent of the Conference. This is hardly "free teaching in theology," but at any rate the Wesleyan students and ministers will know that in the opinion of the Conference one may depart from the Wesleyan standard of orthodoxy, at least in the direction indicated, and still be accepted as "sound" enough to preach the Gospel and even to prepare others for the same high task.

THE late Professor Auguste Bouvier, who held the chair of Dogmatic Theology in the University of Geneva from 1865 to 1893, exerted a profound influence over successive generations of his students, and to one of the most distinguished of these—afterwards his colleague and close friend, Professor Edouard Montet, the present Dean of the Theological Faculty, not unknown to our readers—the family of the late professor entrusted the delicate task of preparing for publication the elaborate MS. of the lectures of his former teacher. Under the title "Dogmatique Chrétienne" the work is announced for publication in two volumes by the Librairie Fischbacher, 33, Rue de Seine, Paris, at a subscription price of ten francs.

PROFESSOR BOUVIER'S MS., of more than 2,000 pages, containing many notes and additions to the original scheme of his lectures, bore testimony in the most interesting manner to the development of his religious thought, but rendered the editor's task by no means a light one. Some sections of the course, for the purpose of lecturing, were worked out with much greater fulness than others, and Professor Montet had to decide how to deal with these in the interest of the reading public. Thus the sections in exposition of the dogmatic teaching of the Bible, and the history of dogma in the Church, have been reduced to their essential points, but the sections in which Bouvier expounded his own thought, and particularly his theory of the Life Divine, which is said to have been of profound originality, are given in full. Others, besides old Genevan students, will be grateful to Professor Montet for the care which he has bestowed upon this publication.

MR. STOPFORD BROOKE, the Athenæum reports, during his stay at Bad Homburg, is revising his monograph on Robert Browning. The book, which is to be published in September by Messrs. Isbister and Co., will be a companion to Mr. Brooke's delightful volume on Tennyson. The principal subjects dealt with are:—"Browning and Tennyson," "Browning's Treatment of Nature," "Browning's Theory of Human Life," "Browning as the Poet of Art," "Browning and Sor-dello," "The Dramas," "Poems of Love and of other Passions," "The Ring and the Book," "Last Poems." Those who were privileged to hear Mr. Brooke's lectures on Browning at University College will look with a very special interest for the publication of this volume.

Manchester has within the last fortnight offered hospitality to several large and important conferences; the latest was that of the British Medical Association. The general opinion of the doctors as to the importance of sanitary conditions of life should strengthen Sanitary Reform and make good citizens more persistent in their demands that wholesome dwellings and plenty of fresh air and light shall be made possible for all. There was a general consensus that overcrowding and poverty are the chief causes of tuberculosis, and that this disease, which Dr. Niven said kills one-seventh of the human race, could be greatly reduced if not overcome entirely by attention to wholesome living and cleanliness.

With such solid ground for action in the prevention of this and other devastating diseases it is pitiful to find our medical men, at the same time that they see and know all this, spreading horrible diseases among animals and inflicting upon them terrible pain, under the pretence of building up a science of preventive medicine. The true preventive medicine is the establishment of wholesome living, not the communication of human diseases to animals and their return in a mitigated form. The various experiments referred to at the Conference—the infliction of definite and positive pain, and the spreading of disease with a view to a possible increase of knowledge or some ultimate benefit to patients—are saddening examples of one of the latest forms of that terrible mistake—doing evil that good may come.

On the dangerous trades and those engaged in them much was said, especially about white-lead poisoning at the potteries and elsewhere. The idea expressed was that frequent medical inspection of the workpeople should be made, to ascertain whether plumbism was present to such an extent as to make it probable that continuance at that work would result in speedy death, so that before the catastrophe they might be warned off. If workers recovered sufficiently they might return to their work: if not, the kind of work liable to produce lead-poisoning should not be permitted them. No doubt this idea of restricting the evil, and the insurance fund voluntarily raised by many of the manufacturers, are signs of some tinge of grace in a bad business. But when shall we become real Christians in these matters, and refuse to accept from others the sacrifice we would not make ourselves nor allow our children to make? Some of the products of white lead are useful, some, such as enamelled advertisement plates, are a nuisance. None of them are actually essential to life. If we were the Christians we profess to be we should eat out of wooden bowls and drink out of tin cans rather than cause men and women to suffer from the frightful disease called plumbism.

The medical view of "Ethics" is amusing. The ordinary layman must be forgiven if memories of Spencer's "Data of Ethics," Dr. Martineau's "Types of Ethical Theory," and other philosophical works came to mind as he read the programme. He might, if sanguine, have expected a discussion of the ethics of vivisection and lead-poisoning. But it proved that the ethics section was to find its chief interest in the delinquencies of people who go to hospitals and who could afford to pay a doctor's fee, and the application of the Trade Union principle of a minimum wage to the medical profession. Most trade unions discuss similar questions, and ministers and clergymen find it necessary at times to consider their incomes when they consult together; but doctors are sadly materialising philosophy beyond recognition when they group these questions of wages together and distinguish them from others as belonging specially to the department of Ethics.

At the eighth International Congress of the Press held at Berne last month, sympathetic reference was made by M. Jaunay, of Paris, to the late Mr. P. W. Clayden, who from the first was so deeply interested in the welfare of the Congress. M. Jaunay, we learn from a report in the Athenæum, "spoke of his friend and colleague as one of the earliest promoters of the international movement, and one who to his latest hour strove for its development with loyal, persevering, and affectionate efforts." The Congress is to meet next year at St. Louis, U.S.A., the Press of that city having most hospitably offered free transport across the Atlantic for 300 members. An invitation to Berlin was courteously postponed until 1904.

The Garden City Association is now engaged in the formation of the Garden City Pioneer Company (Limited). The main purpose of this company is the promotion and formation of a limited company to establish a garden city on the lines explained in Mr. Ebenezer Howard's book, "Garden Cities of To-morrow," and set forth in an article in last week's Inquirer. Shareholders in this pioneer company risk the loss of what they subscribe in case this object is not attained. If it is successfully accomplished, they will receive shares in the larger company to the amount they now contribute, and 4 per cent. interest thereon. Applications for shares already received give good promise of success, but a capital of £20,000 is asked for, and several large shareholders become such on condition that the whole capital is raised. The secretary (pro tem.) is Thomas Adams, 77, Chancery-lane, London, W.C.; from him prospectuses may be obtained and papers explaining the scheme and giving the names of the promoters. This enterprise for the good of the people appears to be in good business hands.

In this month's Seed-Sower an article by "T. L. M." discusses the question, "Ethics; or Religion and Ethics?" There are many to whom this subject is of profound interest, and others to whom as years go on it will certainly appeal. Mr. Marshall presents his views in the clear and pointed style long familiar to readers of The Inquirer, and fortifies his statement with quotations apt if not authoritative. The following are his closing remarks:—

I cannot but regret, therefore, the increasing spread of Ethical Societies, because, while admitting the high character and aims of their founders, I fear that if they last for a single generation we shall witness a growing deterioration of the ideal of character and conduct presented in the Sermon on the Mount, and pervading the whole of the New Testament. That Liberal Christians should embrace the Ethical persuasion seems to me to be passing into a distinctly lower level of thought and aspiration. All that is true and good in Ethical publications is borrowed directly from Christianity, and without it we have lost our noblest ideal of service, sacrifice, and aspiration.

I do not care to argue about these matters, or to attempt to prove them by logical processes, which seldom reach those who have given themselves up to the Spirit of Denial. They seem to me to be the primary truths of human consciousness, and I no more blame anyone who denies them than I should blame a blind man who cannot see the beauty and glory of this outer universe. Ethics and Religion seem to me to be one and inseparable, at least in reflective minds; and Law can only justify its supreme authority by being regarded as the Divine revelation of the inner meaning and purpose of the Universe.

In a farewell sermon delivered last month the Rev. F. B. Meyer, of Christ Church, Westminster Bridge-road, who was leaving after a ten years' pastorate, said "the Church" meant all men who admitted Christ as their Master, Saviour, and King. It included all sects from the High Sacramentarian to the Salvation Army, as well as all those whose names might not be found in the books of any sect, but who accept Christ. He had no limitations, though he was sorry for those large-hearted men who had very narrow creeds. That Church, so constituted, had a threefold function—a witnessing, exercising, and worshipping function. In its witnessing function the Church had a right to a voice in politics, but not in party politics. It mattered not to the Church whether a man was a Radical or Conservative, whether he followed this leader or that. But as a Church it should stand forth to protest that the service of the State should be wrought for the divine Master; should urge its noblest sons to resist corruption, and witness in the halls of justice, in Parliament, and in the municipal arena for the vindication of those eternal ideals of righteousness, purity, right, and peace which exalted a nation. In great crises, as in the abolition of slavery, in peace against war, in the giving of houses which could be called homes for the working classes, the united voice of the Church should be heard. She should protest against evil; she should demand that the streets should be kept free from temptations, and protest against the betting and gambling mania.

Dr. Drummond's Essex Hall Lecture, "Thoughts on Christology," is now issued in a neat book, price 1s. net. The views expressed by him have attracted much attention in orthodox circles, and it is not unlikely that a fruitful discussion will arise now that readers can study the ipsissima verba of this remarkable utterance.

Correspondents are requested to note that to be sure of insertion the same week, news must reach the Office by the first post on Thursday at latest, and the earlier in the week the better.

LITERATURE.

THE WORDS OF JESUS.*

THE German original of this book was published in 1898, and was noticed in THE INQUIRER at the time. The author states that this English translation "practically forms a second edition of the work." The differences between the original and the present version are, however, both few and slight. One or two opinions which the author formerly held are withdrawn or modified; and some rather cutting remarks upon the work of certain English writers are softened down—whether by the forbearance of the author or the sympathy of the translator does not appear. Dalman, however, has a right to speak "as one having authority" in all matters relating to the Aramaic language. No other scholar can equal him in thorough mastery of the language of the post-biblical Jewish writings, and his "Grammar of the Jewish-Palestinian Aramaic" is the outcome of years of profound study. Upon the foundation laid in that book is based the work before us, which is an attempt to answer the question, "In what form the words of Jesus must have been uttered in their original language, and what meaning had they in this form for the Jewish hearers?" The present volume contains only Prolegomena, and the author holds out the promise of more than one volume to follow. Those who read the original four years ago are eagerly awaiting the fulfilment of this promise.

An extended notice of the book would hardly be suitable to the pages of THE INQUIRER, since it is extremely technical and quite useless to those who do not easily read the Hebrew character. For almost every page bristles with Hebrew and Aramaic phrases. The same fact makes it difficult to give quotations from the book or to discuss its arguments; at least the printer might object to the task of setting the type. A general sketch of the contents of the book, together with a notice of one or two points of special interest (where, however, all is interesting), is the most that I shall attempt.

The book consists of two main divisions, an Introduction, and a study of the Fundamental Ideas underlying the sayings of Jesus. The Introduction deals chiefly with the hypothesis of a Semitic primitive Gospel, and the conclusion is reached that if there was such a primitive Gospel it certainly was not written in Hebrew, and that the existence of an Aramaic primitive Gospel is highly probable but is not certain. What is certain is that the words of Jesus were originally spoken in Aramaic; their most probable form can only be determined by a careful comparison of the various types of Aramaic dialect contained in the existing literature. The arguments upon which these conclusions are based involve minute study of the so-called Hebraisms of the N. T. Greek, and cannot be summarised here. They are, moreover, somewhat difficult to follow; and though the English translation is on the whole very good, it is occasionally easier to grasp the author's meaning in the original.

In the much longer section entitled Fundamental Ideas, the following phrases are very thoroughly examined, with the purpose of showing their Aramaic equivalent, their use, if any, in contemporary speech, and their special meaning in the Gospels:—The Sovereignty (Kingdom) of God; The Future Age, The Age (Æon); Eternal Life, Life; The World; The Lord (as a designation of God); The Father in Heaven; Other Divine Names; Evasive or precautionary modes of referring to God; The Son of Man; The Son of God; Christ; the Son of David; "The Lord" (as a designation of Jesus); "Master" (as a designation of Jesus). The discussion of these terms takes up 250 pages of the book, and, on the linguistic side, leaves nothing to be desired. It is, however, necessary to distinguish between Dalman the Aramaic scholar and Dalman the interpreter of Jesus; for it is only in the former capacity that he speaks with authority. It is not any special acquaintance with Aramaic which justifies him in saying (p. 190):—

> At the same time Jesus draws a sharp line of distinction between Himself and the disciples in purposely setting aside the usual Jewish "Our Father in heaven" where He Himself is concerned, and yet prescribing its use for His disciples. Matt. vi. 9. From this, too, it may be perceived that it was not the veneration of those who came after that first assigned to Him an exceptional relation to God, incapable of being transferred to others.

That is a point upon which a good deal might be said, and is scarcely relevant in a book which professes to treat its subject from the linguistic rather than the dogmatic side.

By way of illustrating the manner in which Dalman discusses the fundamental ideas just enumerated, I will give a brief summary of the chapter on the phrase "The Son of Man." The first section deals with the linguistic form of the expression, "Son of Man," which is in Hebrew Ben-ādām, and in Aramaic Bar-ᵉnāsh. And it is shown that while the plural is common enough in the form b'nē-ᵉnāshā, the singular bar-ᵉnāsh was not in use in the older Jewish Aramaic literature—(i.e., contemporary with Jesus), except "as an imitation of the Hebrew text, where 'ben-ādām' is confined to poetry and, moreover, uncommon in it." Further, "bar-ᵉnāshā" was never at any time a current Jewish name for the Messiah. The most that can be said is that in the "Similitudes of Enoch," and in 2 Esdras, the term has occasionally a Messianic meaning. The Rabbinical literature, however, never applies it to the Messiah.

In the third place Dalman shows that the term "bar-ᵉnāshā" is not, as some have supposed, merely a common substitute for the pronoun of the third person. It may be true that Jesus did speak of himself in the third person, and for that purpose styled himself "bar-ᵉnāshā;" but in that case he attached a special meaning to the term.

Dalman then goes on to show that the term is "a self-appellation of Jesus used exclusively by himself." This is true to the extent that (except in John xii. 34, and Acts vii. 59) it only occurs in sayings ascribed to Jesus. But he does not prove nor attempt to prove that when Jesus spoke of "the Son of Man" he always referred to himself. That all-important point is taken for granted. "The expression," says Dalman, "has clearly remained restricted to its use by Jesus himself, and the synoptists are themselves witnesses confirming this usage as a historical fact, as they never by any chance allow the term to glide into their own language."

This would be true if it could be shown that the synoptists never gave to the utterances of Jesus a Messianic colouring from their own belief concerning him. That there is strong ground for supposing that they did so has been pointed out by (amongst others) Martineau and Carpenter, of whose work Dalman was aware. The synoptists regarded the term "Son of Man" as a special title applicable only to Jesus; But Dalman thinks that they did not use it as interchangeable with the title "Messiah."

> "It was not a term denoting the majesty of the Messiah; but [that] it was, what any Hellenist must necessarily have taken it to be, an intentional veiling of the Messianic character under a title which affirms the humanity of him who bore it."

As to the meaning which Jesus himself put upon the title, Dalman admits that "he nowhere gives any explanation. Such information he seems, therefore, to have regarded as uncalled for." Dalman says (p. 257):—

> It can scarcely be doubted that Dan. vii. 13 was the source which from which he took the self-designation. . . . His calling himself "Son of Man" really implied no more than that he was that one in whom this vision of Daniel was to proceed to its realisation.

And again (p. 265):—

> When Jesus attached to the Messianic confession of Peter the first intimation of his violent death, he did so in order to make it clear that the entrance upon his sovereignty was still far distant, and that the Messianic function of Jesus did not include, but distinctly excluded, self-aggrandisement. But the "one like unto a son of man," of Dan. vii. 13, has still to receive the sovereignty. It was possible that he should also be one who had undergone suffering and death. At any rate, in disposition he is no user of force, no conqueror, no demolisher, but only a "son of man" whom God had taken under His protection and ordained to be great. . . . Jesus called himself "bar-ᵉnāshā," not indeed as the "lowly one," but as that member of the human race, in his nature impotent, whom God will make Lord of the world.

This is an ingenious interpretation; and if it could be shown that Jesus himself, as distinguished from the Evangelists, applied the term "Son of Man" to himself, then the meaning proposed by Dalman would be highly probable. But that is not shown, and is far too important a point to be taken for granted. I would remind the reader of the admirable discussion of the question in Carpenter's "The First Three Gospels" (1st Edition, Appendix, and especially p. 387).

The foregoing sketch may serve to show both the strength and the weakness of Dalman's book. As to the value of his interpretations, readers can judge for themselves, without any special knowledge of Aramaic. But all, and especially students of the original languages of the New Testament, will gratefully acknowledge the value of the contribution made by Dalman in this book to the resources available for that study. May he soon publish another volume as good as this one!

* "The Words of Jesus, considered in the light of the post-biblical Jewish writings and the Aramaic language." By Gustaf Dalman. Authorised English version, by D. M. Kay, B.D., B.Sc. I. Introduction and Fundamental Ideas. Edinburgh: T. and T. Clark. 1902. 7s. 6d.

PLYMOUTH, NEW ENGLAND.*

Having read with so much pleasure this well-printed, well-written volume of 125 pages, dealing with a piece of history interesting to American, English and Dutch people, it is a pleasure to make it known to the general reader, from whom it claims attention, and specially to the Sunday-school teacher, who would find in its pages a subject which could not fail to interest deeply the elder scholars. Mr. Cuckson, as minister of the church whose history he narrates, had access to its records, and to that rich collection of historical works about Plymouth and its Pilgrims, housed in the museum of that famous New England city. He has reduced this mass of literature to the order of a unifying idea—namely, to set forth "a bit of history as rich in characters and events, interesting, romantic, and heroic as any in the annals of our race." He has unfolded that idea within small compass, yet the interest of the story never flags, sustained by sober eloquence. The Pilgrim type of mind with its love of freedom, of individuality and independence, is held up for our admiration, and for our rebuke, while its glaring defects are not hidden away. The Puritan is contrasted with the Pilgrim to the disadvantage of the former, while neither is comprehensive enough in intellectual or ecclesiastical sympathy to include Roger Williams or the Quakers. In ten chapters, with preface and introduction in addition, the story is told of heresy and schism; of persecution and suffering in England; the sojourn in Holland; across the Atlantic; "the wild New England shore;" Church and Commonwealth making; Controversy of Creed or no Creed; liberty and progress; the loss of the church by fire; the building of the new one on the old site on Burial-hill, a worthy national memorial of Pilgrim fidelity, opened for worship in 1899. There are interesting biographical accounts of men whose names are familiar in our mouths as household words on both sides of the Atlantic,—such as John Robinson, Governor Bradford, Brewster, Myles Standish, Carver, Alden, Winslow, &c.

Three things may be quoted here with advantage, though two of them are familiar enough, the third an interesting incident:—

I. Governor Bradford, in his famous history of Plymouth colony, sets forth the Pilgrim Covenant of Scrooby, A.D. 1602, as follows: These people, "as ye Lord's free people joined themselves (by a covenant of the Lord), in ye fellowship of ye Gospel, to walke in all his ways, made known, or to be made known unto them, according to their best endeavours, whatsoever it should cost them, the Lord assisting them." And that it cost them something this coming history will declare, adds Bradford.

The day before the Pilgrims sailed in the Speedwell from Holland to England on their way to America John Robinson conducted farewell services and preached a remarkable sermon. The concluding words of the following passage from that sermon are as generally familiar as a scripture text, and the spirit of them is daily spreading in the churches.

II. "We are now ere long to part asunder, and the Lord knoweth whether ever he should live to see our faces again. But whether the Lord had appointed it or not he charged us before God and his blessed angels to follow him no further than he followed Christ; and if God should reveal anything to us by any other instrument of his, to be as ready to receive it as ever we were to receive any truth by his ministry: for he was very confident the Lord had more truth and light yet to break forth out of his Holy Word."

III. Wm. Bradford died 1657. He wrote many pamphlets, but the work by which he will be best remembered is "The MS. History of Plymouth Plantation," which at one time was deposited in the New England Library, but was afterwards lost, and was supposed to have been carried away by someone during the war with England.

It was not until 1855 that certain passages in Wilberforce's "History of the Protestant Episcopal Church in America," printed in 1846, professing to quote from a MS. history of Plymouth in the Fulham Library, revealed the whereabouts of the precious document. The story of the recovery of this MS. history cannot be better told than in the words of the Hon. Geo. F. Hoar, the venerable Senator of Massachusetts, who, during a visit to England, was instrumental in having the book returned. After procuring an introduction to the Lord Bishop of London he was invited to Fulham Palace, which for a thousand years has been an episcopal residence. The Bishop received him with great courtesy, holding in his hand the valuable MS., whereupon the following conversation occurred:—

"My lord, I am going to say something which you may think rather audacious. I think this book ought to go back to Massachusetts. Nobody knows how it got over here. Some people think it was carried off by Governor Hutchinson, the Tory Governor! Other people think it was carried off by British soldiers when Boston was evacuated, but in either case the property would not have changed. Or if you treat it as booty, in which last case, I suppose, by the law of nations, ordinary property does change, no civilised nation in modern times applies that principle to the property of libraries and institutions of learning."

"Well," said the Bishop, "I did not know that you cared anything about it."

"Why," said I, "if there were in existence in England a history of King Alfred's reign for thirty years written by his own hand it would not be more precious in the eyes of Englishman than this MS. is to us."

"Well," said he, "I think myself it ought to go back, and if it had depended on me it would have gone back before this. But the Americans who have been here—many of them have been commercial people—did not seem to care much about it, except as a curiosity. I suppose I ought not to give it up on my own authority. It belongs to me in my official capacity, and not as private or personal property. I think I ought to consult the Archbishop of Canterbury, and, indeed, I think I ought to speak to the Queen about it."

In due form, and through the cordial offices of Ambassador T. F. Bayard, the book was returned to the safe custody of the State of Massachusetts.

For its own sake and that of reader and Sunday-school, it is to be hoped that Mr. Cuckson's little book will be widely read.

THE REVIEWS.

Last month we directed attention to the essay by Emma Marie Caillard, in the Contemporary, on "Immortality." A second instalment appears this month and fully sustains the promise of the first. It would be impossible to condense the author's arguments in a form that should be at once adequate and clear. We can only quote here the conclusion of the present section of her investigation. She says:—

> From the scientific stand point, then, all we can claim (apart from [Psychical Research phenomena] the reality of which is still under test and discussion) is a presumption in favour of the persistence of human individual life after death, a presumption founded on the prominent place of individuality in Nature, and its presence in so high a degree in man that actual conditions are insufficient to give it scope.

The reader of the article will find that this conclusion, modest as it seems, has not been reached without carefully balancing the competing considerations. In another article Mr. Samuel McComb discusses the question, "Do we need Dogma?" In the idea of "Dogma" he finds three elements—namely: (1) Truth to be believed; (2) The reasoned form or articulated expression of the Truth; and (3) The authority which imposes the Dogma. The first element he sees in the case of all thinking men, so that no one can seriously oppose dogmatism in that sense. He supposes, also, that it will be generally admitted that every enunciation of the truth or "dogma" is really inadequate and capable of amendment. The real crux of the dispute is, of course, to be found in (3), and he allows that the appeal to the Church, or to the Bible, as the ultimate authority, is invalid. He finds, however, a "moral authority" in "the Christian consciousness," and the reader may profitably ponder the practical uses he makes of this decision. Mr. A. M. Stevens sets himself the task of disproving an exaggerated statement of claims of the ancient Romans to honour and respect, and he had no serious difficulty, we are sure, in discovering in Latin literature passages to their discredit. But when he has finished we find ourselves inquiring whether any race, our own, for example, is fairly treated when the discreditable facts are brought forward and the others are mostly ignored. An enemy of England might prove us all to be cowards and corrupt by the same process. We turned with interest to Mdlle. Vacaresco's article on "Queen Alexandra"; but the lady's style is the very superlative of (no doubt innocent) adulation, and gives one but little sense of reality. A curious study of "Bird Life," by Mr. T. Digby Pigott, and a timely article by Mr. J. A. Hobson on "The Economic Taproot of Imperialism" are noteworthy articles this month.

There is little to detain us in this month's Nineteenth Century, though there is abundance for the appetite of the "general reader." Mr. Swinburne's verses on the "Centenary of Alexandre Dumas" are very characteristic. Mr. Frederick Greenwood's article on "What have we gained by Education—so far?" is also characteristic. Certainly there is room for improvement in our methods, when the results of a generation of School Board education can be so slightly assessed. Let us hope the nation will see that it gets something better. Meanwhile we should like such critics as Mr. Greenwood to picture for us the English that would have been by now, if we had not made the educational departure of thirty years ago. Politics looms large in this Review this month, and art has a prominent place. But theology is the neglected muse; and her sister ethics gets into an unsavoury neighbourhood in a couple of articles on plays, which need no further mention here.

The Monthly Review gives this month the second of two very interesting illustrated articles on "The Painters of Japan," and Mr. John Ward's description of Khartoum, which is also illustrated, will be found instructive as well as attractive. An article by Mr. George Paston on the eighteenth century "Monthly Review" is full of suggestive reminiscence. We cannot forbear quoting a little, premising that the eighteenth century editor was considered favourable to Nonconformity, and certainly included the learned Dr. Kippis, of Presbyterian fame, amongst his contributors. In a notice of Wesley's Hymn-book the old "Monthly" said:—

> The irreverent treatment which the Bible continually meets with in this Protestant country from the swarm of Hackney commentators, expositors, and enthusiastic hymn-makers, would almost provoke the rational Christian to applaud even the Church of Rome for the care she has taken to preserve it from vulgar profanation.

But the most amusing thing is that, in a reference to Goldsmith, the editor, while denying that the poet ever edited the "Review," admits that for a time "he was a not unuseful assistant."

"Now lettest thou thy servant depart, O Lord, according to thy word, in peace: For mine eyes have seen thy salvation."—Luke ii., 29.

THE "Nunc Dimittis," as this New Testament hymn is called, we are sometimes apt to forget is an old man's hymn. It can scarcely escape our notice how much it is a parable, how much it is a symbol. It is a parable of the spiritual history of Israel; it is a symbol of the spiritual history of the Individual. The word entrusted to Israel, spoken as it were as an indistinct whisper at one end of that history is heard at the other end in the fulness of time as a clear word, full of grace and truth. The second childhood of decrepit Israel is symbolised in the young child lifted in Simeon's arms, whose spiritual manhood will realise the divine sonship of man in relation to the Heavenly Father. The promise of the first childhood is realised in the second, and decrepitude was but the symbol of immortal childhood. For the second childhood all history and all life was preparing—for the Christ in Israel, the Christ in every man. And old age is henceforth regarded from a startlingly new point of view, neither from the Pagan, as an ill that flesh is heir to, nor yet from the Hebraic, as a reward for a righteous life, but from the Christian point of view, as a Portal, a Gateway to New Life.

We read that Sir Isaac Newton, when in his declining years, and with faculties much impaired, was requested to explain some passage in his chief mathematical work. He could only, as it is reported, say that he knew it was true once. A similar circumstance is related of the great Duke of Marlborough, who flourished about the same period as Newton. The history of his own campaigns was read to him, to beguile the tedious hours of the evening of his life, and, we are told, so far were his intellectual faculties impaired, that he was unconscious of what he had done, and asked in admiration, from time to time, "Who commanded?" There is at first sight something touching in these instances, as in all similar instances, of failing faculties in old age, and the return to the simplicity and unself-consciousness of the child, so that it has become proverbial to speak of this last state of our mortality as second childhood. It seems at first sight sad that all the intervening years between the earliest experiences of childhood and the closing years of manhood come to seem almost a blank. The mind in old age, even the mind of Newton, of which Wordsworth speaks as "for ever voyaging through strange seas of thought alone," reverts with greatest ease to its memories of childhood and childhood's friends and surroundings. It takes on the same carelessness (in the sense in which we think of the child's carelessness, i.e., freedom from care), it turns with fresher interest to the thoughts and things of children. It is less and less anxious about the morrow, or the great problems and struggles of the world. Truth? Why, the image of the child picking up shells by the great ocean of truth seems literally true. Where is that pretty shell of yesterday, that great theory of gravitation? He who picked it up has as lightly dropped it. It is somewhere. It was true once. A child could not be more indifferent, what shall we say, more preoccupied, more superior to such trifles. After all is it not more bracing, free, gloriously joyful to run along the level expanse of yellow sand, to hear the mighty waters rolling ever more, to breathe the pure exhilarating air, to run and not grow weary? With all this and all the other nameless subtle influences of the great ocean, what matters a shell or two, a great truth or two, a great theory or two? It was, to be sure, enticing, alluring, gave the eye of the mind one ecstatic moment, but it was only an incident of the full, free, joyous life of sky and sea and yellow sand and breeze. Again, all life's tremendously serious undertakings, its great warfares, its great tragi-comic diplomatic quarrels and alliances and reconciliations, all yield to the superb joy of the young boy who asks with a heart full of loyalty and admiration, thinking of the gay costume, the erect bearing and all the heroic virtues, "Who was the commander?" The boy who has become a man and been the greatest general of his time, and full of all sorts of worries and tossings to and fro, returns to his early heritage of an unself-conscious joy, to life which is life indeed.

Nothing helps us to realise better one aspect of the Infinite and the Eternal than this unanxious, light-hearted, unself-conscious way in which men at last, like children, give up viewing life as a great business or as a tragedy, and recognise a great deal of its seriousness and solemnity as for the most part pomp and vanity, too much the flurried acting of time, too little of the calm reality of eternity. Not from their lips could ever come young Hamlet's speech, "The world is out of joint, O cursed spite that ever I was born to set it right." Truth begins to appear to the aging mind as something too vast, infinite, divine, eternal for man's scope and grasp. Such a question as What is Truth? convicts the questioner of being spiritually asleep, or even yet spiritually unborn. Divine silence was the only answer. The awake, or those born of the spirit, are too overwhelmed by the vision to ask so meaningless a question. Again, with the "Nunc Dimittis," all action begins to appear as the passing, light efforts or troubles of children, which doubtless have their own peculiar worth and interest to the father's eye, and which even seem to break in upon the uniformity and interest and aims, and, it may be, the sublimity of his own life, but which do not wear the same undue seriousness and solemnity, do not possess the same magnitude, nor wear the same gigantic proportions of importance to him as they do to the children themselves. To the aged the great dictum of Spinoza begins to wear the air of a commonplace, the fulfilment of which is theirs without the philosophic striving for it—i.e., they attain to see things, as it were, from the point of view of Eternity. Men's actions, they then perceive, like children's in a family, have of course their importance, but must not be supposed or be believed to have any extraordinary importance, any unproportioned importance.

Sound common sense, noble humour, calm philosophy, child-like trust, and the equanimity and almost unconcern of old age, are all the same mental outlook under differing names. Its peculiarity in the aged is that it appears as the pledge of brighter hidden things, it is the silver lining to the depressingly dark cloud of decrepitude, it is the mind about to drop its muddy vesture of decay, like a playful child dropping a distorted mask and escaping to other scenes unobserved. All the intervening years of mortality seem a blank. I remember once being introduced to an old lady of the age of 112, and but for the evidence of one's eyes, one might easily have believed that one was hearing a child of twelve reciting the long ballads she had learnt in these first years —the intervening 100 years seemed to have vanished like a mere drop in the bucket —and one would hardly have been startled if the wrinkled mask had slipped away and revealed a shy and playful child, a child with a difference, the difference of an added experience, a something of divine which it has caught through its pilgrimage of mortality, that ineffable added something one sees sometimes in the great paintings, in faces of the divine child in the arms of the Madonna, the fulfilled prophecy, as it were, of the second childhood, which our mortality is strangely heir to. It is the whisper at one end of the whispering gallery travelling through the elliptical smooth walls of that curious gallery, heard nowhere but at the end, and there grown firmer, distincter, more full of meaning. All the intervening space, the curve not perfected to a circle, of our life smooths itself out, and seems to have been as a form specially designed for this unique effect, to be heard only at the beginning and the end. The figure which Jean Paul Richter employs so strikingly in a work on education of children seems to me to have its higher application in that spiritual education whose end and aim is a regeneration, a rebirth, the becoming as a little child, a spiritual man indeed, but with eyes of awe and wonder opening wide and round upon a new spiritual world, even as the child's do upon this world. "The words that the father speaks to his children in the privacy of home are not heard by the world, but, as in whispering galleries, they are clearly heard at the end and by posterity." Such a tortuous gallery had the history of Israel proved itself to be, and the divine whisper had at last fashioned itself into a clear word, that, full of grace and truth, became flesh and dwelt among us. The indistinct message delivered to Israel of the Heavenly Fatherhood and the divine Sonship of Man at last found a clear interpretation. The aged Simeon and the child Jesus symbolised for men who had learnt the spiritual import of the life of Jesus, the total revelation of the People Israel to their brother men, their final contribution to Religion. And decrepit Judaism in the person of Simeon could utter its sweet hymn, "Now lettest thou thy servant depart, according to thy word, O Lord, in peace: For mine eyes have seen thy salvation." And that which was fulfilled in the race was imaged in the individual; the new life, the spiritual manhood, the divine childhood is each old man's heritage: the old man but stoops, and in his arms he finds his childhood renewed, glorified.

Something of the thought that I have desired to convey has been set forth with a slight mystic touch in a little poem of Uhland's called "Count Eberhard's Hawthorn":

Count Eberhard the Bearded,
From Würtemberg's fair land,
Went on a pious journey
To Palestine's fair strand.

And as the Count was riding
In greenwood on a day,
He cut a branch of blossoms
From off a tree of May.

He placed it in his helmet,
Aloft for all to see,
He bore it in the battle,
He bore it over sea.

And then the branch he planted
Within his native earth,
What time the spring-tide wakens
Each tiny seed to birth.

The Count, so true and faithful,
Came thither every year
To see the growing hawthorn
He held so lief and dear.

The Count grew old and weary,
The branch was grown a tree;
The old man sat beneath it,
And dreamed of lands o'er sea.

The branches' gentle murmur,
The leaves that o'er him spanned,
Whispered of times long bye-past,
And of a foreign land.

He wore the May blossom somewhat ostentatiously, as youth will, as a symbol of all youth's freshness and hope and trust, of devotion to truth and justice, of enthusiasm for high and sacred things and holy achievement, as a symbol indeed of a holy journey to a holy land. Is it not thus we all start out? Then this first flush of a bright dawn passes, it is the divine whisper that has suffused the youth with a momentary eagerness to obey and to achieve, to ripen at once as it were; but life's long garish day comes first, the whisper seems to die away for a long space; something is lost, but more is being gained—silently, arduously, in a light not rosy but more efficacious for growth. The branch of blossoms is being planted in his native earth and takes root and becomes vital, as it never could have been as a mere branch broken off, fair and sweet for a little while, but soon to wither and die. At length the pilgrim grew old and weary, and under the full-grown tree with its May blossom the imperfect things are seen to have rounded to a spiritual perfection, the unripe youth has mellowed into the ripeness of new life, and like that famous hawthorn, the May that blooms in December at Glastonbury, mindful, as the legend has it of the birth of Christ, so the new life of vernal youth, the May of spiritual manhood, the becoming as a little child springs up in the December of old age and in decrepitude, its last drear day. The setting is rich in the simplicity of spiritual benediction, as the rising had been rich in physical and mental exuberance. The same words describe at the rising and the setting such different things, such different outlooks, one from the point of view of time, and the other of eternity. Hope, trust, assurance, joy, the same, yet how strangely different, how much more clearly heard at the end of the divine whispering gallery, than at the beginning. And Simeon, Old Age, sees the word fulfilled, and the divine child, the Christ in every man presented to his gaze, as he waits for death, the early promise fulfilled, his own best life secured, immortal—the Christ in every man arises as a New Light of Life in the gloom and darkness of a waning mortality, and comes as a consolation and a salvation and the pledge of eternal peace. It is the distinctively Christian note, "though our outward man is decaying, yet our inward man is renewed day by day. For the things that are seen are temporal, but the things that are not seen are eternal."

WIND AND SUN ON THE FIELDS OF CORN.

A light wind blew from the gates of the sun,
And waves of shadow went over the wheat.

That the growing corn can be so beautiful is a great joy. There is a peculiar satisfaction of delight in beholding the unity of use and loveliness in any work of nature or of man. And this ripening grain which is to be of such exceeding value to man's physical life has often, under summer skies, a harvest for the eye and heart not less sufficing and nutritious. When the wind passes over a wide luxuriant field of wheat there is a joyous life and movement there which carries its own gladness into the mind, and one may reap great pleasure from the farmer's land before he reaps its plenteousness. The broad acres of yellowing green are swayed and billowed under the strong invisible air; soft waves of light and shadow rise and fall—now in long sweeping curves, and now in short quick ripples, as if at one moment a robe was trailed or flung wide across the field, and then a hand just lightly touched the pliant ears: robe and hand alike belonging to some unseen presence passing swiftly there. One is conscious, too, of a certain blended strength and gentleness in all this movement of constantly changing forms and colours—power controlled by some restraining grace, whose secret nature keeps. Great forces are at work there, in the strongly growing corn and in the silent sunrays and in the speed of the wide impulsive wind. Yet these are gently and graciously disposed; they work half playfully and as if some reserved and friendly purpose were directing them. One feels these, as often by the seashore when the tide is coming in, and all the might of ocean waters is spent along the sands so gently that children may play with it and laugh among its tiny breakers and its harmless foam.

Then, also, there is a sense of liberty commingled with a sure, wise orderliness suggested by the surge and rustle of that waving corn. Everything seems joyously free and yet so faithful and obedient to the secret law of things. The whole field is excited and, as it were, charged with stirring life, yet is its movement calm and untroubled under the burning sunlight and the blowing wind. It is an unwearying pleasure to look out over these waving acres; the eye is rested and rejoiced to behold them. They communicate their own excitement to the soul, a strong exultant gladness is there—a contagious, exhilarating gladness. The wind and the wheat and the sunrays are at play, and all are rejoicing in the game, as if conscious of their strength and of that sweet liberty which goes with perfect obedience to the great laws. O happy, happy children of the earth and sky! O happy, happy eyes that behold you and laugh with your wild joy!

And when, across the intense blue above, cloud-masses pass and fling their shadows on the swaying green, the play becomes more varied and changeful and complex. Light and shade, brilliance and gloom, smile and frown come and go in rapid interchange of moving life. The skies reach down as if to gambol with the pleasant fields; the winds that in the upper reaches of the air "shift the stupendous clouds" seem to wanton with the lower breezes of the land; heaven and earth greet each other from afar, and a great unity of love, like a thought of God, takes possession of the scene.

If you draw closer to the edge of the field, and stand near the tall stems of corn so as to look in among them, a fresh and perhaps more homely, human-like impression may be felt. There are so many of them, and they all live and grow and rejoice in the wind and sun. The great ears, heavy with ripening grain, bend toward and toy with each other—lean and sway and cross one with another. So brotherly and communal they seem, yet withal so independent and free. Each is distinct and self-contained, with its own form and individuality—each holding its own in the kindly earth, drawing thence its life, drinking from below the sweet juices of the ground, breathing from above the sunlight and air; yet all together make one glad and gay society, so neighbourly they are, so equal and friendly, as well as free. And watching, musing there, that wealth of joyous, fellowly life becomes a kind of prophecy or presage of what is to be, perchance, for man, although not yet, for many days. A great prophet once likened the human world to a field of corn, and saw it as a "plenteous harvest," only the "labourers were few." And we, straying past the plenteous fields, in summer-time, may think of far-off days when human beings shall live on the earth thus, untrammelled and self-contained, each rooted strongly in great Nature, breathing free in the air and sunlight of God, yet all fellowly and communal, laborious, playful and glad as brothers and friends. That field of English corn we have been watching, its every stalk and ear so strongly poised, erect and independent, and all the while so neighbourly, social, conjoined, making together one wide unity of beautiful and useful life—be it for us a type of humanity, of the liberated, personal, yet closely related fellowship of men and women, in the days when the whole race shall be free and yet bound in one sacred unity of peace by the laws of the wide, sweet world, and then shall beauty, radiant and wonderful as that of a field of ripening corn when the breeze and the sunlight and the cloud-shadows play over it on summer days, wait hourly on the life and work of the children of men; the loveliness of natural health shall be on every countenance, and "they shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away."

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

*The Prisoner's Friend.

II.

THE Count loved his plant more and more, and his longing for it to have a flower increased daily, and at last one morning he saw at the top of the principal stem a greenish, silky looking excrescence which could be nothing else than a bud. Day by day it grew larger, until one morning his jailer, Ludovic, rushed in, crying, "Picciola is in flower!" It was an hour before the time for his walk, and the Count could hardly wait in patience for it to pass; but at last it was over, and he was out in the courtyard, and there in all its beauty was Picciola displayed, its flowers of white, pink and purple shades melting into one, and sending forth a most delicious perfume. The Count gazed at them in delight, afraid to breathe upon them or touch them for fear of tarnishing their beauty or withering them.

After the flowers came the time for the seeds to form, and the Count watched his plant with greater interest than ever. Then one morning, one fatal morning, at the usual time he went out into the courtyard and, at the first glance, saw his plant drooping and fading; the flowers seemed to have no strength to turn towards the sun, the leaves had lost their glossy green look! "It wants water," said the Count, and he ran to get some from his cell; but no, the water had no effect, the plant did not revive. The Count was as if stunned. Picciola was dying—yes, dying from want of earth, for whilst the leaves and flowers had been growing, the stem, too, had developed until at last it had exhausted the soil. There was only one way of saving it—to remove the paving-stones. The Count rushed to Ludovic, but was met with the answer, "My orders forbid it." No persuasions could move him, but he advised writing to the commandant of the prison, and procured writing materials for the Count. The answer came the next day, short and dry; no change could be made in the walls, moats or fortifications of the prison without an express order from the Governor of Turin, and the paving of a prison yard was the same as a wall.

I have not told you how, through interest shown in his plant, the Count had become friends with his fellow-prisoner in the cell opposite, and how the old man had urged him to get his friends to intercede with the Emperor and to beg for his pardon. The Count had answered that he had no friends, and that nothing would induce him to ask a favour of "General Bonaparte" or to call him Emperor. The old man had gently chided him for his bitterness, and told him that he had more reason to hate Napoleon, for he had been unjustly imprisoned, but he felt sure the Emperor had been deceived, and now his friends were going to intercede, and would do the same for the Count if he gave them authority; but the latter was firm, he would never abase himself before the power he had tried to destroy. Now, seeing him in despair over his dying plant, the old man made another attempt to persuade him to beg for his freedom, telling him that the Emperor and Empress were at Turin, only a day's journey distant from the prison. "At Turin," said the Count, suddenly raising his head. In great excitement he asked if there was anyone who would carry a petition for him if he wrote one. Yes! The old man's daughter would see to that, and his friends would intercede, and perhaps both of them would be pardoned and be able to leave the prison together, free men once more. So the Count wrote his petition.

The girl, fearing Napoleon, determined to try and see the Empress Josephine, but it would take me too long to tell of the difficulties she had to go through before she reached the Empress and handed to her the linen handkerchief on which the Count had written his request. This is what the Empress read, "Sire! two paving-stones less in the courtyard of my prison is the only favour I ask of your Majesty. Not for myself do I appeal to you, but for the one being that has softened my troubles and brought some delight into my life. It is a plant—a flower! Fixed upon it, my eyes have been opened to the truth. I owe to it reason, peace of mind, life itself. I love it, as you love glory. Mercy for my plant!" There were tears in the Empress Josephine's eyes as she read, for she too was a lover of flowers, and many a time had she forgotten her troubles studying them.

Meanwhile, the Count in his prison was counting the hours, the minutes, the seconds. Now the fourth day had come, only one blossom was left, the rest had all faded and died. The Count was gazing anxiously at the plant, having almost given up hope, when the door of his cell opened and a messenger from the Emperor entered, bearing a letter to this effect: "His Majesty the Emperor consents to the Count's request relating to his plant"; and then there was a postscript: "Her Majesty the Empress Josephine, being interested in plants, wishes to know the name of this flower." You can imagine the Count's delight, and how quickly the paving-stones were removed, and the plant began to revive.

Then he got Ludovic the jailer to collect all the books he could, and set to work to find out the name, but in vain, and whilst he was searching and examining the petals, alas! the only blossom fell off and with it all hope of seeds. In consternation the Count exclaimed, "Why did I think of consulting these books? Its name is Picciola, nothing but Picciola, the prisoner's plant, his comforter, his friend!"

One other thing remains to be told. The Empress Josephine, convinced that no one who so loved a little flower could really have malicious thoughts in regard to his fellow-men, persuaded her stern husband Napoleon to release the Count from captivity. And so the Count is restored to freedom and happiness, and takes with him from the prison the Picciola that had been his charge during so many solitary hours.

The story is just an illustration of what has been called "the ministry of flowers," and it is full of lessons for us all. For there may be prisons other than those made of stone walls and barred doors, and there may be prisoners other than those who are confined to dreary cells. We are all prisoners when we are fenced round with bad thoughts and angry feelings, and ugly sights and sounds, because then we are shut out from the enjoyment of what around us is lovely and fair and good. But like the Count we may always make the most dismal place cheerful, if we bring our hearts and minds to love the sweet and precious gifts set before us in the beautiful world of nature, and which even the poorest of us can make our friends.

And so I hope that many of the plants here to-day may be to you Picciolas—little companions, to care for, to tend and to cherish in the homes to which you will take them.

THE KING AND THE PEOPLE.

A NOTE of jubilation is again heard in the land, but not as it was. The public voice is hesitating and restrained. In the public mind there is something unexpressed, hardly expressible. A superficial observer might easily mistake the sober mood of the hour for one half-weary, half-apathetic. Multitudes lately vociferant are silent, and those who do make themselves heard appear to do so without much spontaneity. They have accepted official assurances, they obediently follow official directions. But as something has gone from the glory of summer since that bright last week of June, so a shade has fallen on the minds of men. It is not that they honour the Sovereign less. On the contrary King EDWARD was probably never nearer to the heart of England than now, not even on "that rememberable day" when once before, having—> pluck'd his flickering life again

> From half-down the shadow of the grave,

he passed along those "loud leagues of man and welcome" of which the great Laureate sang. He was then a young Prince with the prime of his years still before him. He has now entered into his seventh decade, having long served as deputy in the high duties pertaining to Royalty. And, at the zenith of his fame, having just reached the full cup of joy—such joy as kings may have—he has seen it withdrawn for a time from his grasp by the peremptory Hand that checks many a cherished purpose of men, high-born or lowly. It was a strange fate, and one to make the most thoughtless think. Whether our poets can do justice to so signal an instance of the tragic element in life remains to be seen. The wiser of them have been silent on this theme as yet. There is still a place for silence in these renewed festivals. No sermon will be preached at the Coronation service we are told. None is needed.

The national thanksgiving at the restoration of the King's health, and the sense of satisfaction that the august ceremonial has been duly performed, though with abbreviated rites, will be sincere. And everyone will trust that out of all this experience of shock and apprehension and slowly-growing confidence something fruitful for good will emerge. The nation that was ready to sing and dance like a child has been made to take thought like a man. The flags, of course, wave again, and the bells ring, and some at least of the postponed festivities are taking place. Even the shortened splendours of the great Day of Crowning will vie with the memories of bygone pageants, and leave a notable, if not an unprecedented, picture to history. The quaint beauty of mediæval trappings, and the touches of colour caught under every sky and brought together to make a visible symbol of Empire, the ranks of strongly-knit Colonists, the sturdy soldiers of equatorial Africa, and those "dusk faces with white silken turbans wreathed" that bring before us the thought of the nations and tribes of India—all this, and much more, make this occasion a most memorable one.

But who does not see through this surface of things a little more seriously than, perhaps, some would have tried to do a month or two ago? Many things, besides the King's illness, have happened to beget sobriety. We were in the first flush of hope over the new-made Peace in South Africa, then; today we know well that though the war is ended the problem remains. We tried to think that Ireland's case need not be too attentively considered. True, Mr. WILLIAM WATSON reminded us that though we had long wedded that western bride we had not yet won her; men heard him, regretted the circumstance, and hoisted the Royal standard as merrily as if the Irish harp of reality were sounding only make-believe sorrows. Since then, to say no more, we have had Mr. WYNDHAM'S confession of the case of Sergeant SHERIDAN and the rottenness in, if not of, the Irish police system. Parliament has been chiefly busy with an Education Bill which promises to result in long-enduring bitterness and widespread strife. Meanwhile the very multitudes that surged through the city at "the Coronation that-was-to-be" have recalled not ones or twos, or men of this party or that, but serious minds everywhere, to the perennial problems of our teeming population. Occasions, bright or dark, come and go like seasons of the year; the poor we have always with us, the hosts of the poor that are there because, somehow, the nation is too productive, too clever, too industrious—such is the economic paradox which has been challenging our wise men for a century past. We have, too, another set of poor, hosts whose outward respectability covers a very ill-provided condition of mind and heart. They illustrate the other, the intellectual paradox, that a people may be too knowing to know anything for certain, and so civilised as to be well content with money if they can by any means get it.

It is a strange nation that King EDWARD is called to rule over; and if, as we may well believe, the sorrow and pain of which he has had his share have not come to him in vain, his heart's desire will be that not only he but all who share with him the actual sovereignty of this realm, its rulers, advisers, guides and teachers, may henceforth serve it in fuller wisdom and purer love. Whatever has given or shall give us pause, may leaders and people never hesitate to believe still in those ancient ideals of law and justice, generous faith in manhood and reverent trust in the Eternal Righteousness which have hitherto shone like stars in England's literature and life. And if we must lament the defection of but too many from these ideals, the more reason that men of faith should be found still faithful. The times have beguiled some through their prosperity; they prefer "bondage with ease to strenuous liberty." But such is not, must not be, the prevailing temper of our race.

THE EDUCATION CRISIS.

SINCE we last wrote the situation in the House of Commons with regard to the Education Bill has undergone no change. Many hours have been devoted to the discussion of the 7th Clause, but it still confronts the House in the form as amended by the Prime Minister, who must have suffered some disappointment if he expected to carry it through last week. It is anticipated that it will be passed in principle this week and that the House will adjourn on Friday, after which for some weeks the controversy will be carried on outside Parliament. The ultimate fate of the Bill is still uncertain; already an enormous amount of time has been spent upon it, and doubts are expressed whether it will be possible to discuss the remaining clauses and carry the Bill through the necessary stages before Christmas. Time is on the side of the Opposition. Evidences are increasing also that there is a very strong feeling of discontent on the Unionist side; some members candidly declaring that the Bill is unjust, while others fear the prolonged and violent controversy will injure the Church.

Since we last wrote various amendments have been proposed and rejected, the aim of all of them being to induce the Government to provide for a larger measure of popular representation in the management of Voluntary schools. We can only summarise the discussion without attempting to follow it in detail or in order. Mr. Dillon moved an amendment to reduce the self-appointed managers to one-third in single school districts. Mr. Balfour logically contended that such an arrangement could not be confined to certain districts, and he could not consent to hand over these schools to a majority of another denomination. He confessed that he thought there would be a change in some

Church and other denominational schools as a consequence of the Act, though he would not go so far as Dr. Macnamara in anticipating their total disappearance. Sir Henry Fowler reminded the House that the question was more than one of Church and Chapel—it was a question of the rights of ratepayers. Mr. Middlemore, speaking on the Unionist side, declared that the Government proposals were a gross outrage and humiliation to those Nonconformists who were compelled to send their children to Church schools. The two-thirds management would bring the public and the Church into antagonism, the denominational system would disappear, and the schools pass under popular control. Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice and Sir Edward Grey appealed to the Prime Minister to postpone the question of managers, and Sir Michael Foster, in the interests of education, again urged him to consider the possibility of compromise. Mr. Balfour replied in a manner which Mr. Bryce characterised not only as sincere, but as solemn, affirming that he had given months of anxious thought to the matter, but he could see no way out. The Voluntary schools must be left in the hands of a majority of denominational managers, and the teachers must be appointed by the denomination to which the schools belong. He reiterated the assertion he has frequently made that the Act will introduce a great improvement upon the present system—the evil of the present system, he said, is its secrecy, but under the Bill everything will be public, in the full light of day and blaze of publicity. We must give Mr. Balfour credit for sincerity and his evident desire to meet objections, but he is tied hand and foot by the demands of his Church supporters; and he seems to think that his assertion that the Bill will diminish the Nonconformist grievances ought to satisfy them—but the Nonconformists will not be satisfied unless the grievances are entirely removed. Why, they ask, should they be required to submit patiently to any grievances? It is a position of humiliation.

Apart from the religious question the Opposition demand a fair amount of public control. Mr. Balfour is determined or compelled to maintain to the full the denominational character of the Church schools. Hence the deadlock. In vain he is assured by men like Sir Henry Fowler that there is no wish to destroy the denominational schools; but Mr. Balfour plainly fears popular control and what it might lead to.

In Mr. Balfour's amended clause it was provided "that all public elementary schools not provided by the local education authority shall in place of the existing managers have a body of managers consisting of a number of trust managers not exceeding four," &c.

Sir John Brunner pointed out that he owned a school, and others owned schools "not provided by the authority" which were not denominational schools, and apparently without trusts. What of them? Upon the suggestion of Sir Charles Dilke Mr. Balfour consented to substitute "foundation" managers for "trust" managers, and subsequently brought in a new consequential clause which is to follow Clause 15. This new clause provides that where the trust appears to the Board of Education inconsistent with the Act, or insufficient or inapplicable, or where there is no trust deed, the Board of Education shall make an order for the purpose of meeting the case. But for the security of school founders it is also provided that in making such an order the Board of Education shall have regard to the principles on which the education given in the school has been conducted in the past. It is also satisfactory to see by another section that the provisions of the Bill so far as regards the appointment of managers will override the restrictions of any denominational trust deed, so that we may infer that the representative managers may belong to any denomination. The clause, on the whole, appears to be a fair attempt to adjust the Bill to existing circumstances, but its details are sure to give rise to considerable discussion when it is reached.

There appears to be no decline in the intensity of the dislike of many of the Nonconformists to the Bill. They are not content with the opportunity for agitation against it which the next few months will afford, but to judge from the tone of articles and letters in some denominational papers they are likely to arrange for an organised campaign of passive resistance if the Bill becomes law. Yet as we understand it the refusal to pay rates is a pretty strong form of active opposition. Dr. Fairbairn, who cannot be regarded as an agitator, expresses himself very strongly in an article in the British Weekly, in which it is at least implied that the refusal to submit is justified by historical precedent, the school rate for denominational schools is compared to the ship money, and the Nonconformists are reminded of the example of their ancestors who refused to comply with the act of uniformity. The parallels may not be exact, but such suggestions coming from such a source are sufficient proof of the seriousness with which the situation is regarded by thoughtful and influential men. An unfortunate suggestion that in single school districts the ministers of other denominations than that to which the school belongs might have the "right of entry" to give religious instruction to the children of parents belonging to their denomination seems likely, if not resisted, to lead to the demand of the clergy in return to have the right to carry Church teaching into the undenominational (Board) schools. An amendment to this effect has already been drafted by Lord Hugh Cecil, and will probably be moved upon some subsequent clause of the Bill. The effect of such a proposal, if carried, would practically be to repeal the Cowper-Temple Clause which is cordially hated by Churchmen. For months past this demand has been made on the platform and in letters to the Guardian, but they have received little attention from the public. The danger is all the greater; and Nonconformists may yet find themselves face to face with a greater evil than any contemplated in the original Bill. Under the specious plea that the children have a right to be taught the religion of their parents in public elementary schools we may have a renewed attack upon religious liberty and an increase of denominationalism in all directions. To this matter we shall have to refer again. W. L.

OBITUARY.

FRANK TAYLOR, J.P., BOLTON.

By the death of Mr. Frank Taylor, J.P., which occurred at Southport on July 30, the Unitarian denomination, the civic life of Bolton and the congregation of Unity Church share with his own family the loss of one whose devout earnestness of life has accomplished untold good in the past and still lives in our hearts as an inspiration for the time to come.

Mr. Taylor's was a religious nature expressing itself most naturally in those many works for the good of his fellowmen which sprang from principle, from the sense of duty and a continual quiet communion with the ever-present, ever-felt Spirit of God as the Guide and Father of the human, no less than the Creator of the natural world. The quiet meditations and prayers of "The Circling Year" and "The Circling Seasons" have revealed to his more intimate friends the religious faith and trust which supported him through life.

It had been his desire in youth to enter the ministry, and some of us will feel that under the sheltering office of a man specially called to speak of the things of God, he might have broken silence and given full and free expression to himself more frequently, and though, perhaps, not more truly or more deeply, yet more widely to the world around him.

Mr. Frank Taylor, who was born at Bolton, Aug. 16, 1843, was the second son of Alderman James Taylor, who came to Bolton from Chowbent, and attended the chapel in Moore-lane during the ministry of Dr. George Harris. On his marriage with Miss Mason, who came of an old Bank-street family, and was at that time teacher of the Bank-street Sewing School, he became a member of Bank-street. In that chapel Mr. Frank Taylor was christened by the Rev. Franklin Baker, and, growing up in close association with its work, became early a teacher in its Sunday-school, both morning and afternoon, and afterwards secretary and superintendent. It is worth recording of his work at this time that he made it his practice to visit each member of the class in his own home once a quarter. Though retiring from the work of the school in 1876, Mr. Taylor remained a regular attendant at the services of Bank-street Chapel, and was called, in Bolton phrase, "a twice-a-day man." A few years ago he transferred his membership to the daughter institution, Unity Church, and, while losing no interest in the mother church, threw his energies into consolidating the younger cause, of which we shall presently speak more fully.

Though thus deeply interested in the religious life of our churches, Mr. Taylor was urged by his father to seek to be a real minister of God in the right and faithful exercise of the responsibilities and opportunities of a layman. He therefore finished his education at Rivington School, where, under the tutelage of the Rev. J. S. Gilbert, Frank Taylor and his brother William, George, William, John, and James Harwood, Fred and Harry Fisher (of Sheffield), Thomas Haselden, and others well known in Unitarian circles were boys at school together.

Mr. Taylor began his business life in his father's foundry (Taylor and Galway, brass founders), and it is characteristic of him that he at once insisted upon going to work at the same early hour as the other workmen. Subsequently he went to assist his brother Charles in the cotton-spinning mill (Charles Taylor and Brother) of which he afterwards became chief manager, from the time of his brother's death to his own retirement from business a few years ago.

Mr. Taylor married in 1869 Miss Sarah Curtis, second daughter of Mr. John Curtis, headmaster of the Lower Mosley-street Schools, Manchester. She died in 1889, leaving no children.

We now turn to the public activities of Mr. Taylor's life. He was not a man who confined his interest to the Sunday-school. He sought to uplift the educational system, at that time a very inadequate one in this country. He was one of the original promoters of the Bolton branch of the National Education League; and afterwards, when the School Board system was established, he became in 1875 a member of the Bolton Board, and for four years represented that progressive educationalism which aims to give to every child in the country an education at once national, unsectarian and free. He also served for eight years as a trustee of the Chadwick Orphanage, and his great interest in education and general culture kept him for over twenty years an active member of the Library Committee appointed by the Corporation. His own cultured life and love of reading led him naturally into this kind of work for the benefit of others, and we may mention in this connection his interest not in theology only, but in science; his Fellowship of the Royal Meteorological Society (to which for twenty years he contributed reports of the daily readings taken by himself in his own garden); his membership of the Microscopical Society, and his especial love of plants and flowers. A visit to his orchid-house was an inspiration to many of us in the love of nature.

In politics Mr. Taylor was an ardent and staunch Liberal, a thoughtful, able, and gifted speaker, and as secretary of the Bolton Liberal Association, and as Liberal candidate for the borough in 1892, he fought courageously and in hard times for the Liberal cause.

In civic as in political life Mr. Taylor earned the high esteem of his fellow-townsmen. For a considerable time he served as Income Tax Commissioner, and in 1885 his name was placed on the Commission of the Peace for the borough, and he was made a County magistrate in 1894. A convinced total abstainer, and well known to be a member of the Bolton Temperance Association, he was yet elected by his colleagues to the Licensing Committee, and none was more ardent than he in endeavouring to secure a full observance and an effective administration of the Licensing Laws. "Whilst on the bench Mr. Taylor did his duty thoroughly, and was a magistrate who tried to deal fairly and honestly by everyone," was a true tribute to his character given in the Borough Court on Thursday week.

In 1895 Mr. Taylor married Miss Mary Heyworth, a niece of Mr. Eli Heyworth, of Blackburn, and she and two children are left to mourn the irreparable loss of husband and father taken from them in the prime of life.

The loss sustained by our denomination, the loss of the man himself and of his living interest in our churches and his especial interest in our ministry cannot be measured by a mere list of the offices which Mr. Taylor held; yet we may briefly indicate in this way the large amount of active work amongst us that he had already crowded into his life.

He was always an earnest Nonconformist, and during the existence of the Bolton Nonconformist Association Mr. Taylor was one of its most cordial and active supporters, and occupied the post of treasurer. For many years he conducted services occasionally, and preached with much acceptance in the Unitarian churches in the Bolton district, and for some time he was a frequent contributor to the Unitarian Press.

Mr. Taylor always took an especially deep interest in the education and welfare of the ministers of our denomination. He knew most of them by name, and to many he was a valued friend.

Both our chief colleges had his continuous and painstaking support. He was a trustee of Manchester College since 1871, and he seldom or never failed to attend at the annual meeting. He was on the Committee of the Unitarian Home Missionary College since 1888, and in the year 1899 he was its president. As chairman for several years up to the time of his death of the Ministers' Stipend Augmentation Fund he never missed a meeting until his last illness, and even then he wrote out full particulars of the business.

He was a vice-president of the Ministers' Benevolent Society, and a generous supporter of the recently formed Ministers' Pension and Insurance Fund.

He was at one time president of the North and East Lancashire Mission, and at another of the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire, and he was upon the Council of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. There were indeed few of our societies in which he had not an honoured place, and for some he did much useful work. Of many of our chapels he was a trustee, and of Unity Church, Bolton, he was so ardent and so generous a supporter, so regular in attendance at its services, and so helpful and inspiring an influence in all its work that his loss comes as a staggering blow to all who have to carry out that work without him.

Unity Church, which is situated in the midst of a densely crowded, working-class population, now gathers within its Sunday-school some three hundred children every week, and it owes much of its prosperity to the friend whom it has just lost. At the dedication of the church and schools, Dec. 16, 1893, Mr. Taylor performed the duty of formally opening the doors in the presence of a large company of members, teachers, scholars and friends who had come in procession from the Commission-street chapel. In the old Commission-street premises Mr. Taylor's generous support assisted this struggling cause, and from the same loving hand came not only a most liberal contribution to the initial cost of building the new church on the Dean-road, but also its pulpit of carved oak, the lectern, organ and stained glass window. The Bibles and hymn-books were his gift, as was also, only some year and a-half ago, the installation of the electric light in the church. It may be added here that two hymns in the supplement used are of his own composition, and one—"Lead, kindly One, lead thou me on" was sung at the funeral service. The Fifth Order of Service is also believed to be largely due to his pen.

Most of all Mr. Taylor helped us by inspiring in ourselves a love of giving heartily and freely to our Church. Mr. Taylor has ever been a conciliator, and in this one institution, leaving committee work and official positions to others, he came forward only to be generous and to give the helpful word of sympathy, encouragement, or reconciliation as it was needed. In that way he held a position among us which, could it be as well fulfilled by official election, would surely rank as a high and responsible office, and most essential to the smooth working of all the rest.

Mr. Taylor was one who welcomed the minister of his church as a personal friend, and cordially extended to him his sympathy in private as in public life. The death of such a man must ever bring with it the sense of personal loss to a large circle of friends whom he ever welcomed with genial hospitality. Not only in his own home and at Unity Church, but to many silent hearts in humble walks of life Mr. Taylor's death has meant the loss of a personal friend. His illness and the cutting short of his life in the full vigour of his plans for fuller and more strenuous labours were borne with perfect patience, and his translation into the fuller life was brightened by the tender affection with which he looked back on the sphere of his labours here.

After cremation and a short service at the Anfield Crematorium on Saturday, Mr. Taylor's remains were interred on Monday last in the Walmsley Chapel burial ground. The funeral service in Unity Church, conducted by the Rev. C. J. Street, M.A., LL.B., and the Rev. Wilfred Harris, M.A., was attended by a congregation strikingly representative of the high esteem in which Mr. Taylor was held by men of all classes and all creeds, and of the influential character of a life which called forth the expression of such widespread sympathy and sorrow.

It is indeed hard for us to part with such men; but we rejoice in the glorious faith so impressively set before us in Mr. Street's address, and feel that a personality so greatly missed upon earth is not lost but called into a higher sphere of service in widening ranges of opportunity which death opens out to us. And so we would think of him,

> One who never turned his back but marched breast forward,
> Never doubted clouds would break,
> Never dreamed, though right were worsted, wrong would triumph.
> Held we fall to rise, are baffled to fight better,
> Sleep to wake.

OPEN-AIR RELIGION

WE have at times a great yearning for the open air. We long to escape from the confining walls and the hurrying crowds, to come close to Nature, and to feel the largeness and freedom of the world. The vagrant spirit of summer steals into our hearts. Summer scents and sounds intoxicate us with a new gladness. We yearn for the mountains and the sea. We want to feel the sting of the wind in our faces, and to be refreshed by the cheerful simplicity of life out of doors. We are only obeying some unreasoning primitive instinct. There is an element of wildness, which at times makes a dash for liberty, in all of us. Perhaps it is the way in which the imperious needs of health assert themselves. But though our love for Nature, this desire to be one with Nature in her glad open-air life, is not linked to any religious occasion, there is something religious in it, both in the feeling it kindles at the moment, and in its lasting effect upon our lives. It helps us to recover from our dependence upon amusements, which are elaborate and highly seasoned, and restores the heart to simple pleasures. It gives a background of distance and mystery to life, and teaches us the use of wonder and imagination, and many another fine emotion of our nature, which the constant trafficking of city life, and, to say the truth, the four walls of many a city church tend to stifle.

Did it ever strike you how much open-air religion there is in the New Testament, and how much of the simple helpfulness and charm of the Gospel story is due to that fact? We have taken Christ and his teaching and shut him up in churches and mission-halls and ordered services. For us he lives and speaks in human interiors. But it was not so at first. He lived and taught to a large extent in the open air. He gathered men together in little groups and spoke to them about God and His love beneath the wide-spreading heavens. He used the familiar scenery of their lives to enforce his deepest religious lessons. His parables and all the passing allusions to the life of nature have still the freshness of a summer morning upon them. He sleeps in an open boat while the storm scuds across the lake. He goes up into a mountain to pray encompassed by the mystery of night and stars.

This characteristic feature of the Gospel narrative is one to which most of us attend too little. It helps to account for the almost startling simplicity of the religious teaching which we find there, and for the absence of all morbid and over-strained feeling. A sentence here and there, torn from its context, has seemed to justify the fevered appeals of the revivalist, and the tense self-consciousness of his converts; but the man who teaches his fellows to link their thought of God with all that is simple and gracious in human life, and lifts them into a fellowship with the heart of nature, has more of the true Gospel spirit.

This craving for the open air is one which is likely to grow. Open-air thoughts and influences are increasingly necessary as cities extend their boundaries, and life becomes in many ways more artificial. It may in time require some re-adjustment of religious thought and habit, in order to provide room for forms of worship and spiritual influence which hitherto the Church has hardly recognised. If, however, what has just been said about Christ and his influence is true, this re-adjustment should present few difficulties. We have only to draw closer to the breadth and simplicity and naturalness of religion in the Gospels to find that Christianity is large enough to include every voice of God, all the influences that soften and sweeten and sanctify the human heart, whatever helps us to live better and fuller lives.

BLACKBOARD ILLUSTRATIONS—HOW TO INTEREST OUR SCHOLARS*

To begin with, I want to explain that the selection of the second title of my lecture is not my own, so that the apparently self-complacent assumption that I know, and you don't know, how to interest scholars must not be attributed to me. Rather do I stand before you as one who knows by practical experience how easy it is to fail to catch and retain the interest of a class of Sunday scholars, and to bear my testimony to the help it has been to me to have at hand a good blackboard and chalks. With these I have succeeded in interesting where otherwise I should have run almost certain risk of failure.

To-day, then, I hold a brief for the use of the blackboard, as well for the separate classes as for the whole school. And in this I am specially glad to be able to add to my own testimony my recollection of the coming of the late Miss M. E. Martineau to take charge of the infant class of about sixty wee folk at Capland-street Mission about ten years ago. The first thing Miss Martineau asked for was a small blackboard, and, by its constant use, she caught and retained, Sunday by Sunday, the delighted interest of her class of infants. Beginning then with the youngest, and continuing through the school to the elder class, the blackboard has been found to be an invaluable help in Sunday-school work.

But as that second title of my address has come to claim first place in my thought of what I want to say to you, my fellow-teachers, I wish now to press upon you, along with the use of the blackboard and chalk, the adoption of object teaching.

A picture or sketch is good, but the thing itself, where possible, is better; and if you have been well advised in the choice of some "Natural" object—a flower, a coral, an insect, leaves, a fossil, or any other of Mother Nature's productions—your own tactful method of evoking the children's interest and surmises as to the meaning and purpose of the object will, believe me, seldom, if ever, fail to gain that interest which is not mere idle curiosity, and which, duly fostered, culminates in Reverence.

So after the Bible lesson has been taught, or the meaning and beauty of a favourite hymn or poem has been dwelt upon, I want to put in a gentle, diffident reminder of the claims of Nature. However glorious our ideals of the life to come may be, it is very certain that, at the best, we all too poorly realise the possible glory of the life that now is, and the world in which we live.

For, indeed, it is a wonderful and a beautiful world in which we have the privilege of living!

Ponder those two words, "wonderful" and "beautiful," until they lose their triteness. We use them all too thoughtlessly. I need almost to warn you that they are not synonymous; that they represent two quite distinct attitudes of mind. When some one of the world's wonders is before me, I may not at first perceive its beauty. It may even seem to lack beauty, but the very wonder of the thing evokes that interest in me which leads me out of trivial thought and makes it forever true that wondering man is "but little lower than the angels"—is, indeed, related, more closely than we often dare recognise and acknowledge, with Divinity. So, again, when I am blessed by the unwonted or the, as yet, neglected appreciation of Natural beauty, it is not so much wonder, seeking the Reason of things, as rapture, which, beyond possible expression in words, carries me out of myself in an ecstasy of felt communion with the one source of all Beauty.

It is the habit of Wonder, and the unperverted, unconventionalised joy in Beauty which we need to evoke and foster in the hearts and minds of our scholars.

Nor need we seek far for objects. When I say that we live in a wonderful and a beautiful world, I have not in mind the far-off glories of Alpine scenery, nor "cliffs where tumbling seas have roared." A multitude of things most wonderful and beautiful lies close at hand, unobserved, neglected, unsuspected, yet teeming with interest!

Dust, to the housewife, is obnoxious. To the microscopist, also, it is even more obnoxious. A friend of mine at Dover, who mounted things for the microscope "to perfection," was himself in despair because of the "inevitable dust." At last the idea came to him to prepare a lecture on dust. His interest was aroused; from one lecture his work grew to a series of lectures; the subject seemed inexhaustible! By it he was linked in intelligent interest with, literally, the whole universe. Pollen of grass, spore of fern, and moss, and fungus, dust of volcano ash, dust of primæval rock; nay, even dust of stars and comets.

My friend's eye had seen the dust before—but now it was his mind that saw it, and found it replete with wonder and even with beauty.

How true is the saying, "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard"; and again, "Seeing, we see not, and hearing, we hear not." Why? Simply because no eye ever does see—never did; no ear ever heard—never will. Behind eye and ear is the perceiving mind. Awaken that, and you have sight and hearing.

One mind, using its eyes, sees so little, another mind, using its eyes, sees so much; while yet another mind, using its eyes and reflecting upon what it has seen, learns, as did Kepler, rapturously to "think God's thoughts after him," sees "the beauty of the Lord," is never far away from the Holy of Holies.

The perception, as also the limit, of beauty and wonder lies in the soul. A world of potential beauty and wonder then is my first affirmation to you, my fellow-teachers and fellow-learners, seeking objects of interest for your scholars.

And next I want to point out as a practical suggestion that among things wonderful and beautiful to children are young life forms.

A nest of eggs or of young birds (seen in situ), kittens, puppies, lambkins, a brood of chickens or ducklings, these and other such will be found fascinatingly interesting, because of their prophetic purposefulness—because of their manifest intention to develop into ideal adolescence.

"The child is father of the man," so also the pup is father to the dog, and that fact forever makes children love young animal life. They are all learning to live

* Reproduced from notes used in lecturing at the Summer Session of Sunday-school Teachers at Manchester College, Oxford, July 8, 1902.

"Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business?"

And to us, as teachers, most engaging and interesting of all young things are surely the children themselves—worthy all our study and unlimited help.

Our problem, then, is:—

Given a world of wonders and beauties, and a class of wonderful and beautiful growing minds and souls, endowed with eyes, and ears, and hands, how best to bring the latter to perceive, to appreciate, to revel in the former?

A personal introduction of these to each other is what is needed, and yours is the privilege, as a mutual friend, to introduce them. Little more will be required; natural affinity will do the rest.

The concrete form of that personal introduction will often take the shape of an object-lesson. You come to your class provided with a few leaves, a flower, some mosses, or some form of insect life, and, more by tactful questions than by your own assertions, you elicit the guesses of the children as to the structure and life story of flower or insect, leading up to the necessary relation of each to the other, showing that neither can do without the other. It will not be long before the more thoughtful children will conceive the idea of oneness, of unity of conception—that flower and bee are linked together and formed just as they are by one mind, and that mind limitless in its knowledge, and power, and love. You have not told the children what to think, but how to do their own thinking. I plead, then, that when adequate attention to instruction in specifically "religious" subjects, and the Bible, has been given, you shall turn to some page or picture in the book which he "who runs may read": that, walking in the Eden of childhood, the little Adams and Eves may revert to the old-time habit of talking with the Lord God in the garden; and also may be encouraged, freely and fearlessly, to taste of the fruit of the tree of knowledge, plucked freshly therefrom by themselves.

Briefly and practically stated, then, my plan for interesting our scholars is to capture and retain their attention by object-lessons selected with a view to demonstrating the presence of God in Nature, as distinguished from mere verbal instruction in technically "religious subjects." Are not the children themselves part of that Nature which everywhere bears testimony to the Divine Presence? Is it not the divine in them that is awakened into wonder and delight as flower and insect are made to reveal, not only their intrinsic beauty, but their rational connection and mutual dependence also?

Let us then go straight to Nature, along with Mother Nature's own nurselings—the children. Let our desire and object be to lead the children to the love of Nature for no other reason than that Nature is lovable at first hand.

"At first hand." Knowledge acquired by actual observation is first-hand knowledge. What I tell you that I have observed is secondhand. What I retail to you that I have read is not even second-hand! I do not say that it is worthless—it may often be of great value. But greatest in value, and sweetest and dearest is first-hand knowledge—that which we have been permitted to find out for ourselves.

You may read and then tell me of God as he seemed to the holy men of old. You may tell me your own divinest experiences (or may try to do so). But dearest and most mine are my own searchings after God, if haply I also may find Him. So in dealing with the children I pray you not to be too eager to tell all you know about God in nature. Give the little ones a chance of finding out. Things so found out belong to the finder; they are never forgotten, they constitute the foundations of faith, of convictions that remain when the opinions of the day are vanishing like morning mists.

Are you beginning to wonder where the teacher comes in? If so much is to be left to the scholar, why not leave all? Have no misgivings, your occupation is not gone. Rather does this need for reticence emphasise the worth of what you can do. Be very sure that you are needed by the children, everywhere, all along the the line.

A dear friend of teacher and of scholar, whom we miss to-day, has written wise and cheering counsel for "the average teacher." Shall I say that the best Nature teacher of children is the one slightly below the average, who knows it, and is glad to be himself or herself always a learner. The best Nature teacher is always a pupil teacher. When the young folk see such a teacher focussing his attention and trying to puzzle out things for himself the very humility of earnest interest, if I may so express it, is a bond of fellowship and sympathy, an encouragement and inspiration to the scholar. Such a limpidly transparent and sincere fellowship in the study of God's works is of priceless worth!

And now I must conclude. I have wandered far from the first part of my subject, How by the use of the blackboard to interest our scholars.

Practically it is impossible to fail, though many are deterred because they think they cannot draw. That is no valid objection! The late Rev. J. G. Wood, who was a master at blackboard lecturing, was in your case when he started. He adopted the wise plan of beginning with what he could do, and went on and did better every time! Try the plan. The important thing is simplicity, do as little as possible, and do it as clearly as you can. If it be only the bare outline of a simple leaf it will serve to catch and hold the attention of the children, and if they also can have slates and crayons a double advantage will be gained.

I would recommend in cases where you are diffident in the matter of sketching before the scholars, the previous preparation of the drawings; but you see to do this would be to nullify the prime advantage of blackboard work, which lies in the gradual growth of the sketch along with the growth of the idea in the mind of the scholar. It is exhilarating often to catch the whispered or murmured expressions of awakened interest in an audience, when sketch and mental concept proceed pari passu. Finished drawing is not wanted—is, indeed, a hindrance. Take heart and try, and you shall find what a help the blackboard is in interesting and educating both young and old.

Note.—At the conclusion of the lecture blackboard demonstrations were given in exemplification of methods recommended.

BY HOWARD YOUNG, LL.B.

II.

The encouragement of teachers is also one of the superintendent's duties, particularly of those who have newly taken up the work. It is not amiss to warn them that a time will probably come early in their teaching when they will feel discouraged with the work, feeling that they are not fitted for it, or are not equal to it, and that they must give it up. It is something of the same sort of feeling that Gilbert, the playwright speaks of, when, after having written one of his humorous librettos and put in every single fresh idea he was possessed of, he felt the blankness and the utter inability of ever again writing another play. He said that that bogey had recurred to him several times, until at last he knew by experience that it was not to be dreaded. Out of his larger experience a superintendent can often find words of encouragement. One of our best teachers told me after a few months' trial that she must resign because of her inability to control her class. She however persevered with it, and there are many girls who have good reason to be grateful to her for her influence on their lives.

Another thing I would like to suggest especially to a young teacher of an infant class is the advantage to be obtained by a little thought about dress. I had this impressed upon me recently by an infant, attending the school for the first time, coming home with bright accounts of the beautiful lady she had had as a teacher. I believe that that infant's impression was only due to a bright smile and a bright (not an expensive) blouse, but the result has been that that infant has been prepossessed in that teacher's favour.

Don't fancy that small things are not noticed. I had an experience of this, when after looking at a watch that I was in the course of buying, I noticed some of the youngsters in the Sunday-school looked queerly at me. I heard afterwards they suspected from seeing the jeweller's little price tag, that I had been visiting the place the French call "A mount of piety" and which we refer to colloquially as "Uncle's."

Perfect Reports.

A superintendent, it seems to me, should also do his best to keep his eyes open for possible improvements. Just to illustrate, it is the custom of many schools to send out quarter after quarter reports upon the attendance and conduct of the scholars. This keeps the parents, at all events, once a quarter in touch with the school and often, too, gives an opportunity for a teacher to have a chat with the parents. It will perhaps stimulate scholars to have a list put up each quarter giving the names of those who have earned the full marks during the preceding quarter, and to have that list read out by the superintendent. We have tried it at our own school and in a quiet way it has had good effect. Of course there is always the danger of teachers being lenient in order to make the report of the whole class look better, but that must be guarded against.

* Part of a Lecture given at the Summer Session for Sunday-school Teachers at Manchester College, Oxford, July 7th.

Learn from other Schools.

By the superintendent or a leading teacher visiting other schools, as is done by the committee of the L.S.S. and other societies, they can gather fresh ideas and also see what should be avoided, and possibly the reasons for methods already practised in their own school. I found for instance that in one school that I visited, the classes were graded according to Board School standards. The following that practice, not too rigidly, has, I think, been of advantage in our own school. There were some unexpected promotions when it was first introduced, but the children who were passed over realised the reason of the change. One must be careful of course always that the object of a system is considered and not the system itself.

An ideal superintendent in an ideal school with ideal teachers, should regularly in his opening address deal with the subject that has been chosen for all the teachers to take in their different classes. I know the weakness in schools in the non-preparation of lessons, but I need not dwell upon that, having regard to the stirring address Miss Pritchard gave at Leeds last year on "The Teacher's Aim." To those who have not read it, I would say read it, and to those who have read it I would say read it again. But if a superintendent cannot arrange for concerted lessons he should be able to direct teachers to useful sources for the preparation of their lessons and can often, too, in his opening address suggest thoughts which the teachers can amplify.

Teachers help the Superintendent.

As to the assistance the teachers can render the superintendent. The question of order, for instance, particularly when the school meets as a whole, is in fact left largely in the superintendent's hands. This is not the best course. Let the superintendent try to divide up the responsibility for order amongst the different teachers. Each teacher should be responsible for his own individual item in the same way as the officers in a regiment.

In the school, too, and in the presence of the scholars it is of importance that the superintendent should be treated with the utmost respect by other teachers. This helps everyone. The superintendent is able to help the teacher with awkward children and speaks with all the greater authority if the children realise the respect the teachers pay to him. It is remarkable how children do appreciate the distinction which a title gives to one of the teachers. Also how, where there are two superintendents present, but one of them not in charge, the children seem to ignore the latter's existence and to feel that they are only bound to regard the one on duty, and to resent interference. It is the difference between a policeman with his armlet on and with it off.

Reference to the Superintendent.

The reference of matters to the superintendent for decision is also an aid. In nothing more than the way in which my predecessor, now the president of the school, has taught the children to look up to the acting superintendent by referring matters to him, has he shown his knowledge of the advantage it is to magnify the importance in the eyes of the children of the superintendent's office. We are accustomed in our Courts of Justice to see counsel address the judge with abounding deference, though one knows that outside the Court the judge and counsel are probably personal friends.

In the Teachers' Meeting.

Lord Esher, the former Master of the Rolls, used to insist that though he was a judge he was still a barrister. In the same way, though one is a superintendent one is still a teacher. A superintendent is simply first among equals. It is when the scholars are not present and particularly in the teachers' meeting that the teachers, including the superintendent, meet on an equality. And, by the way, let the superintendent as the organiser of teachers' meetings do his best to make the meetings bright and attractive. The feeling of strength and co-operation to be gained by a good bright meeting of teachers is very great. Let the superintendent bear specially in mind at this time that he is only one of the teachers, and if, for instance, his propositions are outvoted, he has no right to feel troubled. He is not likely to be overruled on any question of principle.

Miscellaneous Notes.

There are a number of other points I should like to touch on. One is a word of warning to superintendents not to fancy that when the school feels out of hand it is entirely due to the scholars. It may be due to your own being a little out of sorts, and the children in general assembly realise instinctively when you are feeble. Again, if you feel on one particular afternoon you have failed, be sure of taking the school on the following Sunday.

Never, too, get yourself into an impasse —a tight corner—by threatening when you may not have the means to carry out. For instance, in my earlier years of superintendence I once threatened to keep my seat till the school was perfectly quiet; on that occasion, besides nearly raising a rebellion amongst the teachers, I had to accept a poor apology for the quiet I wanted. At the time I was not strong enough to enforce my threat.

As a beginner at the work I occasionally, too, secured quiet by calling out silence "colla voce" as the musicians say. There was a certain amount of pleasure in the momentary quiet I obtained, but I have learnt that it is much better to get quiet in gentler ways.

A suggestion by an experienced superintendent is also worth noting—keep your eyes open, but sometimes keep one shut.

Look after the music, too, to the best of your power. Personally I should prefer children singing badly and heartily, not noisily, to singing sweetly and listlessly. Let the superintendent sing if he can.

Recollect that if you only get the children once to the school on the Sunday you have not half the chance of influencing them than if you get them twice, but avoid, if possible, teachers coming twice.

Let your sense of humour have play at times. Ian Maclaren, I think it is, says that no one should be allowed to preach until he has passed an examination in humour. To my mind too, a sense of humour is invaluable to the superintendent. He can often win the children by his appreciation of fun. They are happy to see his happiness.

Finally, let him have regard to the fact that a time must come, and may come at short notice, when he must give up the work. Let him not therefore jealously stick to his office, but seize opportunities for others to execute it, so that a successor may be available if he should be wanted.

The Superintendent's Lot.

I have perhaps given the impression that a superintendent's lot is not a happy one. There may be plenty of work, and often the more work he puts into it the better, and there may be plenty of worry, especially for want of teachers, but I don't think there is any teacher who gets more personal gratification out of the school than he. The individual teacher takes pride in his class, but the superintendent has the school for his class, and when he has a body of teachers strenuously collaborating, he is to be envied. To have too, as one occasionally has, a number of youngsters suddenly brighten up at seeing the superintendent accidentally on a week day, is to have the joys of life added to. The youngsters little know that in that gleam of happy recognition they are giving the superintendent his reward.

The Sunday-school spirit grows on one slowly. Not many of us have taken it up purely out of love for the work, but it is a matter for rejoicing that many stay at it out of love for it.

May I close with the words in which President Roosevelt finishes his book on "The Strenuous Life"—

The true Christian is the true citizen, lofty of purpose, resolute in endeavour, ready for a hero's deeds, but never breaking down in his task because it is cast in the day of small things; scornful of baseness, awake to his own duties as well as to his rights, following the higher law with reverence and in this world doing all that in him lies, so that when death comes he may feel that mankind is in some degree better because he has lived.

IS WESLEYAN METHODISM INTELLECTUALLY HONEST?

SIR,—As a Methodist minister's son and a Methodist minister's grandson on both sides of the house, it seems to me that the judgment of the Conference on Dr. Beet is the saddest compromise that Methodism has ever made. "The Immortality of the Soul: A Protest," does not strike us as a very powerful book; one can't help feeling while reading it that its author could give us a far abler book on the subject if he did not belong to a creed-bound Church. The Committee report that Dr. Beet rejects as without adequate foundation the doctrines of "annihilation" and "conditional immortality," and that he holds that utter, hopeless and final punishment will overtake the impenitent. Dr. Beet holds, nevertheless, that "conscious" suffering need not last for ever. What is the difference between unconscious suffering and annihilation? or why object to conditional immortality if conscious suffering ceases for the wicked? Again, we are told that Dr. Beet had no intention of placing the moral sense above the Scriptures, as he sees no real conflict between them; but we find a great conflict between our moral sense and both Dr. Beet's and the Wesleyan doctrine on eternal punishment. Dr. Beet's moral sense interprets Scripture differently from Wesley; our moral sense interprets it differently from either. But it is because our moral sense differs from Wesley's in some of its interpretations of Scripture, and for this reason alone that we resign our place in the Methodist ministry.

The Methodist Church has now entered into a compromise with its own "standards" and admits the necessity of allowing some freedom of opinion contrary to the standards to the theological tutor himself, but accepts a promise from him not to teach Scripture as interpreted by his moral sense, but by Wesley's, both in the pulpit and in the college. The Conference has given Dr. Beet "freedom" to think contrary to their standards, but he must teach contrary to what he thinks. His future teaching in the College and his published books will not be in harmony, and he must either teach what he does not believe, or say to his students in answer to that most pressing question of to-day: "I am bound by Conference not to give you my own opinion." The easiest way out of the dilemma would have been Dr. Beet's withdrawal, which, we believe, ought to have taken place when he found himself out of harmony with the Wesleyan standards. The Christian World last week seemed to desire a compromise, and in one of its sentences reveals, in our opinion, the reason for the present compromise—"Had the case been that of a neophyte, Methodism, which is not without experience in such matters, would have had its own short and easy way with him." But would not the loss of even half the members of the Methodist Church be insignificant compared to the loss of intellectual sincerity which, in our opinion, marks the final decision of Conference? They still adhere to Wesley's standards, and yet appoint Dr. Beet, who admits that in some "small" details his teaching contravenes those standards, to teach the rising generation of ministers still to confess: "I believe and teach those very details which my theological tutor denies." It is a solemn question to ask what will be the moral effect on those young men who are taught by one who they know is bound to teach them what he himself does not believe. The ethics of the twentieth century Wesleyanism is already apparent in the words of a local preacher during the controversy: "I teach our doctrine, but I could not say I believe it." Was it Dr. Beet's thinking or the publishing of those thoughts that was such a serious error of judgment? Would it not be wise to hand every Methodist minister at his ordination a copy of John Morley's "Compromise" along with the Bible and the "Manual of Laws," for, as Whately says, "It makes all the difference in the world whether we put Truth in the first place or the second place."

MISS COBBE ON CONSTRUCTIVE THEISM.

Sir,—I feel very strongly that the valuable contribution of Baboo P. C. Mozoomdar to this discussion should not pass without acknowledgment, and he so ably expresses the thoughts that have passed through me during the discussion that, as one of your readers, I should like to thank him, and recommend a careful perusal of his letter to others.

We send our missionaries to India, but she has spiritual treasures of her own to give us in return. I have always felt a personal debt of gratitude to Miss Cobbe for her part in introducing the works of Theodore Parker to this country, the study of which thirty-five years ago enabled me to break the bonds of orthodoxy. But the experiences of life and the trend of thought help to modify one's views. A mere subjective faith will not solve the soul's problems nor satisfy the soul's life, and it is too individualistic to be beautiful. It must be associated with the principle of "Dying to Live," now justified by the ablest philosophy of the time, and which finds its practical exposition in Christianity. How can we separate the History of Religion from Religion?

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Bath.—The chapel is closed during the present month for repairs to the organ. Services will be resumed on the 31st, and special services connected with the re-opening of the organ will take place Sept. 7.

Belfast: Mountpottinger.—The teachers and scholars of our church have just held their annual outing. They went in waggonettes to Mountstewart, the residence of the Postmaster-General. Unfortunately the heavy downpour of rain marred somewhat the day's enjoyment. At the conclusion of the evening service at Mountpottinger, Mrs. Davies presented twenty-five medals to those who had made perfect attendances at the meetings of the Band of Mercy. The Rev. W. J. Davies, Mrs. Davies, and Mr. Forrest delivered appropriate speeches on the occasion, and congratulated the Band on the success of its first session.

Bolton.—The "Calendar" for August contains the following paragraph:—The evening congregation had the pleasure of hearing the Rev. Robert McGee, of Lower Darwen, preach on the 20th ult. Mr. McGee has resigned his ministry in the Congregational Church for conscience sake, and means to enter the Unitarian ministry. He comes to us with the approval of the Ministerial Fellowship and the Advisory Committee of the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire, and may count upon a cordial welcome. He has been asked to preach again at Bank-street on the 31st inst., and it is to be hoped he will be able to accept.

Crewkerne.—Our Sunday-school treat took place on Thursday, July 31, and was a great success. A procession was formed at the school, and, headed by the Town Band, the teachers and scholars, numbering about 170, marched through the principal streets to a field near the town, kindly lent by a member of the congregation, where sports were at once heartily entered into by all. There was a large attendance of visitors to tea, and this number was considerably increased afterwards.

Exeter.—The Rev. J. M. Connell, at the conclusion of his sermon last Sunday morning, referred to the loss the congregation had sustained through the death of Lady Bowring, and said that the simple essential things of religion, of which he had been speaking, had been beautifully illustrated in her life and character. "We who knew her," he said, "remember her faith in God, a faith that seemed as natural to her as the air she breathed, and we rejoice that we were privileged for a while to have fellowship in religious work and worship with one who lived so near to the Father of spirits. We remember, too, her devotion to duty and her sympathy with all causes that make for human well-being. No one better understood than she the meaning of noblesse oblige, or sought more earnestly to fulfil the obligations that belong to a position of influence and to the possession of great gifts and opportunities. To this chapel she was deeply attached; and the form of Christianity which is here represented had nowhere throughout the country a more convinced and faithful witness. It is interesting to recall that she was herself the granddaughter of a Devonshire minister, and that by birth and training and marriage, as well as by personal conviction, she belonged to the household of the Liberal Faith. Whilst therefore we think with gratitude of all she has been to us, we rejoice that the Faith we profess, unpopular as it still is, has once more demonstrated its power to nurture a soul of singular strength and elevation and graciousness."

Godalming.—The great good resulting from the unfailing labours of the Rev. Hubert Clarke, the minister at Meadrow, was most pleasantly evident in the large congregations that attended the anniversary services. The special preacher was the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, who delivered eloquent and moving addresses. The musical portions of the service were conducted by that flourishing contingent of the young people connected with the church, the Meadrow String Band. The Rev. H. Webb Ellis and other friends from Guildford attended these inspiring services.

Gloucester.—A portion of the postponed proceedings in connection with the local celebration of the Coronation were observed on Monday last. After a great Civic procession and the planting of a tree in the park, a luncheon was given by the Mayor and Mayoress of Gloucester in the Guildhall to a large company, including the Bishop of Gloucester, the Dean, the city member, the Mayors of Cheltenham and Tewkesbury, &c. Alderman Norman, of Cheltenham, proposed the toast, "The Lord Bishop, the Clergy, and Ministers of all Denominations," coupled with the names of the Bishop and the Rev. Walter Lloyd, both of whom responded.

Guildford.—Our anniversary services were marked this year by a generous gift from Mrs. John Cooke, the oldest of our friends, whose constant kindness is by no means confined, but spreads in ceaseless charity far and wide to the poor of this old town, which has been for so many years her place of residence. The sympathetic present to the church was a set of the new Essex Hall Hymn-books, entirely sufficient for the present needs of the congregation.

Ipswich.—The series of outdoor lectures in the grounds of the old chapel in Friars-street has been a distinct success, although warmer and brighter weather would have made them still more enjoyable. Following upon the lectures on Tennyson and Browning, already reported, the Rev. L. Tavener lectured on the third Thursday in July on Edward Fitzgerald, a subject which proved itself of considerable local interest, in addition to the more general interest in his translation of Omar Khayyam. The two concluding lectures have dealt with the dramas by Stephen Phillips which have achieved so great a success on the stage, "Paola and Francesca" and "Ulysses." In replying to a vote of thanks cordially passed after the concluding lecture, the Rev. L. Tavener expressed his satisfaction with the success of the experiment, and intimated his intention (should circumstances permit) of arranging a similar course next summer, which will be awaited with much interest by those who have attended the present course.

Kirkcaldy.—On Sunday last the Rev. G. A. Ferguson commenced his ministry in this church, which has been without the services of a settled minister for about eighteen months. Mr. Ferguson has just completed his regular course at Manchester College, Oxford. It is not altogether as a stranger that he comes amongst us, as he is not only a Scotchman but is also a son of a native of the Kingdom of Fife, his father being a minister of the Church of Scotland. We now trust that with a settled minister not only will lost ground be recovered, but a fresh impetus be given to our cause in Kirkcaldy.

London: Bermondsey.—The Sunday scholars' excursion took place on Tuesday under the superintendence of Mr. Harold Titford. Court Farm, Warlingham, was the place visited, and a very pleasant day was spent. Mr. A. W. Harris and the Rev. W. G. Tarrant attended and assisted in the games, &c.

London: Highgate.—It is proposed to erect a new hall, with class-room and church parlour, the whole to be known as "The Spears Memorial Hall." This increased accommodation is urgently needed, and the congregation trust to have the help of their friends towards the cost, which is estimated at £1,000.

London: Sunday School Teachers' Excursion.—By the kind invitation of Sir Edwin and Lady Durning-Lawrence, a large party, numbering over two hundred, of teachers in our London Sunday-schools went to King's Ride, Ascot, on Bank Holiday, Aug. 4. In spite of showery weather the day proved very enjoyable, thanks to the unremitting personal attention of the host and hostess and their numerous helpers. Among the guests were some of the London ministers, including the Revs. J. Ellis, Gordon Cooper, Dr. Hicks, A. J. Marchant, W. H. Rose, F. Summers, W. G. Tarrant, J. Toye, and W. Wilson. Mr. Tarrant proposed a hearty vote of thanks to Sir Edwin and Lady Durning-Lawrence. The travelling arrangements were supervised by the Rev. J. Toye, to whom the thanks of the teachers are also due.

Maidstone.—On Sunday, July 27, the Sunday-school anniversary services were conducted by the Rev. S. S. Brettell. The anthems by the choir and scholars respectively were very nicely sung. On Wednesday, July 30, the school treat took place in the grounds adjoining the residence of Mr. Alfred Ruck, Oakfield, Hollingbourne. During the afternoon and evening the party was joined by a considerable number of members of the congregation, whose presence added much to the enjoyment of the scholars. The children had a delightful outing, and they expressed their thanks at the end of the day by giving hearty cheers for Mr. and Mrs. Ruck, for Miss Ellis (superintendent), Mr. Weeks and the teachers, for the minister, and all who had contributed to the success of the treat.

Saffron Walden.—The eighty-third anniversary of the Sunday-school was commemorated here on the 3rd inst., when appropriate sermons were preached by the pastor. Large congregations assembled, and good collections were taken. Scholars from a distance who were present are especially thanked.

South Wales: Induction Services.—On Sunday and Monday, the 3rd and 4th inst., religious services were held at Bwlchyfadfa and Llwynrhydowen, in conjunction with the installation of Mr. E. O. Jenkins, student of H.M.C., previously of Lampeter, as minister of these places of worship, the latter of which is very noted owing to the fact that the Rev. W. Thomas, M.A. (Gwilym Marles), and his faithful congregation were evicted from the old chapel, which is situated about half a mile from the new one. The services were commenced on Sunday morning at Bwlchyfadfa, when the Rev. T. J. Jenkins, Gellionen, officiated. In the afternoon Principal Gordon conducted service, and in the evening at Bwlchyfadfa, Mr. D. Davies, of H.M.C., conducted service, and the Rev. T. A. Thomas, of Llandyssul, and Principal Gordon preached, the former in Welsh and the latter in English. On Monday the first service was held at Bwlchyfadfa. The Rev. L. Williams, Rhydygwin, took the introductory part, and the Revs. R. C. Jones, Lampeter, and W. James, B.A., J.P., delivered the "charges," the former to the minister and the latter to the congregation. The remaining portions of the services were held at Llwynrhydowen, which is about two miles and a half from Bwlchyfadfa, in the heart of Cardiganshire. In the afternoon, under the presidency of the Rev. John Davies, Alltyplaca, a most impressive meeting was held. Captain Davies and Mr. J. R. Thomas welcomed the young minister as their pastor. Principal Gordon next spoke, referring in friendly terms to the activity and faithfulness of Mr. Jenkins during his college career, and expressing his sincerest wishes that both minister and congregations would amicably work together for the good of the cause. The President extended greetings on behalf of himself and his ministerial colleagues. Then the young minister responded in a very concise speech, and thanked the speakers for their kind words, especially Principal Gordon, who had proved himself a true friend to all the students of H.M.C. Mr. Jenkins having also expressed his gratitude to friends who had gathered together from Lampeter and other places, welcomed the members of the "Pink Party" who had travelled that morning from Aberystwyth, and Miss Tagart replied. The Revs. R. C. Jones and W. James also spoke. In the evening the Revs. E. Ceredig Jones, M.A., Bradford, and J. Davies, Alltyplaca, preached, and so terminated one of the most enthusiastic and inspiring meetings ever experienced in the history of Unitarianism in Cardiganshire. The chapels at all the services were over crowded.

Torquay.—The Women's Society is arranging for a sale of work in October to clear off a debt on the church. Gifts from friends, near or far, will be gratefully received.

Windermere.—Arrangements for a series of Sunday services in connection with the Missionary Conference, in the Institute public rooms, have now been completed. The services will begin on Sunday, August 10, and continue into September. The Rev. W. R. Shanks, Strangeways, Manchester, will conduct the first of the series, and he will be glad to hear of volunteers for any of the Sundays, ladies or gentlemen, who may be willing to assist with the music as players or singers.

THE SOUTH SHORE UNITARIAN CHURCH, BLACKPOOL,

has purchased, at a cost of nearly £600, a plot of freehold land, and they now appeal for help to erect a plain, substantial building to serve for all purposes. It is hoped to be able to do this for £1,500, making a total cost of £2,100. The land, thanks to the generosity of Mrs. John Grundy, of Summerseat; Miss S. Scholes Wrigley, of Windermere (on her own and her late mother's behalf), and Mr. R. T. Heape, of Rochdale, is entirely paid for. The Congregation have themselves promised over £300 towards the erection of the building. They carry on the Services and the Sunday School without any grant, and they feel that the remarkable success of their efforts justifies them in asking friends to help them to carry on their work under more favourable circumstances than at present. Their appeal has the full approval of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, the North and East Lancashire Mission, and the North Lancashire and Westmorland Unitarian Association; and the B. and F. U. A. has promised £25 to the Building Fund.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Coronation of the King and Queen, and the associated reviews and other state business, have at last taken place—to the confusion of the superstitious, could superstition ever be confounded. Soberly rejoicing, as much in the restored health of the Sovereign as in anything else, the majority of people were quietly thankful for the general success of the event, and the chief streets of London, though crowded, were not made a scene of rough horse-play as on recent occasions. On another page the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, who, as President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, was the representative Unitarian in the Abbey, tells us, in his own vivid way, what he saw and heard and how it all struck him. And now what can we wish better for King and country than that we should have a good rest from these violent delights?

DEAN BRADLEY, having seen through the Coronation, is resigning his office at Westminster Abbey. It is a unique position, demanding alike by its opportunities and traditions a man of the first order to fill it worthily. That Dr. Bradley was thought fit to succeed Dean Stanley, and that for twenty years he has held his office amid general admiration, is a sufficient tribute to his business capacities, his scholarly breadth of mind and his sincere devotion. In his time the Abbey has been largely renovated; another period like his will probably see much more effected in the restoration of the fabric. What changes will take place in the theological atmosphere in another quarter of a century it would be even more interesting to know. Let us hope that there will always be place at the Abbey for leaders of thought as well as zealous promoters of Christian virtues.

FROM our Amsterdam contemporary Stemmen uit de Vrije Gemeente, of which Mr. P. H. Hugheholtz is editor, we learn that provisional arrangements are already made as to the programme of the International Council of Unitarians and allied thinkers, which, as we have already announced will open in the Dutch capital on Sept. 1 next year. The meetings will extend from the 1st (Tuesday) till the 4th of the month. An executive committee has been appointed, and a large reception committee will be formed for the benefit of the numerous guests who are expected. Some remarks in the same journal respecting THE INQUIRER in particular we highly appreciate.

SUMMER holiday services for Unitarians are organised on a large scale in the United States. Not only are the permanent chapels in seaside resorts specially equipped and ministered for the season, but, to quote the Christian Register, "at other places the hospitality of union churches is availed of, and elsewhere halls, hotel parlours, casinos, and private piazzas are used." The rota of preachers appears to be carefully arranged, and no doubt both those who have fled from the heat of the crowded city, and others who are during the greater part of the year isolated from their brethren, find this a season of religious invigoration. We hear that "in most of the places where services have been held for several seasons, local societies have been organised which often maintain lay services through the winter months." Our readers have noticed, we hope, that similar holiday services have been arranged in a few British holiday resorts; and we have already permanent chapels in a considerable number of seaside towns. Travellers and holiday-makers amongst us, forget not the household of the faith! By partaking in such services we may all get, and give, good.

ONE of the books—of which there are not too many in the world—that make for unity, peace and concord amongst religious people is entitled "A Book of Common Worship," and was published by Messrs. Putnams two years ago. Prepared under the direction of the "New York State Conference of Religion," it is really an indirect fruit of the famous Parliament of Religions held in Chicago in 1893. A "Committee on the Possibilities of Common Worship" was appointed by the Conference, the members being respectively Orthodox Christian, Jewish, and Unitarian; and the work referred to indicates in a very practical way the conclusion of this committee that these "Possibilities" are much greater than, in our segregating habits, we are apt to conceive.

THE plan of the book is as follows:—First come a series of extracts from "Jewish and Christian Scriptures," and a similar series from "Ethnic Scriptures," the latter being respectively Hindu, Persian, Chinese, Egyptian, Buddhist, Grecian, Roman, and Mohammedan. In each series the sections are illustrative of (a) Universality in Religion, (b) Ethical and Spiritual Religion, and (c) Religion in Society and the State. A fourth section of "Responsive Readings" is added to the Biblical quotations. The same general classification is made in respect to the Prayers, which form the second division of the work, and the Hymns which form its conclusion. As to the latter, we must express our satisfaction that so large a proportion already find a place in our hymnals. At the same time a consciousness of defect is at once felt, and is presumably inevitable; and if this is so with us, how much more must it be to those to whom a larger proportion of the hymns selected are unfamiliar, while most of their favourites are conspicuously absent?

BUT it is in the section devoted to "Prayers" that we find the chief interest and profit of the book, and it is here also that most readers, we think, would discover new and unexpected treasures of devotional utterance. The liturgies and breviaries of the ancient and mediæval church have been laid under tribute, and the Jewish liturgy has also yielded a considerable number of prayers. Mingled with these are prayers by individuals, ranging from Gelasius, Augustine, and Simplicius to Anselm, Thomas à Kempis, Erasmus, and Jeremy Taylor; and by moderns including Pusey, Alford, Rowland Williams, William Bright, Christina Rossetti, Theodore Parker, Dawson, Martineau, and Mozoomdar. Of course, the list might have been indefinitely extended; but there is enough here both to stimulate the aspiration of earnest and devout readers and to make manifest the substantial unity of the inner life under all forms of worship and diverse dialects of spiritual expression. We are not concerned now to criticise the volume—there are some slips and reduplications which the editors have no doubt discovered long ago; nor do we do more in this way than suggest that the collection might have been further enriched had the literature of English Nonconformity been more diligently scanned. What we chiefly desire is, after much grateful use of the book for ourselves, to commend it to the notice of some who might otherwise miss it.

A CORRESPONDENT thus describes a unique Coronation Service:—"Brilliant sunshine, a sea neither too rough nor too smooth, and in the harbour four English ships (the principal of which belonged to the renowned President of the South-Eastern Provincial Assembly) gay with bunting from stem to stern, these were the conspicuously festive things to meet the eye of any casual observer at Le Tréport on Coronation Day. Had he strolled through the town he would also have remarked the Union Jack floating from the Vice-Consulate; and from the balcony of a villa on the heights above the harbour he could scarcely have failed to notice the English and French flags waving proudly side by side in the breeze. And at this villa, where certain loyal Unitarian subjects of His Majesty were staying, all was astir at an early hour. At 10 A.M. there was to be a religious service at the Oratoire Protestante, conducted by an English chaplain temporarily in residence at Le Tréport, and, oddly enough, not only were these same staunch Unitarians to form the bulk of the congregation, but, in the absence of other help, one of their number had undertaken to preside at the harmonium, while others had constituted themselves a floral decoration committee. This was a pleasing instance of Dissent coming to the rescue of the Established Church, and the chaplain afterwards genially admitted it had been excellently done! Certainly the small Oratoire looked greatly brightened by the flowers (red, white and blue) that willing hands had gathered and arranged to adorn it for the occasion. And, if in some portions of the service (notably the reciting of the Nicene Creed) the congregational responses sounded a little thin, in every prayer in which Unitarians could conscientiously join, it is needless to say, they did so with heartfelt devotion. The first and last verses of the National Anthem were, at the chaplain's request, sung with due patriotic fervour, and the Proclamation of the King read, and a short address from the pulpit brought to a conclusion a simple, but in many respects a very unique, Coronation service."

THE EDUCATION CRISIS.

With the rising of Parliament the occasion for this present series of articles comes to an end, but when the House of Commons meets again in the autumn we shall no doubt find ample matter to engage the interest of our readers. We have to chronicle, what is already known to the readers of The Inquirer, that on August 8 the famous 7th Clause of the Education Bill was adopted in Committee by 200 votes to 98, giving the Government a majority of 122. More than one-half of the members of the House were absent.

The 7th Clause as passed bears no resemblance to the clause as originally printed in the Bill; and it was only part of the clause as amended by Mr. Balfour, but it was sufficient to answer his purpose in protecting the interests of Church of England schools. In brief, we may say it prescribes the form of management, under the local education authority, for all public elementary schools. In counties a school shall be under a body of managers not exceeding six, four to be appointed by the County Council, and two by the minor local authority.

The Council of a borough or urban district may, if they think fit, appoint for any school such number of managers as they please. These regulations only apply to schools provided by the local education authority. For schools not provided by the local education authority—that is, "Voluntary" schools—there shall be a body of managers not exceeding six, four of whom are to be "foundation" managers and two representing the local authorities.

A section was also added providing for the grouping of schools under one body of managers and for increasing the number of managers at the discretion of the local education authority. The manner of appointing managers and the details are left for future consideration, but will be provided in the Act.

The final debate on the section relating to the management of the denominational schools, though not of a prolonged character, was naturally marked by an intensity and energy exceeding even previous discussions. It is unnecessary to review the amendments proposed by members who knew they were fighting for a forlorn hope. One question alone occupied the minds of all the speakers on the Opposition side, the unanswerable objection to allowing schools entirely carried on by means of public funds being withdrawn from the control of the ratepayers. Sir William Harcourt was especially sarcastic upon Mr. Balfour for his unwillingness to trust the people to manage their own schools. Had the Church no friends that they must always have a statutory four to overpower the popular two who would represent the spirit and sentiment of the nation? Mr. Lambton wanted to know what had become of a large number of Unionist members who had declared themselves in favour of a larger proportion of representative managers. Mr. Lloyd George made the last and the most forcible of the series of admirable speeches he has contributed to the discussion. He declared the Nonconformists wanted no favours, but they wanted to be treated on an equality. There was no real desire, he asserted, for religious instruction. The real desire was for power and patronage. It was impossible to produce any new arguments against the viciousness of the Government proposal, but Mr. Bryce, Mr. Asquith, Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman, and others reiterated those with which we are familiar; they could not be answered, but they were outvoted, and so for the present there is an end of the matter. But only for the present. We venture to think it will prove a barren victory and will lead to difficulties which do not appear to be foreseen. With a few comments we must leave the subject to our readers to think over during the recess.

Mr. Balfour has declared that public control and denominational teaching are incompatible, though some Liberals have offered that if he will give them the control they will agree to the teaching. But, perhaps, Mr. Balfour is right; at any rate he ought to be. Schools maintained at the public expense ought not to be exclusively the happy hunting-grounds of one denomination. The instruction given in them ought to be undenominational, and the teachers ought to be appointed without reference to their religious belief; and to this complexion we must come at last. Mr. Balfour sees that only statutory prohibition can prevent it. That the statute is a violation of principle does not concern him. There was, we also fear, some truth in Mr. Lloyd George's assertion that what is desired by the Church is not so much religious instruction as power and patronage. The retention of the appointment of teachers by the denominational managers ostensibly with the object of safeguarding the religious instruction, by only appointing teachers who are members of the Church of England (we are not concerned with other denominations), is mixed with a lower motive, that of encouraging teachers to join the Church by placing Nonconformists under disabilities. It is a valuable vested interest, as it places the appointment of thousands of public teachers in the hands of the Church.

If the Act comes into operation with the 7th Clause in its present form the managers of Voluntary schools will soon find themselves in difficulties, and we should not be surprised if many of them would prefer to hand their schools over entirely to the local education authority; though the Church may organise some system to prevent this being done.

The clergy will find their power considerably diminished. There can seldom be more than two parsons on the board of managers (the incumbent and his curate), often perhaps only one; the other four or five will be laymen, and there are not very many laymen, even members of the Church, who are ecclesiastically-minded. These laymen will be disposed and able to exercise considerable restraint over the parson. We believe most English people, with the exception of decided Nonconformists, see little to object to in the teaching of the Church of England, but what they do object to most vigorously is clerical control of any kind, and once they are given a share in the management they will make themselves felt.

Then there is the question of the responsibility of managers. Section C, Clause 8, provides that—

> The managers of the school shall, out of funds provided by them, keep the schoolhouse in good repair, and make such alterations and improvements in the buildings as may be reasonably required by the local education authority.

We know managers of Voluntary schools who have already declared they will resign rather than accept this liability. They fear that financial excuses for not making alterations and improvements in their school buildings which have been accepted by inspectors in the past will no longer avail; and subscriptions will be more difficult to obtain than ever when the old subscribers find they have to pay an education rate, which their subscriptions were intended to prevent. And if the representative managers are to share this responsibility no one will be in a hurry to accept the office.

Whether under these circumstances, and others which will arise under the Act, it is worth while for any of our Nonconformist friends to further complicate matters by initiating a war against the education rate we will not decide, though we think it would be better to wait a little and see the result. We are inclined to believe that when the rate comes to be paid there will be a universal demand for a larger share in the control and management of the Voluntary schools, the Nonconformists will find themselves supported by an immense number of unexpected allies, and the Act will have to be amended.

LITERATURE.

TIBERIUS THE TYRANT.*

WE are so accustomed to think of Jesus as the greatest man living in the world in his own day that we overlook the fact that most of his contemporaries were not of our opinion. Surely to them Tiberius, the Emperor of Rome, was the one man on whose character and actions the welfare of the world most depended. Jesus himself, in a startling phrase, distinguishes between the things which should be rendered to God and the things which should be rendered to this man, as though he and the Almighty held the world between them.

Yet the two men were in some points as strangely alike as they were strangely misunderstood. Neither had any great desire to rule over the kingdoms of this world. Yet, perhaps, Tiberius heard of Jesus as attempting to make himself King of the Jews, and was told of the loyalty of the populace of Jerusalem and their cry, "We know no king but Cæsar," which ended Jesus' life. Perhaps Jesus also, by the Sea of Tiberias, thought of the Emperor as vainly delighting in empty compliments to his name and never suspected that few men hated flattery more, or yearned so ardently for a servant's rather than a master's place.

They were alike not only in some points of character, but in some points of aspiration and ideal. They both set the welfare of mankind before the welfare of their own particular nation. They were men at first much loved and afterwards as much hated by their own people and in their own city. They were both accused of horrible crimes. Had we the life of Jesus written by his enemies only, a man as compared with whom Barabbas was a saint, how similar the picture would be to the popular picture of Tiberius! And the outcry in Jerusalem, "Crucify him, crucify him" to the cry in Rome, "Tiberius to the Tiber!"

These considerations should warn us against accepting too readily the story of a man's life and character as recorded by his enemies.

The character of Jesus is redeemed by the friendly and loving history of his life given in the Gospels.

The question remains, can the character of Tiberius be similarly redeemed?

The hatred of him is easily accounted for. Like Jesus, he had endangered in his own city the long-established interests, customs and traditions of its elders. He had, as it were, taken away the kingdom from the old city fathers, and opened it unto all nations, and for this in Rome he was hated.

Unlike Jesus, the records of his life have come down to us chiefly through the memoirs of his enemies and their partisans. Tacitus particularly revels in defaming him, and faced with the facts of a conspicuously upright life, insinuates a life-long dissimulation as the only possible explanation of so very bad a man appearing on all occasions to be so very good. This explanation is surely open to question.

And as we do not reject the Gospel on the evidence of the Scribes and Pharisees; so we must not reject a friendly history of Tiberius on evidence only of the princely families and the populace at Rome. We have ventured on this comparison in order to obtain a serious audience for Mr. Tarver's little gospel "Tiberius the Tyrant." The impression there given of the life and character of Tiberius, if not a very pleasing and winsome picture of a man, is morally completely different to that formed of him in our schooldays.

We will attempt briefly to summarise this new impression. Tiberius, adopted son of the Emperor Octavian, who had married Tiberius' mother, Livia, was educated in the Imperial household. He was trained to regard his high position in life as one of serious duties and great responsibilities; and he appears to have grown up to manhood with a genuine love of virtue and a profound sense of duty.

As a young man he fell in love with and married Vipsania. It was an evil day for him when, under the influence of his mother, he was divorced from the wife he loved and married Julia, the Emperor's only child. Julia was openly and notoriously unfaithful to him: and Tiberius, as an honourable man, was obliged to insist on a separation.

As second man in the Empire it was no easy thing for Tiberius, in private life, to put away the Emperor's daughter, and in public life to remain in the Emperor's service.

Under the strain of this painful domestic relationship Tiberius sought to give up his high office at Rome by retiring into private life. Leaving the seat of Empire he went to live at Rhodes, and devoted himself to the study of astronomy.

Years afterwards he returned to Rome, but still as a private man; giving up his palace in the city and residing in a villa outside the walls. So long as Lucius and Caius Cæsar lived this retirement of Tiberius into private life could be endured. But on their deaths Tiberius was at once looked to as the one man of experience whose duty it was to resume office at the head of affairs, and be ready to take over the succession. The Senate insisted upon it, and Tiberius, still protesting, was compelled to accept his position. Some insight into Tiberius' character and into the honourable opinion held of him by the people of Rome is given us by Paterculus in describing their joy at his return to office. "Then again there shone for parents confidence in the future of their children; husbands could feel secure in their marriages, masters in their property; and all men could look for safety, rest, peace and calm." Tiberius, having sacrificed so much to make clear that as a husband he could withstand an emperor, and that for the sake of being at peace with himself could resign an empire, now worked amicably with Augustus. The two men now understood each other. For ten years they were close friends and trusted fellow-workers. Fragments of Augustus' letters show how great was his love of and esteem for Tiberius; for example, "My dear Tiberius,—All admit that the well-known line: 'One man saved the State for us by his wakefulness," could be applied to you. When I hear that you are getting thin under the continuance of your labours, may I be confounded if my body is not all one shudder, and I implore you to spare yourself, lest if we hear that you are in bad health your mother and I may expire, and the Roman people be in jeopardy of losing its imperial position. It does not matter a bit whether I myself am ill or well, if you are not well. I implore the gods to preserve you to us, and to give you your health now and always, if they do not hate the Roman people." Again in the same letter, "Good-bye most amiable Tiberius—best of generals. Yes, most amiable, and as I hope for happiness, most brave man." Surely this is high testimony to Tiberius' character; the more so when all the bitterness of a woman's hatred stung their mutual home and tried to poison this manly friendship between the father and the son-in-law. The character of Tiberius stood a fiery test, and stood it as few men's characters could.

On the death of Augustus, all accounts of the accession of Tiberius agree in one statement; the evidence is unanimous that he was exceedingly unwilling to occupy the position which Augustus had occupied, and to continue the Empire in the form which it had assumed under his predecessor.

The position he adopted was a reasonable one. Augustus had been an exceptional man, called to exceptional power under exceptional circumstances. The monarchy had done its work, and a restored Senate might now resume the reins of government. When the Senate insisted that Tiberius himself should take the whole burden of government, he accepted the trust on the understanding that he held simply the office of chief executive officer and adviser of the Senate, which was the real fount of authority, and not as its master.

He refused to be called "Augustus" and "Father of his country," and would not allow himself to be worshipped, like his predecessor, as a god. Even his great defamer, Tacitus, is obliged to admit that under the early rule of Tiberius, public business and the most important concerns of private men were dealt with before the Senate, that the chief men were allowed to make speeches, and that he himself checked them when they slipped into flattery. That in conferring office Tiberius took into consideration nobility of descent, brilliance in the field, and distinguished service at home, and so chose the best men. That consuls and prætors enjoyed their proper dignity, and the lesser magistrates the full exercise of their powers, and that the laws, with only one exception, were well administered. That when Tiberius had once found a good man for an office he retained him, and most of his officers grew old in the same departments. That he protected the provinces from fresh burdens of taxation, and made the old burdens to be set free from the avarice and cruelty of officials. That there was no such thing as personal outrages or confiscations of property, and if ever Tiberius himself was at variance with a private person, he resorted to the ordinary processes of law in the ordinary courts.

At last there came to this lover of a private life another domestic grief, the death of his son.

Under this blow Tiberius, in the opinion of Tacitus, threw off the cloak of hypocritical virtue under which till then he had lived, and showed himself the real villain that at heart he had always been. His vicious character, disregard of public honour and contempt of virtue, were they not obvious all along in his refusal, e.g., to be worshipped as a god? Was he not intending to make himself hated when he rejected with scorn the loving title Father of his country? Was he not saving himself up for the better enjoyment of sensual vice in old age, by the rigorous practice of abstinence and virtue in youth? Ah, the dissimulating villain!

Mr. Tarver points out the absurdity of Tacitus' picture of Tiberius, and claims for a good character at seventy years of age sincerity and not hypocrisy as the cause.

Tiberius was staggered by his son's death, yet he did not allow this private sorrow to interfere with the discharge of his public duties.

All unwittingly he gave his son's place to his son's murderer, Sejanus, the traitor, and Tiberius so completely trusted this seeming friend, that leaving the management of the Empire mainly in his hands, he retired himself more and more into a semi-private life, seeking consolation once more in country scenery and in the study of astronomy. He was now an old man, a man of sorrows also, and surely he had earned his rest. The family of his faithless wife gave other reasons why this old villain had gone away, and pictured to his people, who rarely saw him now, the monstrosities of his secret vices, such stories as only those themselves familar with vice could picture and repeat. Thus the whisperers spread in Rome the stories of their Emperor's privacy in Caprea. Thus his son's murderer held in his too confiding master's heart his son's place. Thus, on a sudden, Tiberius awoke and discovered it to be.

Terrible and awful was the scene that followed. We draw a veil. One tragedy, and one only, runs through the life of Tiberius. It is a love tragedy. He loved Vipsania. Vipsania bore him a son. He divorced Vipsania. He never ceased to regret her. Her son was still his, and the Empire would pass to the child of his first and never to be forgotten love. Bereaved at last of even this hope, he fell back into a private life and let his Empire slip into the hands of Sejanus; and when his power was gone from him, behold those hands of power were stained with the blood of his and Vipsania's only son! For one brief moment the old man compressed the one sincere love of his broken life into the grandest display of hypocrisy the world has ever seen, and disarming all suspicion of his intentions in Sejanus' mind, got the whip hand of his Empire in his own hands again; and then with a fearful crash that traitor, long hated by the Senate, and a mighty host of others with him, was brought to the ground. On the pages of history this picture of Tiberius and his dissimulation, taken by lightning flash, as when an angel falls from heaven, will never be erased. Nor will men soon forget the reign of terror that followed, and the hatred with which Tiberius the Tyrant was hated ever after in the city of Rome.

The story of Tiberius, as told by Mr. Tarver, is a profound attempt to reconstruct the personal feelings of a great historical figure. And yet to most readers of THE INQUIRER the interest of this book will perhaps lie still more in the clear portrayal of all the many aspects of life at Rome, as men actually lived it, about the time of Christ. Insight into Roman households, Roman Imperial family histories, Roman policy, Roman life and thought is given us in a series of pictures which make the old world live again before our eyes.

That Mr. Tarver defends Tiberius through thick and thin makes his book none the less instructive; we may not agree with everything he says, but we certainly feel that "Tiberius the Tyrant" appears far otherwise to his friends than he appeared to his enemies. We welcome the story of his life as told by a friend who pleads most earnestly that this great contemporary of Jesus has been condemned by "false witnesses" at his trial hitherto.

WILFRED HARRIS.

So runs the simple inscription on the Abbey tomb of Edward Plantagenet, the Hammer of the Scots. Pactum Serva: The motto fittingly indicates the guiding principle of a life that endeavoured to "keep troth" with the ideals to which it had pledged itself. There were failings here and weaknesses there; Edward of Westminster was not the ideal King, was not even an Earl Simon of Montfort, whose "faith and faithfulness" were justly celebrated in song, but from the time of his escape from Hereford after the battle of Lewes when, at Ludlow, he entered into an alliance with Gloucester and swore that he would cause the "ancient good and approved laws to be obeyed," we have no flagrant breach of the purpose to which he dedicated himself. The legislative activity of the period from 1283 to 1285, although hardly a sufficient basis for the appellation, "The English Justinian," thoroughly justifies Professor Jenks's eulogy of Edward as "one of the greatest and wisest of rulers, who surveyed the body politic in all its members, and laid his healing hand on every sore."

Biography may be of the statuesque or picturesque order. The subject may stand out clear, cold, and unmistakable, with outline gleaming white against a shadowy background of insignificance. There may be due proportion in the life itself, and we may admire the truth embodied in the figure, but there are few pieces of biographical statuary that arouse within us the sense of a warm, passionate life linked indissolubly with struggling, feeling humanity: there is always the craving for right perspective and life relations.

Then there is the picturesque method of treatment, where the attempt is made not simply to present a portrait, but to depict a life with its background of contemporary habits and events, and its foreground of personal influences and main determining factors. The picturesque method allows a justifiable choice of aspects: the true artist seizes on essential features and incorporates them in his representation of the man and his times: by heightening the colours here and deepening them there, he aims at giving the picture which corresponds generally with the main lines of the subject's life and development.

Professor Jenks in his lucidly written book on Edward the First employs the picturesque method. If we have any complaint to make it is that he crowds his canvas rather unduly, and makes his background heavier than his own set purpose warrants. As a lawyer, he is attracted by the intense legal activity of the eighth and ninth decades of the thirteenth century. He feels justified in intruding on a scene so dominated by great historians, and wonders "how anyone but a lawyer can possibly appreciate the true inwardness of Edward's reign." He sets himself the task of telling us the story of the making of the Common Law, and treats us to a rather lengthy introduction on the Middle Ages and the emergence of modern Europe, which, though very ably done, seems hardly warranted by the occasion. The picture of life in thirteenth century England is most vividly wrought; the style and the effect recall the witchery of John Richard Green, at whose word ages long past live before our eyes.

Professor Jenks's profound knowledge of legal history and of old-time customs and usages is presented to us in most attractive guise: law, in his hands, ceases to be cold and forbidding; we see it in all the fascination of growth and movement; the naked details of statutes are clothed upon with intensely human interests. The enthusiasm with which Professor Jenks approaches his work well warrants the assumption of such a task as is indicated in the opening words of the preface: "If ever there was a national hero, it was Edward of England. In his person, his character, his position, and his policy, are summed up the essential elements of that great English nation which came into existence during his lifetime." The claim challenges criticism on the method whereby it is substantiated. Edward, against a contrasting background, made by the vices and follies of his father, Henry III., is made to shine in the light reflected by the patriotism and ability of his uncle, Earl Simon. But we must remember that Henry of Winchester, though unfit to rule a kingdom, was a kind-hearted man, gentle and pious, fond of learning, of art and of poetry, and full of good impulse. His chief fault was that he set no store by his plighted word; but even this failing bore good fruit, in the determination of his son ever to hold and to keep troth.

The real affection which existed between Henry and his son Edward was something more on the latter's part than pity for a weak-minded and worthless father: we cannot but think that in ignoring the better side of Henry's character, Professor Jenks makes it more difficult for us to get a true estimate of the sterner qualities and the more admirable nature of Edward himself. Again, Simon de Montfort, the people's hero, the keen-sighted statesman, and the champion of the oppressed, appeals to us as the really strong man of his day. The "Chronicle of Melrose" and the political songs of the period present us with a man brave and skilful in the field, firm in his friendships, scornful of falsehood, and faithful to his oath. He stood to his cause "like a pillar that cannot be moved, and, like a second Josiah, esteemed righteousness the very healing of his soul." He was in truth

> Simon of the mountain strong,
> Flower of knightly chivalry.

Professor Jenks tells us that "his statesmanship was a failure," and the judgment is confirmed by the events. But in any estimate of the man and his work, we must consider not merely the immediate effect of his attempts to right the people's wrongs, but also the ideal involved in the effort, an ideal justified by its realisation centuries after. The circumstances of his birth and position were out of joint: the petty jealousies of the barons and the uncertain spirit of King Henry rendered his statesmanship a thing of nought, but neither power nor ability was wanting to one of the truest patriots England has ever had. What we know of the character and ability of Edward I. does not lead us to regard him as intrinsically the superior of the great Earl Simon.

Professor Jenks is dealing with a time when a king was expected to govern in power, and rightly enough finds this expectation fulfilled in the rule of Edward Plantagenet; but in his summary of the King and his work, the encomiastic note is somewhat overpowering; we are suspicious of an estimate that makes Edward a "model of all the virtues." We are told he was "brave, affectionate, just, pure, devout, frugal, dignified, faithful, persevering and sympathetic," but it is left to us to gather that he was hasty and violent in temper, quick to take offence and impatient of the cries of his over-taxed people.

As a young man he was wild and somewhat cruel, but his sturdy common sense came to the rescue, and made him what he was, a strong capable King, with a real love for his people and a sincere reverence for righteousness and truth. But he was wilful and fond of power for power's sake, a quality of soul which led to disastrous results in his attempt to "hammer the Scots" into submission to the English Crown. As a law-giver he worked out the principles already enunciated in the wise administration of Henry of Anjou; as Professor Jenks says, "much of Edward's celebrated legislation is concerned with matters of procedure." He formulated the law collected and harmonised by Henry of Bracton.

Perhaps it is as a soldier and a ruler that Edward is undeniably great. After the lesson taught him at Lewes, when passion and personal resentment "turned a defeat into a hopeless surrender," he never knew serious defeat: Lewes "changed him from a reckless youth of promise into a sober, capable man" He had the power of eloquent appeal which went direct to the hearts of his people. Despite the burdens of increased taxation the people of England trusted the word of their soldier king; they had learnt to honour the validity of their hero's motto, "Keep troth." The spirit of the man is characteristically revealed in his dying message to the Prince of Wales, whom he bade send his heart to the Holy Land, not to bury his body until the Scots were utterly subdued, and to carry his bones at the head of the army that so he might lead his people to victory. Pactum serva.

BEASTS OF THE FIELD AND FOWLS OF THE AIR.

We must redeem that word "beast" by discovering how much of noble being there is in common between ourselves and other creatures, and how much more of beauty becomes visible in them as we purify our own lives and affections. Recall how many things we owe to the animals and the birds. They give us a great deal of our food and a great deal of our clothing. They spread their woven fleeces for our carpets, and they wrap us in their warmth at night. Their products enter into our mechanism. They are our docile carriers, our engines of locomotion. They plough our land and sow our corn. They are our playmates and they are our guardians. They are our winged messengers. They are amongst our finest educators, and they chasten our character by the affection they win from us. It cannot be denied that we do not always repay them fairly for the immense services, both moral and physical, which they render us.

The great extension of late years of man's knowledge of the ways of creatures lowlier than himself is of inestimable assistance to us in adjusting our own conduct rightly towards them.

When allusion is made to kindness to animals and to the intelligence of animals one's first thought is usually of the domesticated creatures. These being under our control, and dependent upon us, have the first claim on our care.

There has been and there still is so much callous cruelty to these our loyal servants, who give us not only their skill and strength but their very substance, that there still remains only too great a need for the earnest advocacy of ways of mercy.

We are accustomed to treat best what we admire most, and we rightly admire most that in which we see the clearest and most varied evidences of intelligence. The bright shrewd eye wins our interest in a moment; the cry which declares a feeling like our own; the device which reason alone could have planned; the fidelity which bespeaks a human kind of gratitude. Wherever we trace in other beings features and actions like our own, our attention at least is arrested, and commonly our affection is won. And so we learn to love the creatures we have constantly about us, and which contribute so much to our well-being.

On the whole, however, has not the wild animal — the sheep of the mountains, and the horse of the prairies, for instance—paid a somewhat heavy tax upon its own intelligence for the privilege, if it be such, of entering the service of man? Even the excess of our care for the animals we keep has blunted their own initiative just as it does with our own kind. The more forethought and direction we exercise on their behoof, the less remains for them to exercise their minds upon. What you constantly do for another creature it will gradually lose the power to perform for itself. It may learn to love you—no small gain—but it will leave itself to you, to think and provide for. This is what has in some measure occurred with the inmates of the farmyard. Interesting as they are in their own ways still, and endowed still with deep instincts of affection, if we would know the mind of the animal we must study it far from the sheepfold and the stall. If, therefore, we have imposed upon our humbler kinsfolk a certain loss of precious intelligence, as well as a loss of freedom, there is all the greater obligation upon us to repay them with exquisite care and considerateness. Every one of us is making heavy demands upon them. Upon each and all, therefore, rests the responsibility to make their lot as happy as possible; and thoroughly happy, I believe, it may be made.

But if, for their sakes as well as our own, we would know more of their real life and intelligence, we are confronted with a difficulty. We can all sit at the feet of our dog and he will teach us much. We can all watch the antics, few and simple, of our caged songster; but we cannot so easily join in the frivolities of the magpie in his own Arden, or watch the stag at the love challenge, or the weasel stalking his prey. For this we must needs possess a great fund of time and effort and patience, and a talent for accurate observation—more of these than most of us have or know how to apply. Happily there are men who have made themselves eyes for their fellows, and have told us many and wonderful things of the beasts of the field and the fowls of the air. Into the life of the latter especially we might see a great deal more than we are accustomed to, if we pursued them with glasses instead of with guns. The birds are always with us if we will only be with them upon their own terms.

Now let me point my moral with an illustration or two of the human-like ways of bird and beast, What aspect of their life shall we take? Their craft in securing their food? their skill in building the home? their self-denying affection? their strength and prowess? Suppose we inquire how that burning question the Education Problem presents itself to the mind of bird and beast.

What! Have they schools? Yes, they have schools. And incorporated in their school system they have their education code. In their domain at least education is free, secular, and compulsory. On the other hand, every denomination or species inculcates its own tenets; and yet, while uncoloured by theological dogma, this is far from being an ungodly system of instruction.

One of the prettiest scenes I have ever watched was that of a mother sparrow teaching her offspring to fly over a high close fence in the back street of a Lancashire town. Easier lessons had no doubt been already given and learnt. This was a harder task, and the place had evidently been selected for the purpose. First came the pattern flight of the parent, and the call from above to the young bird to follow, and its fluttering, chirping hesitation. The lead was reiterated, but without avail. Then the mother came down and coaxed her pupil to try his wings; but his flight was not strong enough, and the surface of the fence afforded no foothold. At last, as progress was not sufficiently rapid under moral suasion, a measure of compulsion had to be adopted, and, "cruel only to be kind," buffeting with beak and wing succeeded at last in practically forcing the little creature to surmount the difficulty.

It is false to suppose that wild creatures acquire all their remarkable habits by instinct. This is a lazy and a lame explanation. You might as well talk about your boys acquiring their Latin verbs by instinct. Royal roads to knowledge are no more available to the animals than to us. It is true that a young duck takes straightway to the water—as a babe takes to the breast—but not every water-creature does. The otter, who is practically amphibious, and a perfect swimmer, has to learn the art, and has, indeed, first to acquire the courage to face the water, which, when young, it is said to fear as much as does a kitten. An American naturalist, Mr. Wm. Long, has given us some striking illustrations of educational sagacity in the wilds. The sheldrake he had himself observed teaching her young to dive. The lesson was conducted over the sandy shallows, and the observer noticed that now and again the duckling brought up a small fish. Curiosity getting the better of patience, he presently pushed his canoe out of the reeds, and, putting the brood to flight, examined the teaching place. There on the sandy bottom he found a number of dead trout fry, the air-bladder in each little fish having been punctured by the sheldrake's beak, so that it might sink and form an attractive prize to her pupils.

One more illustration—and this the American reindeer or caribou shall afford us. This is the more interesting, in that we are introduced to a real school—a number of parents uniting for the common instruction of their offspring in a spot specially adapted to the purpose. Except for slight condensation, I give the account in the words of the eye-witness.

There were the caribou, five or six mother animals, and nearly twice as many little ones, well grown, which had evidently just come in from all directions. They were gathered in a natural opening in the forest, fairly clear of bushes, with a fallen tree or two, which served a good purpose later on. The sunlight fell across it in great golden bars, making light and shadow to play in; all around was the great marsh, giving protection from enemies; dense underbush screened them from prying eyes; and this was their schoolroom. What a wisely-chosen site! The little ones were pushed out into the middle away from their mothers, to whom they clung instinctively, and were left to get acquainted with each other; which they did, very shyly at first, like so many strange children. You notice that it is the mothers who are the teachers. And is it not ever the mother's lessons which are the deepest and the most vital?

Now, it is to be noted that the caribou are naturally poor jumpers. On the barren wastes of North America they do not need that accomplishment. But now a branch of the race has moved South into the woods, where great fallen trees lie across the way, and jumping is a necessity.

So, "As I watched them (says Mr. Long) the mothers all came out from the shadows and began trotting round the opening, the little ones keeping close as possible, each one to its mother's side. Then the old ones went faster, the young being left in a long line stringing out behind. Suddenly the leader veered into the edge of the timber and went over a fallen tree with a jump; the rest of the elders followed splendidly, rising on one side, falling gracefully on the other, like grey waves racing past the end of a jetty. But the first little one dropped his head obstinately at the tree and stopped short. So the rest. Then they all scampered round the tree and up to their mothers, who had now turned and stood watching anxiously to see the effect of their lesson. Then it began over again. It was true kindergarten teaching; for, under the guise of a frolic, the young ones were being taught a needful lesson—not only to jump, but, far more important than that, to follow a leader, and to go where he goes, without question or hesitation. For the leaders on the barrens are wise and make no mistakes. Most of the little caribou took to the sport very well, and presently followed the mothers over the low hurdles. But a few were timid; and then came the most intensely interesting bit of the whole strange school, when a little one would be led to a tree and butted from behind till he took the jump."

They were really the very same series of tactics as I had myself watched with the sparrows, only applied with precise organisation to a number of individuals at once.

Such incidents show from a somewhat fresh point of view how closely we and the lowlier inhabitants of the earth are related—how much of our finer capacity is active in them—how "all life is linked and kin." The more closely we look into their ways the more does the distance between us and them vanish, and it would even appear that attainments which we are accustomed to regard with peculiar pride are not without parallels in their lives, and call into play qualities of mind and affection of a very high order. If noblesse oblige defines the duty of the strong and gifted to the feeble and lowly, that duty grows, not lessens, as we find that the feebler races are also nobly endowed.

THE CONFESSION OF THE LIVING GOD.

Among the creeds that are frequently being offered for our acceptance in place of the ancient creeds of Christendom is one which finds its sum in the single article, "I believe in the Living God." It is commonly interpreted as belief that God speaks to men in this present age, that He reveals Himself to every nation at every period, He enters into communion with His people now in many forms and many ways. This interpretation is sometimes accompanied by the claim that it is singular and in a class by itself. It has a character that differentiates it from other creeds. Its confessors recommend this claim by considerations like the following: "We seek no support for our faith," they declare, "except in the facts of the present. The hour that now is contains a sufficient revelation. We do not require any witness of the past, either as the source or the corroboration of what we find in the present. In this we are unlike all whose faith is anchored to certain reputed facts of Christian history. They appeal to what is past, they cannot make confession of the faith that is in them, except in language that carries with it a judgment respecting the worth of historical evidences. Even those who are prepared to surrender portions of the tradition to the assault of criticism base their religious faith on the appearance in the world in a distant century of a supreme personality. It is the story of the past, not the actuality of the present, that brings them to their belief in God. Consequently their faith comes short of a recognition of the living God. They rely not upon what the voice of God utters in these times, but upon what He said to the ages of long ago."

The claim which is here made to a certain singularity of standpoint must be conceded, but the question may well be raised whether its character is correctly described. There are many reasons why it appears doubtful if the dividing line may truly be drawn at that particular point. It appears difficult to admit that the ground of the difference lies in the recognition of the living God. The difference must be sought elsewhere, and it is the purpose of these lines to attempt to indicate where it may be found.

In the first place, it should be remarked that the question with which we are concerned has to do, not so much with the contents of belief as with the grounds of belief. We have not to deal with what faith includes, but on what it is supported. The difference between the two points of view is not that one asserts and the other denies that God lives and speaks in the present; it lies rather in diverse estimates as to what is required to create the faith asserted. Belief in the living God is an article in both creeds, and so far they are at one. They part when the further question is raised, On what does that belief rest? What is the ground and justification for the tremendous assertion that God lives and speaks to His children? When confessors of the one lay the emphasis upon their belief in the living God and confessors of the other lay it upon the facts of Christian history, they are not so far contrasting the elements of their respective creeds. There is no place for contrast, for they are travelling on different planes. The former only are defining the content of their belief; the latter are engaged with the grounds of belief, with the supports on which they erect their confidence in a living God. It would seem, therefore, more correct to describe the point of difference as a variety of emphasis upon the grounds of belief rather than a diversity in the ultimate confessions of faith.

In the next place, we must ask whence arises this differing emphasis. Why in the one case is the assertion that God lives and speaks deemed the important thing, while in the other all the stress is laid on the facts that are held to justify it? The explanation is to be found, we think, in the fact that in the former case there is less appreciation of the difficulties of belief. We constantly hear descriptions of what the belief implies, declarations that God is revealing Himself in manifold ways, that He speaks to us in all the operations of Nature, in scientific discoveries, in man's widening knowledge in general. And all this is set before us in a way which leaves us with the impression that so various and frequent are the channels through which God is speaking to us, that nothing ought to be easier than the conviction that the living God does indeed enter into communion with our souls. This enormous fact is represented as though it stared us in the face, and it were the obvious conclusion of every survey of life and the world. Thus there is little conception of difficulties in the way; there is an absence of the recognition that anything but a plain outlook upon the immediate present is required to create the belief in question.

The other view starts from a very different estimate of the situation. Its emphasis upon facts of Christian history is not due to any lack of conviction in the reality of a living God. On the contrary, it is due to the guarantee which these facts are held to provide for the security of that conviction. Its upholders have a strong sense of difficulties that require to be overcome, of a whole set of facts presented in life that challenge their faith. To them the present scene of things is not filled with phenomena that demonstrate the obviousness of the assertion that God lives and speaks. They are aware of much that threatens to make it a precarious conclusion. They find this not merely from observation of the course of the world, but from the inner experience of the heart. The sense of sin, indeed, furnishes the greatest obstacle of all. The man who is conscious of guilt finds it hard, finds it impossible, to believe that God communes with him. He feels instead that the Divine Face is turned away and the Divine Reality has ceased to be in any relation to him. He loses in that hour the sense of the living God. His necessity now is the recovery of that sense: in the regaining of it he is delivered from his sin. But how shall he recover it? What shall re-create the broken assurance? Assent to a doctrine that God reveals Himself in the present will do nothing for him. It is the capacity to believe what the doctrine affirms that is interrupted and requires to be renewed, and no repetitions of its assertions will accomplish that. These will not emancipate him from his sin. Only when he has been enabled to believe, when he receives again the inner conviction that God lives and communes with him, is his deliverance effected. But what will enable him? That is the supreme question as it presents itself to those who find their answer in the contents of Christian history; and here we have the explanation of their preoccupation with the grounds of belief, and their emphasis upon the facts that provide them.

A confession of faith in the living God is the highest fruit of religious experience; where it is not of this origin it is valueless. But where it comes into being as the product of religious experience it is in the mouth of every man who makes it tantamount to a confession that he is a saved man. He is delivered from the power of sin. It reports the issue of his battle with temptation. It registers the ultimate achievement of personal religion. If this be the case, then it would seem that nothing is less fitted to be selected as the differentia in a comparison of creeds, and that any attempt to appropriate it as a distinctive mark by a section of Christendom must rest upon a misconception of its essential meaning.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

Now that the pomps and festivities of the Coronation are over, what part of it all is most worth remembering?

Perhaps some of you have Coronation medals to treasure up, or Coronation pins or brooches to wear till they are lost or broken.

When you are older it will not, I think, be your own particular way of enjoying the holiday that you will like to dwell on, as you would remember a specially happy or festive birthday. This Coronation concerns each one of us because we are English, and it concerns English people in all parts of the world. Whatever has stirred in you the feeling of patriotism, and has made you feel that you belong to a great people, that is worth remembering, whether it is a great show of flags, the cheers of a crowd, the sound of the National Anthem, or the thought of the ceremony in the Abbey. That is, I think, what you will like to recall if you show your Coronation medals to other children when you are old.

The coronation of a new king is, in some ways, like a wedding. It is a solemn promise for the future, consecrated by a religious ceremony. The King gives his pledge to maintain law and order, justice and mercy, and to whom does he give his pledge? Is it only to those in the Abbey Church of Westminster? Those actually present represent others outside the Abbey—various classes in London, in England, all through the British dominions. The whole English people accept the pledge, and express thus their wish for law and order, justice and mercy. The Coronation means responsibility for the people as well as for the King. The occasion and the old ceremonies suggest previous coronations, and the hope that the King may follow in the steps of his best predecessors. It suggests our past history, the wonderful way in which our nation has grown, and the hope that the English people, too, may prove worthy of what is best in their past. This Coronation has, I expect, given you all a fresh interest in English history.

You probably know already the outlines of our national story, how Britain became England; how England, conquered by the Normans, gradually made its conquerors English; until, after the dominions in France were lost, Normans and English became one people. One king conquered Ireland and another Wales, and then after ages of rivalry between England and Scotland, a king of Scotland became king of England too.

This growing of the English snowball is brought home to us now in many ways, especially through the popularity of the national flag, more widely used of late than at any previous Coronation. Two hundred years ago the old flag, with the red cross of St. George on a white ground, was replaced by the Union Jack, in which the crosses of St. George and St. Andrew were combined. A hundred years later the cross of St. Patrick was added for Ireland.

At the same time, the beginning of the nineteenth century, the English king dropped the French fleur-de-lis from his coat-of-arms, and the Royal Standard was given its present form. Of the three lions for England, the two first were the coat-of-arms of William the Conqueror, and represented Normandy and Maine, the third lion being added by Henry II. for Aquitaine, his wife's inheritance. The single lion rampant for Scotland came in with James I., the harp being introduced for Ireland.

For nearly three hundred years British people have been settling in far countries and making them British too. Now for the first time at a Coronation representatives from India and the Colonies have taken an important part; and badges for these distant dominions appear with the rose, the thistle, the shamrock, and the leek in various decorative designs on dresses, carpets, &c., at the ceremony, and on invitations to the ceremony.

Thus whilst there is one king over all the British dominions, these dominions are made up of many different countries, whose inhabitants differ widely in history, in circumstances, and in character. What a responsibility this means for our little England! How are justice and mercy to be maintained for all unless there is knowledge, understanding, and sympathy? How is this great Empire to become more truly one?

This great responsibility for England, this need of closer union for the great British Empire, are amongst the thoughts connected with the Coronation that you can all understand, and it should give a deeper interest to your study of English history.

You will understand that whilst a medal or a picture may commemorate this Coronation, we need more than that to suggest and express the full meaning of so great an occasion. The best that we have all thought and felt about it should be put into the lasting form of beautiful words.

The Greeks long ago found that a poem or song was the best memorial of a national event or a national hero. These Greek poems or odes were songs set to music, and we still call such poems odes, even though they are not intended to be sung.

The poet William Watson has written such an ode to commemorate this Coronation. Some passages from it were quoted in the "Children's Column" and the following pages on June 28.

The whole poem is much finer than any separate passages from it, and I think that, with a little help, you would understand a great deal of it even now. Then, when you are older, and hear it spoken of as one of the fine odes in our language, you will like to read it all.

I want you to realise that a worthy memorial in verse of a great national event, a great national occasion, concerns us all, even the children. It speaks for us all, and to us all. Whilst it is an offering to the sovereign it is a gift to the nation also. It is the one Coronation present in which anyone and everyone may share.

Next week I hope to tell you more about the poem as a whole. It is not easy poetry. Indeed, it has been hinted to me that it is quite too difficult for the "Children's Column." But most things worth having are worth some effort in the winning, and I hope you will find it worth while trying to understand. If in the passages quoted there should be words you do not know (such as armipotence, precipitately, cabal, iris, etc.), just ask for a dictionary. Then I will tell you about things you would less easily find out for yourselves.

Before next week you might notice the various designs on the English coins now in use. Amongst them you will find the royal coat-of-arms, the three national badges and the English oak, and also pictures of Britannia and St. George. I wonder whether you can guess why William Watson should represent England as Britannia rather than as St. George?

A "CHRISTIAN SOLDIER."

THOSE who knew the late Mr. I. M. WADE—and who was there in our churches that did not?—will share our feeling as we name him a typical "Christian Soldier." He belonged truly to the "Church Militant," his bodily presence, as reflected for posterity in the portrait at Essex Hall, accorded with his temperament, and when he wrote verses the martial strain came naturally to the fore. When he spoke at our meetings the ring of challenge was often in his voice; controversy had no terrors for him; he was so clearly convinced of the righteousness of his cause that now and again he flung himself with fearless promptitude against argumentative positions that seemed to others impregnable. How "faithfully" he dealt with any who betrayed symptoms of hesitation! How earnestly he sounded the note of alarm when, as only too frequently happened, he could discern signs of failure in the ranks! He was, if any, a "manly man."

That a man should be so determined a fighter, and yet be so much honoured and beloved by all kinds of people, testifies to something in his character which was genuinely noble. He fought the good fight as it was appointed for him, not as a self-seeker. "Soldiers of the cross," writes Dr. MARTINEAU, "it is not for us but for our Leader and our Lord, to choose the field; it is ours, taking the station which he assigns, to make it the field of truth and honour, though it be the field of death." ISRAEL MARK WADE was deeply imbued with that feeling. He looked to his "Leader and his Lord," and was zealous, even jealous, for the glory of his name. He took sides resolutely, but always chivalrously. It may occur that soldiers who serve the same King entertain different notions as to the plan of campaign. After all, the Church Militant is not the Church Triumphant. When it is, we shall all see eye to eye, as well as feel heart to heart. Now we must be profoundly grateful when we know that hearts are in accord, that whatever differences we utter in debate, we all love goodness and desire truth in the inward part. The "Christian Soldier," wherever his post is, may take comfort in the thought that he is not bound to be infallible in judgment. He is bound to do the duty assigned him, and to keep up, so far as in him lies, the honour of the flag. Discretion, we are told, is the better part of valour; but though some of the Elizabethan playwrights thought it a sentiment for the mouth of heroes, the greatest dramatist of them all put it into the mouth of a coward. By all means let us be discreet, but rather make a blunder than risk nothing.

We have spoken of our dear and venerable friend in terms which will not be mistaken for criticism. For nearly fifty years he occupied a prominent place in our work as a religious body, and he served so loyally and with his heart's best love that we look around and wish that there were scores ready to emulate his career. For he was a worker—not a hearer of the word, nor a speaker only, but a doer. How dearly he loved the lads whom he sought to lead into the paths of Christian citizenhood! With what self-denying zeal he flung his powers into that work of the ministry to the young which goes by the often slighted name of "the Sunday School"! Year in and year out, his heart and mind brooded over this part of our work. It was eminently characteristic of him that he joined the volunteers as much in the hope of helping the personal life of the young fellows, his comrades, as in any other. Of course, he had interests outside these things; he shared to the full in the crowded life of our day. But here, in the task of helping young souls, and especially those in the neglected parts of our cities, he found his special work.

He has joined the fathers at rest. What are we to do for want of such young men as he was half-a-century ago? There were others in that day whose names are full of honour now as those of men who have done great and valued services. Where are their successors? Here and there, ones or twos are to be found, as bravely fighting against ignorance, stupidity, and vice, as ever the fathers did. But it is agonising to go through the dull streets where the lowly toilers live, and think how much moral and mental energy is being wasted by those in more fortunate circumstances who live their own selfish lives and never think they have a duty here. People gasp with fear of the "Hooligans," but what proportion of us actually does a stroke to save the lads of the slums from the perils of an undisciplined vigour? These very terrors of the streets might in their turn prove splendid recruits if only "captains" from homes of culture would live with them at least a few hours a week, and be their leaders and inspirers. Our friend, now silent, used to plead that these young lives should be gathered into "our churches." Let any who would put it in different words remember that the needs of the hour, and their responsibilities, do not grow less while they are nicely weighing phrases. Suum cuique—to the faithful soldier, honour; to the unfaithful and the coward, shame.

AT THE CORONATION.

IT is no easy task to give a succinct account of the impressions received by one present in the Abbey at the Crowning of King Edward VII. It was all so dazzling, so overwhelming in its splendour of sight and sound, that analysis and description seem well-nigh impossible. Let me, then, try in perfect simplicity to record my personal experiences so far as memory can disentangle them for enumeration.

The generous hospitality of a lady whose name is familiar in our churches sent me forth in the early morning in her open carriage equipped in cap and gown and hood to join the throng. As one drew into the great stream of humanity in the Park bands of scarlet and of khaki swept down the avenues under the noble trees, and the Mall was one mass of horses, equipages, soldiers, and civilians. Opposite Buckingham Palace all traffic was stayed by a vast stream of troops, brilliant among them all the Indian contingent in its medley of gorgeous colour. But the magic of the Earl Marshal's pass at last opened a way across that river of scarlet and purple and gold, and ere long my carriage—mine for the moment—was one of many hundreds packed five abreast in the broad thoroughfare of Victoria-street. Progress now became slow indeed. A few paces forward and then a pause — often for many minutes—then a few paces forward again. And around on every side all the glory of apparel that London could bring together. In this carriage a peer in his ermine, he and his peeress carrying their coronets in their hands. In that, a couple of Bishops. In another an Indian prince who bowed to one, when one turned towards him gravely and graciously, as far as the stiff gold in which he was cased would admit. There a boy lordling of a dozen summers, laughing, in his gorgeous robes, at the show. But presently it was close on half-past nine, and the block seemed more impenetrable than ever. Ladies in raiment gleaming white and sparkling with gems, and with ostrich plumes for their headgear, began to step out of their chariots, and presently the side-walk was covered with a strange medley of nobles and civilians, great generals and statesmen, ladies with sweeping trains, Orientals splendid in attire, threading their way through the ordinary London crowd of clerks and artisans and dust-stained women towards the Abbey, so near, yet, for the blocked carriages, still so far.

But at last all difficulties of approach were surmounted, and once in the Abbey precincts all was easy. A few minutes and I was seated in a little group of Nonconformist divines—my right-hand neighbour hailing from Scotland, my left from Wales—in the gallery of the south aisle, like the vast majority of guests blocked, by the great organ, from any view of that eastern portion of the church where the actual ceremonial was to be, but splendidly placed for seeing the processions up the nave and for hearing in all its richness the wonderful Coronation music.

Rapidly the seats were filling—the gallery opposite mainly, I opine, with the sisters and daughters of peers, beneath them every conceivable colour and cut of masculine robe and uniform. Guardsmen and Beefeaters alternately sentineled the nave. Up the long carpet swept peers and peeresses in an endless stream. On one side was a medley of divines, officers, deputy-lieutenants, mayors and lord-mayors, and I know not what beside. Almost immediately to my right, on the platform over the great central arch, was a group of the King's trumpeters with a mass of clerical instrumentalists to give variety and colour to the tones of the Abbey organ. In such a confusion of colour, such a profuse and lavish mass of splendour, it was hard to concentrate one's mind on any one thing, or to realise that this was a great religious service for which we were assembled.

But, hark! simple and solemn and sweet rise the tones of "O God, our help in ages past," drawing nearer and nearer as the choral procession moves westward from the choir and emerges—in snowy gowns—into the nave itself. I think the simplicity of that hymn was the most impressive musical effect of the day—save perhaps the tremendous rapid crescendo with which, immediately after the crowning, the choir shout "Be strong and play the man."

And now one after another, with long pause between, the Royal processions sweep up the nave—the Duke of Connaught and his retinue, the Princesses and their ladies and their pages, the Prince and Princess of Wales and suite, then royal and stately beyond words the Queen, her left hand lightly resting in the Bishop of Norwich's right, and finally, pale, but strong and firm in gait, the King. Fanfare and anthem, dazzling and bewildering of eye and ear; presently the shout of the Westminster boys, and then far, far away, as from another world, the voice of the Archbishop very, very slowly, and to us very, very faintly, reciting the solemn words of prayer or charge, "Grant unto this thy servant Edward, our King, the spirit of wisdom and government, that being devoted unto thee with all his heart, he may so wisely govern this kingdom, that in his time thy Church and people may continue in safety and prosperity"; or "With this sword do justice, stop the growth of iniquity, protect the Holy Church of God, help and defend widows and orphans, restore the things that are gone to decay, maintain the things that are restored, punish and reform what is amiss, and confirm what is in good order."

It was all over at last. The King was crowned. Fate and destiny themselves seemed to have been conquered. And amid all that blaze of colour and the triumphal notes of the National Anthem, taken up by the vast congregation in every part of the mighty Abbey, Queen and King successively passed out, she seeming to radiate queenly dignity and gladness, he with a great burden lifted off his heart and the air of a man who has conquered in a mortal fray. And "three cheers for the King," "three cheers for the Queen"—no part of the official programme—gave vent to the pent up feelings of that unparalleled assembly.

And the impression? The spiritual impression? Well, I can only record my own. One's whole being was filled with satisfied emotion. The blaze and glory of it all, its flashing splendour, its stately majesty, its pageant and pride and pomp took possession of one, mind, heart and soul. One had no thirst for anything more. It was enough. But the clear thoughts which gradually emerged from the intoxication of the total impression, what were they? They were great, sublime: were they religious? It was the greatness of England one felt; one did not think of the greatness of God. It was the splendour of Man that possessed one; it was not the splendour of God. It was pride that had one in its hold—a great and noble pride, the pride of the Englishman in his people, his country, his race. The historic sense was vivid. The sense of the solidarity and might of empire was strong in one. And all purified and ennobled and lifted to a great height. But pride it was, and not humility; and humility, not pride, is the vital element in religion. It was good, but it was not the best. It was exalting, but it did not bring one to the feet of God.

In the hearts, however, of the chief actors in that great drama—the King, the Queen, the Primate—one could well believe that a deep religious sentiment was quickened. To them the sense of awe—of dedicating the highest on earth to the Heavenly King—must, I think, have been present. But for the rest of us, perhaps, it belonged to the necessary limitations of human nature that the sense of the Divine and of such old commandments as "Walk humbly with thy God" could not fill the mind and soul at the same moment with the overwhelming sense of human magnificence and royal state.

Indeed, I am not sure that for purely spiritual impression absolute plainness, the absence of all display of pomp, with perhaps one or two great hymns to be sung together by all the people, would not have been greater, stronger, more uplifting. But then there is a strain of the Puritan in me, and my imagination does not readily robe religion in gold and purple.

But there it was, this gorgeous ceremonial; and one gave oneself up at once to the power and awe of it. For my part I could not have conceived that silks and satins, ermine and brocade, gold and jewels, the outpourings of immeasurable material riches, could have produced a spectacle so overwhelming in beauty and in grandeur. But it was so; and he who beheld that spectacle has added to the treasury of imperishable memories. The picture can never be effaced. The unique emotions of the hour can never be forgotten. Let us pray that those emotions in their after outcome may make for justice, righteousness, and true religion in this English realm.

For myself I owe a debt of gratitude to those whose generous suffrages in elevating me to an honourable office procured for me the opportunity of this ever-memorable experience.

Richard A. Armstrong.

OBITUARY.

MR. I. M. WADE.

We deeply regret to have to record the death of Mr. I. M. Wade, which took place at his residence Hazeldene, Christchurch-road, Norwich, on the 8th inst., after a long illness. He was in his eighty-second year, having been born at Norwich in 1820.

The son of Unitarian parents, Israel Mark Wade was throughout his long life devotedly attached to Unitarianism, and it would be difficult to find a name more familiar in our churches than his. His enthusiasm, especially for Sunday-schools, brought him into Unitarian circles in all parts of the country, and his voice and presence were familiar to hosts of teachers and scholars. As a child he attended the Octagon Chapel with his parents, and was educated at the Presbyterian school. On leaving school he was taken into the office of Mr. John Withers Dowson, under whose influence he developed, not only in business capacity, but in zeal for all kinds of good work, and especially among the young and the neglected. Through Mr. Dowson's influence he was sent to London, and having obtained an appointment in the office of the Visitors in Lunacy he gradually rose to be chief clerk, a position which he held till his retirement some years ago.

Mr. Wade's official connection with the Sunday School Association began in 1858, when he succeeded the Rev. William Vidler as secretary. He continued in this office till 1894, the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie having been associated with him in the secretaryship since 1886. In 1894 Mr. Wade served as President of the Association, and then reluctantly left the work to be carried on by younger hands, though to the end his interest in all its affairs was as keen as ever. In promoting the formation of new schools and in assisting the better equipment of schools already existing he was untiring, and everyone will recall his diligence in bringing the literature of his society before the notice of teachers' conferences in all parts of the kingdom. He was himself a practical teacher and superintendent, and in addition to other literary work for the schools he composed a number of hymns, of which no fewer than five were included by Mrs. Farrington in her collection of "Hymns for Children," issued in 1894. As a London Unitarian, Mr. Wade was indefatigable in every effort that tended to extend the faith and fellowship. Not content with membership of one congregation he subscribed to several, though it was chiefly in connection with Unity, Islington, that he is remembered in our Church work. Himself a capable lay-preacher, he was for many years on the committee of the London District Unitarian Society, and was a warm friend of the Rev. Robt. Spears in his missionary work. He was also an assiduous member of the Executive of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and took the deepest practical interest in the work of the London Domestic Mission. The London Sunday School Society was founded by him in 1848, and he acted as its secretary or president till 1894. Other public duties found in him a willing servant, and no part of his busy life was more earnest than in his work as a School Board manager. Respecting his personal characteristics we speak elsewhere, and they are well summed in the funeral address which we reproduce below. His vigour seemed hardly to wane, even after he had passed three score years and ten. On his retirement to his native city in 1896 he sought office, unsuccessfully, as Guardian, and so recently as 1899 he won a seat on the School Board. Eighteen months ago he had, however, to resign all public work, and at last his full release has come. Marrying somewhat late in life, Mr. Wade leaves but one son, Mr. Harold Wade, whose name is already well known in our churches and societies, and with whom and his widowed mother respectful sympathy will be widely felt.

The funeral took place on Tuesday at the Rosary, a service being previously held at the Octagon, the Rev. Alfred Hall officiating. Among the mourners were Mr. G. King and Mr. A. M. Stevens (representing the Octagon Church), Mr. Ion Pritchard (B. and F.U.A. and S.S.A.), the Rev. E. M. Daplyn (formerly of the Octagon), and other representative friends. In the course of his address, the Rev. A. Hall said:—

By the death of Israel Mark Wade we lose almost the last of the band of noble young men who gathered round John Withers Dowson in the early thirties as scholars and teachers. Some of you were their successors and can appreciate the spirit which bound them together. You can call to mind the face of John Withers Dowson ere his head was grey, and the countenances of James Freeman, Frederick Stevens, Charles Corkran, and Mark Wade, while the bloom of youth was still on their cheeks. And we can all picture them gathering round the saintly leader in the early mornings to learn the rudiments of a science or a language, and on the Wednesday evenings discussing the Scriptures with him and talking over any difficulties they had had in class. In the years 1835 and 1836, when Mr. Wade was only 16 years old, half a dozen of them used to meet at St. Stephen's Gate before six o'clock on the Sunday mornings and set out for the village of Hapton to teach a handful of children the Gospel of Jesus, and to preach to a few farm labourers in the little village chapel. Snow and sleet and rain did not prevent them from tramping the ten miles to their missionary duty. But they had their reward for undertaking this work. For on the summer evenings, when their task was done, they loitered by the way, and experienced the joy of companionship, and the Sabbath peace of God, which became a sacred, helpful memory to them all. Such youth so spiritually inclined, and at the same time so intellectually intent, were rare in those days. They are, perhaps, still rarer in ours. And it has been a privilege to meet and speak with some of them in the evening of their days. Many people have to cultivate religion, and can keep it only by constant exercise. It was native to the soul of our departed friend, Mr. Wade. From the days of childhood, when he used to think that the sun, as it shone through the skylights of this chapel, was the eye of God looking down on the worshippers at their devotions, to the day of his death he carried the same worshipful spirit and wore the same Godward look. The service of God with the congregation was his delight. It grieved him to be away from us, and we can remember his erect figure as he reverently stood with his book in hand thoughtfully and joyfully singing the praise of God. The spirit of the Lord seemed at times to be upon him. But we who worship here have seen but little of his life. His chief work was outside our city. When he went to London in 1845 he did not join a congregation where he might have met men of his own social standing and intellectual habits, but the chapel in Carter-street, which was a mission to the poor. And in its district he resided fifteen years, teaching in morning and afternoon Sunday-schools, and attending the two services regularly. His spare time during the week was chiefly spent in visiting the sick and the distressed and in conducting classes. A serious epidemic of small-pox once attacked the district, and before its ravages the doctors trembled; but he forsook not his post. He was found in the houses of the sufferers acting as a nurse, preparing their food, and easing their couches. From this lowly and often unseen labour we might follow him to conspicuous work. For his was a powerful personality; and he soon became a leader of the Unitarian cause. For years he was secretary to the Unitarian Sunday School Association, and he has done more for the Sunday-schools of our denomination than any other man. Into every part of the country he travelled, urging the young people to devote their efforts to the training of children to the service of God and to the furtherance of our faith. His clear-cut, strong, intellectual face, and the earnest thoughtfulness of his words, commanded attention wherever he went. He was a man that one would single out at once as something more than an ordinary. He was fearless, masculine, and determined. When he became convinced of the truth of any principle he proclaimed it boldly, and would countenance no dishonest compromise. There was no shiftiness or artifice in his character or ways. There was no guile in his heart. He spoke plainly, he acted straightforwardly, and everybody knew what he meant. His purpose was always clear. In an age when men are indifferent and careless about religion he maintained clearly defined views, and was pronounced in his convictions. There was no stauncher Unitarian than he. With especial appropriateness the oft-quoted lines of Browning may be applied to him:—

One who never turned his back, but marched breast forward,
Never doubted clouds would break,
Never dreamed, though right were worsted, wrong would triumph,
Held we fall to rise, are baffled to fight better,
Sleep to wake.

On my visits to him he asked for every detail of information concerning our work here, and his constant words to me were "Work on, and never be discouraged." He was a man of boundless energy and unswerving perseverance, and he carried his lofty character and strength of will into everything he did. They were stamped even on his recreation, which also took the form of service. He sought it by becoming a volunteer, and soon formed his own company. Almost everything he undertook was successful. A few years ago he returned to his native city to devote himself to its service, and to end his days, as he had begun them, in sacred association with this house of prayer. And as we pay our parting tribute of respect to him to-day, we feel that his life was so lofty and spiritual that we cannot conceive such a physical thing as death having any power beyond the body that was seen. It is impossible for the mind to believe that so noble a soul is no more, and that God has no mission for him to fulfil elsewhere. Such men make us more confident about the immortality of our lives. We know they cannot die. We mourn the loss of our fellow-worshipper, but grieve for his widow, with whom his days were spent in sweet and helpful companionship, and for his relatives, for those who knew him best loved and honoured him most. The nearer anyone came to him the more he learnt to respect him. He has gone to the Great Father whom he loved so deeply and served so well, whose presence he felt like that of some dear friend. He mingles now in the heavenly places with the friends of his youth, and we are left with the blessed memory of a godly man and an example worthy of emulation.

MR. E. W. DU TOIT, OF GRAAFF REINET.

The town of Graaff Reinet, in Cape Colony, and especially the little circle of religious liberals there, have suffered a great loss in the death of Mr. E. du Toit, who passed away, aged sixty-five, at the house of his married daughter in Port Elizabeth on July 4th. His name deserves record in The Inquirer for this reason, amongst others, that it was always one of the journals by which he kept himself and his family wonderfully well versed in the affairs of this country, though none of them had ever seen its shores. The fact is typical of his vigorous intelligence and wide interests. But it is less easy to indicate the combination of sturdiness with modesty and kindliness in his character. Occupying an important semi-public position as secretary to the Graaff Reinet Board of Executors, he won by his thoroughness and courtesy in business the esteem of all who had dealings with him. The present writer, however, saw most of him in the home and the church. A brighter and happier household than that over which he presided with persuasive firmness could hardly be imagined. But he could be servant as well as master. Amongst the congregation he was not only a wise counsellor, but also the humble functionary who filled and trimmed the paraffin lamps by which the Free Protestant Church was lit. It was unwillingness to spare himself that hastened his death. Overwork caused the rupture of a blood-vessel of the heart, and the end came very suddenly. The memory of his life will be a precious possession to his family. H. Rawlings.

Professor Adeney, of New College, struck a note characteristic of modern Christian thought when in a sermon on "The New Testament after Criticism" (as reported in the Christian World Pulpit) he emphasised the "return to Jesus." He said:—

Here is our historical basis. I entreat you to make the most of it. Do not be distracted by the appearance of the Christ of the creeds, the Christ of theology, to be approached as "the second Person of the Trinity," abstract, metaphysical, incomprehensible, eluding our grasp, having no contact with flesh and blood, a problem in speculation, bewildering and utterly disappointing. Many a simple soul may adopt Magdalen's plaint, "They have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid him." I do not wish to pass extravagant criticisms on the dogmas of the Church, though I know it is fashionable to treat them with contempt. The creeds of the fourth and fifth centuries were almost forced on the Church by the speculations of the second century. Devout earnest men felt it necessary to meet militant error by truth armed to the teeth with definitions. But it is not necessary for us to-day to go to those antique polemical definitions for our knowledge of Jesus Christ; and it will be simply disastrous if we stay there and do not go back to the Christ himself in the story of his life on earth. We may not be able to define him, but we can know him when we read our New Testament.

CHURCH AND MINISTRY IN EARLY CHRISTIAN TIMES.

NOTES OF TWO LECTURES BY THE REV. J. EDWIN ODGERS, M.A., D.D., AT THE OXFORD S.S.S.S.

Church, the lecturer said, was an English word, representing older Teutonic forms, adapted from the Greek Kuriakon, which denoted properly a building, "The Lord's House." The same word was familiar to them in the German Kirche and the Scottish Kirk. The French Eglise represented another Greek word, adapted into Latin as Ecclesia, which means "an assembly," the Church as a people, not a building.

The Roman or High Anglican, the Protestant, the Calvinist, the Separatist, the Rationalist, each had a distinct answer to the question, What is a Church? But if they looked upon the matter from the historical point of view, what they saw was in the first instance the natural cohesion and sympathy of those who were touched by a great personal influence, and then the diffusion of that influence by methods differing from country to country and from time to time. Enthusiasm gave place gradually to organisation, but by no means to one kind of organisation, as the expectation of the end of the world faded away and the Church had to look to the future of the world. It was a human institution arising, propagating itself in diverse ways, long with a nebulous fringe of indeterminate Christianity (all that the Church has called heresy), until Christianity became the State religion, with a definite creed and a clerical order. This natural development might be illustrated by a number of parallels, by such enthusiastic spiritual movements as that of the Friends, and the great Evangelical Revival of the eighteenth century, succeeded by rigid forms of constitution.

The Church in the earliest times was spoken of as the Ecclesia, Greek being the general language of the Mediterranean, and the Greek-speaking Jews being already familiar with the words as used in the Septuagint for the Congregation of the people, the people assembled for religious purposes. (Acts vii. 38.) Greeks used the same word for the assembly of citizens. (See in Acts xix. the account of the uproar at Ephesus.)

The Church, in its movement to carry Christianity to the world, started outward from Jerusalem and from the Jews gathered there. At Jerusalem there was the "waiting Church," the widowed Church, with the Lord taken from them, expecting his return in power. They kept up their connection with the Congregation of Israel, going regularly to the Temple, attached to the national religion, at the same time breaking bread at home. (Acts ii. 46.) They were in a position like that of the old Dissenters, who built our own meeting-houses, never meaning to leave the National Church, but waiting and expecting to be comprehended once more, careful never to have private chapel worship at the hour of public worship in the parish church, and attending both.

James, the Lord's brother, not one of the Twelve, was head of the waiting Church at Jerusalem, and gave to it a very conservative tone.

There were throughout the East multitudes who were drawn towards the Jewish religion and morality, the spiritual thought of God, and made a circle of hearers about every little synagogue. Weary of paganism, and feeling that the Jewish conception of God was truer than anything that had reached them even from the philosophers, they were a "worshipping," "devout" people, sometimes called "proselytes of the gate." They formed the great public prepared for the message of Christianity.

It was among them, for the most part, that Paul found his converts. As he and others went abroad carrying their message, often whole households were baptised, and among the earliest churches household communities were found. (Acts xvi. 14; Philemon 2.)

Then it became clear that the Church must have its own apostolate, and do its own mission work, no longer attendant on the old waiting Church in Jerusalem. (Acts xiii. 1–3, xiv. 14.) Paul preached a universal Gospel, with a heavenly Christ, outside the synagogue. Paul and Barnabas were henceforth apostles; it was a new ministry, with authority independent of the Twelve, an authority which Paul strenuously defended, for himself and others. There were in the Church "apostles, prophets, teachers." 1 Cor. xii. 28.) The prophet was a preacher, preaching according to the guidance and inspiration of the Holy Spirit. In 1 Cor. xiv. may be seen Paul's conception of a ministry of spiritual gifts and of order in the Church.

In the work known as the "Teaching of the Twelve Apostles," one of the most valuable of the recent discoveries of early Christian literature, belonging to the end of the first or the beginning of the second century, there was clear evidence of how in the churches the "ministry of the Spirit" was beginning to be superseded by a local ministry, to meet the needs of settled congregations, and to guard against the dangers of the first enthusiastic movement.

The first part of this work consists almost entirely of moral teaching, and probably existed separately in the first instance. The first preaching of Christianity, in a way that is hardly realised, was the preaching of a moral crusade. A new, pure, chaste life was set before the people; and then when they wanted to know more, of the source of that new life, they were told to come for private instruction, and the story of the life of Jesus was unfolded to them. The last thing taught to the candidate for baptism was the Lord's Prayer. When after this instruction he came for baptism, to show the sympathy of the community certain of them would watch and pray and fast with him in preparation; and, then, in the house-church, there was the feast of the Eucharist.

From the second part of the "Teaching" Dr. Odgers read some passages (which are appended to these notes) as an introduction to his second lecture. They show the longing for the gathering together of the scattered churches, and furnish guidance as to the sincerity of those professing to be apostles and prophets of the new life.

In the earliest age of the Church bishop and presbyter were the same. Presbyter simply meant Elder. The ruler of the Jewish synagogue had to see not only to the worship, but to the civil life of the community. Everywhere, among the Jews of the Dispersion, the synagogue was the centre of the civil life of the community, and the chief men were the magistracy. So it was in the early Christian Church. The Elders presided not only over the worship, but over the civil and social relations of believers.

When a distinction came to be drawn between the bishop (the episkopos, or overseer) and the Elders, or Presbyters, it was that bishop denoted the man prepared to give up his whole time to the business of the Church, while the Presbyter was not such, but a committee-man, taking turns at distinctly ministerial functions. Thus in time arose the monarchical episcopate, while deacons began to take the management of the church assemblies. Bishops in the early days were chosen by popular election, though traces of this were soon obliterated when the custom was superseded, except in such a notable historical instance as that of Ambrose, who was the civil governor of Milan and not even a baptised Christian when he was elected bishop by popular acclamation. The belief that such popular election was under the guidance of the Spirit, through the prophets (cf. 1. Tim. i. 18, iv. 14), took a strange form in the church of Ravenna, which prided itself on being older than that of Rome. Its first twelve bishops were known as "bishops of the dove," because chosen by indication of the Holy Spirit, in the form of a dove.

There were several causes in the second century which led to the increase of the bishop's power and the unifying of organisation: the Montanist movement, like the revolt of George Fox and the early Quakers, a reaction in favour of the Spirit, resistance to which led to an increase of clerical power, the speculative philosophy of the Gnostics, dealing with ultimate questions of matter and spirit and the origin of evil, over against which was set the simple formulation of the creed, as of things which could not be dissolved away in a cloud of speculation; and the eclecticism of Marcion, picking out what he regarded as the essential spiritual elements in the Scriptures, which led to the recognition of the canon of the New Testament books. The bishop stood for the unity of the Church, and was the depositary of the true teaching. Thus, by the third century, the position of the bishop was established as the chief man of the city, and ultimately of the district, and there were in the Church also presbyters, deacons and readers.

At the conclusion of his lecture, Dr. Odgers gave some interesting particulars as to early church buildings, illustrated by diagrams, showing how various had been the forms adopted, first from the house and then from the school, the court of the burial-club house, the basilica or court of justice, and from the conversion of heathen temples to Christian use.

Passages from "The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles."

CHAPTER IX.—With regard to your Eucharist (the giving of thanks), give thanks after this manner:—First, with regard to the cup, "We give thanks to Thee, our Father, for the holy vine of Thy child David, which Thou has made known to us through Thy child Jesus; to Thee be glory for ever." But with regard to the broken bread, "We give thanks to Thee, our Father, for the life and knowledge which Thou hast made known to us through Thy child Jesus; to Thee be glory for ever. As this broken bread was scattered upon the mountains and gathered together became one, so let Thy Church be gathered together from the ends of the earth into Thy kingdom, for Thine is the glory and the power through Jesus Christ for ever." But let no one eat or drink of your Eucharist except those baptised in the name of the Lord, for regarding this also the Lord hath said, "Give not that which is holy to the dogs."

Chapter X.—But after being filled, give thanks thus: "We give thanks to Thee, Holy Father, for Thy holy name, which Thou hast caused to dwell in our hearts, and for the knowledge and faith and immortality which Thou hast made known to us by Jesus Thy child, to Thee be glory for ever. Thou, O Almighty Ruler, madest all things for Thy name's sake; Thou gavest men food and drink for enjoyment that they might give thanks to Thee, but us Thou blessedst with spiritual food and drink and eternal life through Thy child. Before all things we give thanks to Thee that Thou art mighty; to Thee be glory for ever. Remember, O Lord, Thy Church to deliver her from all evil and to perfect her in Thy love, and gather her together from the four winds, her the sanctified, into Thy Kingdom which Thou preparedst for her; for Thine is the power and the glory for ever. Let grace come, and let this world pass away. Hosanna to the God of David. If any one be holy let him come, if any one be not holy let him repent. Maranatha. Amen." But suffer the prophets to give thanks much as (i.e., in what words) they will.

Chapter XI. — Whosoever therefore cometh and teacheth you all things aforesaid, receive him. But if the teacher himself being perverted teacheth another teaching to the undoing (thereof), hear him not, but if (his teaching be) to the increasing of righteousness and the knowledge of the Lord, receive him as the Lord. But with regard to the apostles and prophets, according to the command of the Gospel, so do ye. Let every apostle that cometh to you be received as the Lord. But he shall not remain (more than) one day, and if there be necessity the second also, but if he remain three days he is a false prophet. And when the apostle departeth let him take nothing except bread (to last) till he reach his lodging. But if he ask for money he is a false prophet. And no prophet that speaketh in the Spirit shall ye try or prove, for every sin shall be forgiven, but this sin shall not be forgiven. Not every one that speaketh in the Spirit is a prophet, but only if he have the behaviour of the Lord. By their behaviour then shall the false prophet and the prophet be known. And no prophet that ordereth a table in the Spirit eateth of it except he be a false prophet. And every prophet that teacheth the truth if he doeth not what he teaches is a false prophet. But whosoever saith in the Spirit, Give me money or any other things, ye shall not hearken to him, but if he bid to give for others that lack, let no one judge him.

Chapter XII.—But let every one that cometh in the name of the Lord be received, and then proving him ye shall know the right and left (true and false), for ye shall have understanding. If indeed he that cometh is a wayfarer help him as much as ye can, but he shall not remain with you longer than two or three days unless there be necessity. But if he willeth to settle among you and is a craftsman, let him work and (so) eat. But if he have no craft, according to your understanding provide that a Christian shall live with you without being idle. But if he will not act thus he is one who maketh merchandise of Christ; beware of such.

Chapter XV.—Elect therefore for yourselves bishops and deacons worthy of the Lord, men meek, and not lovers of money, and truthful, and approved, for they too minister to you the ministry of the prophets and teachers. Therefore despise them not, for they are those that are honoured of you with the prophets and teachers. But reprove one another not in wrath but in peace, as ye have it in the Gospel, and with every one that transgresseth against his neighbour let no one speak, nor let him hear (a word) from you until he repent. But your prayers and alms and all your actions so do as ye have it in the Gospel of our Lord.

SATURDAY RAMBLES AS HELPS TO SUNDAY-SCHOOL WORK.*

The phrase "Sunday-school Work" has come to cover a great deal of ground and to involve many agencies; but for our present purposes let it mean the education (i.e., the leading out) of the religious consciousness of the children, and of the young men and women who constitute the elder classes.

For the best results the prime necessity is the establishment of cordial and healthy relations of goodwill and of fellowship between teacher and scholar, or between class and leader.

The education of the religious consciousness stands a poor chance when time and temper have to be wasted in keeping order—the repression of the unruly—or the stimulation of the interest of the listless by story-reading.

On the other hand, when once cordial relations of fellowship and good understanding have been attained the question of conduct never arises, and even the listless are caught by the epidemic of sympathetic interest.

As we are truly and constantly told everything depends upon the personality of the teacher, and Mr. Mellone yesterday gave us much food for thought with regard to this very subject.

It does not always mean that the successful teacher's personal influence results from either strength of will, or what is called superior education, and, as Mr. Mellone pointed out, precisely what personality means is hard to define. In schools we see it exercised by people who to all previous seeming were doomed to failure. And whilst its presence marks the truly efficient teacher, its absence is little less than a calamity. Often the most willing and conscientious teachers are floored just in this one respect—that they cannot catch and retain the interest and regard of their scholars.

Some have recourse to bribery. By treats and prizes they purchase the apparent interest and good conduct of their class, and ipso facto disqualify themselves for exercising the ideal teacher's function.

* Reproduced from notes used in lecturing at the Summer Session of Sunday-school Teachers at Manchester College, Oxford, July 8, 1902.

To such and to others who desire to increase their personal power for good I recommend as a more excellent way the (Saturday) ramble.

A time is appointed—usually on Saturday because it is a general half-holiday—and you meet the scholars and fare forth into the fields, along the lanes, by the riverside, over the common or through the wood. The limitations and needful restraints and decorums of Sunday-school are absent. The spirit of the time is genial enjoyment of fresh air, and active life under the open sky. Entering into the joy and the interests of the young folk you develop between yourself and them a closer fellowship, a "chumminess" which need by no means be allowed to degenerate into undue familiarity.

Here is a great gain to Sunday-school work, even on the plane of your influence over the conduct of the class, for you will find that that one matter of sympathetic fellowship has done much, may have done everything, in the way of making the good conduct of the class a matter of course.

Keep this always as the first object then, that the ramble is a form of physical exercise primarily. Enjoy the ramble as a ramble and a means of getting near to the scholars. Next, as occasion offers, let the observation of nature be introduced. It is almost inevitable that not you but one of your scholars will introduce it. A flower will be picked, or some unusual animal sighted, and attention called and questions asked. Now is the time for tact. The ramble will develop into one by object-lesson, and the interest of all will be caught and captivated if you are wise. Your first impulse will be to tell all you know about the particular flower or insect under observation. Try all you can to get the children to tell you. If you tell, a few may remember; if one of the youngsters by thinking is led to make a good guess, he or she certainly, and all the rest probably, will be encouraged and stimulated. Your wisdom is to wonder "why" or "how," and to get the young thinkers to attempt to answer.

So, by wise tact and reticence in the communication of what you chance to know, you open the minds of the children to the meanings and beauty of nature. Let me reiterate: make them independent observers; let them grow, by exercise, to be thinkers who do their own thinking. Thus will you make literally possible for them the aspiration of the Psalmist:—

> One thing have I asked of the Lord, that will I seek after; that I may dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of my life, to behold the beauty of the Lord, and to inquire in his temple.

So also shall it become natural and easy for them to "worship the Lord in the beauty of holiness."

> Flower in the crannied wall,
> I pluck you out of the crannies;
> I hold you here, root and all, in my hand,
> Little flower—but if I could understand
> What you are, root and all, and all in all,
> I should know what God and man is.

These, then, are the desirable objects of the week-day ramble—(1) The approximation of your personality with the children; and (2) community of interest in the study of nature.

And let the circumstances determine the dominant character of the ramble.

On occasion it may wisely be allowed to relapse into a romp, rather than be stiffened into a business of competitive specimen hunting or technical botanising. Your ability to enter into the natural joy of childlife is a sure proof of your fitness as a Sunday-school teacher. Sympathetic fellowship is the great object of your outing.

So I counsel even where there are few if any inviting walks into field and woodland—still organise rambles as purely physical exercise. Try to get away from Mother Nature as much as you may, she will insist on joining the ramble at one point or other. You thought you started without her, and did not expect to find her, and lo, she was with you all the time! for of all Mother Nature's wonderful works none are so wonderful as the glad hearts and expanding minds of your young friends. Count it a joy, then, and a privilege to be with them as they enter the Kingdom of Heaven which is upon earth.

And again, if you are working in a densely populated place far from fair fields, you may perhaps imagine that town children will not appreciate the wonders of the country, from total lack of opportunity for observation. This is not so. The danger lies the other way. The hardest children to interest are not those who see fewest of Nature's works at home, but those who have grown up in the habit of looking and not seeing—of thoughtless looking.

In February and March I am a fine botanist, believe me! I have exhaustive acquaintance with every flower you can cull in sheltered field and coppice. But in May, June, July, there is surfeit—I lose relish and am no longer an efficient botanist.

The very paucity of objects helps towards the adequate comprehension and study of the few.

"Adequate"! To know the name, whether English or botanical, of every flower, fern, moss, grass, tree; of every bee, moth, fly, ant, beetle, and gnat; of every quadruped, bird, reptile and worm, &c., is quite inadequate.

Though I have all knowledge, of such sort, and have not love, I am nothing.

But to have sympathetic understanding (which, indeed, involves interest developing into love) of the "how" of a single plant or animal, in its relations with its surroundings—that is adequate; how it lives, how it grows, how it is reacted upon by circumstances of air and sunlight, and by its fellow plants or animals, or by its rivals. All these lead the mind from the loving study of a single example out into the grand conception of a universe which is a unity—a rational unity; an ordered cosmos.

And such an expanding vista of loving study and reverence is possible, not only for me and for you, but also, if you are wise and tactful, for the young folk also. In this way their faith is founded upon convictions of their own, and not upon opinions of others.

And, in a way, it is the Personality of the plant, or animal, which makes it of value as an educative agency. Yesterday* we had the etymology of the word "Personality" expounded to us. Carrying on this idea of the voice sounding through the mask, it seems to me that the grand ideal of Personality is that of the Divine speaking through the human, "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father." With reverence also may it not be said of the flower and of the bee—he that hath, with understanding mind, seen us, hath seen the Father?

Are we not too apt to begin at the far end with the children? We tell them "God is infinitely wise, and all-powerful, and He has made the beautiful flowers and the wonderful insects." We want the children to know this and to feel it; but oh! let us exercise some self-restraint and self-denial and give them a chance to get there first. Let them make the grand discovery! Show the facts of flower structure, and wonder why certain sorts of insects frequent certain flowers. Your very inability to explain all will go far to prove the existence of a superhuman intelligence, power, and love, which is never found wanting, and which deals as efficiently with the least as with the greatest. Gradually you shall find that the Personality of God is apprehended in spite of His omnipotence, His omnipresence, His omniscience.

I speak my own experience when I say that starting with the affirmation of God (the Omnipotent, &c.) fails to bring the rational child-mind to consciousness of God; while, on the other hand, starting with some flower in the crannied wall, you can help the growing soul itself to find God.

Jacob, when he had rambled away from home and was alone in the world, dreamt of the connection of earth with heaven by a ladder whereon ascending angels of winged wonder met descending angels of Divine response and encouragement. "Lo! God is here, and I knew it not!" broke from him when his awakened reason saw things as they truly were—and are. So may it be with our young folk—so shall they learn to strive even with God and win his blessing.

I, too, have rambled far away from the practical aspects of my subject, yet not, I hope, without some justification.

If you decide to invite your class for a ramble or for a series of rambles, I prophesy that you and they will begin to get keen on nature study, and certain questions will arise; amongst which that of making collections of specimens will present itself. On this point one could say much, both for and against. Each case must be decided on its own merits. But as a general rule I would say, don't collect specimens, collect memories.

Accustom yourself and show the children how to observe, how to be still, how to be one big eye and one big ear, with mind at back of them, trying to understand, and store in the memory.

A dried flower in a collection is one thing; a flower in bloom is quite another! But a flower with its own special bee busy about it is a sight worth remembering to him who understands!

An egg blown and gummed on card is one thing; very different is a nest of eggs with the mother-bird personating God's Love!

So I say, first of all Observe. Yet (see my inconsistency!) forasmuch as summer is not always with us, and for other reasons, I also advocate the establishment of a Sunday-school Museum, with wise and strict limitations as to specimens to be admitted. Do not on any account let it become a rubbish cupboard for the reception of things the donors do not want, and which neither you nor they understand at all. Let the specimens admitted be the best possible ("type" specimens), such as serve to demonstrate some particular character or quality, and such as will afford an example for winter lessons, or week-night classes and lectures—traps to catch the idle curiosity of careless ones, and by your tact to convert it into religious wonder.

And once again, let the scholar who collected any specimen be considered as the authority to explain it, as far as he or she can do so, to the rest. By this means you will not only encourage an intelligent study of Nature in the present time, but will be finding from amongst your scholars those on whom to rely for efficient teachers, lecturers, and helpers in time to come.

May I conclude with a reminder that the true Nature-student and Nature-lover, though he may not hesitate to cull a flower for study, is never irreverently wanton or thoughtlessly destructive. Often, indeed, will the caution be needed in the case of the children also, not from perversity, but from thoughtlessness and want of comprehension of the surpassing interest and beauty of all plant life. And if it be so with regard to plants, yet more is it so with respect to animal life. Herein will lie also a value which attaches to the Saturday Ramble as an occasion for the inculcation of the moral relationship in which we stand to Nature; the more so as it will be constantly evident that we are all members of one vast family.

He prayeth well who loveth well
Both man and bird and beast.
He prayeth best who loveth best
All things both great and small;
For the dear God who loveth us,
He made and loveth all.

Thomas Robinson.

ABERYSTWITH.

The Unitarian Workers' Union has now assembled in full numbers under the kind leadership of Miss Tagart at this favourite watering-place. The first fortnight is rapidly coming to an end, and those who have been thus long together here will soon have only the pleasure of retrospect in common.

Besides sharing the ordinary round of sea-side amusements we have made delightful excursions into the country, the beauty of which was a fresh revelation to most of us. Everything we passed and every place we visited gained additional charm by the explanations of the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, given with all the enthusiasm of a patriot. We visited the Devil's Bridge, the Llyfnant Valley, and Borth, amongst other places. Sometimes long walks were taken under the guidance of Mr. W. H. Shrubsole, well known to the Pink Party for his fund of information on natural science, and for the readiness and patience with which he makes his knowledge accessible to all.

But the red-letter day of this first fortnight was when, at the instance of the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, we were invited, the whole thirty-eight of us, to attend the service at the chapel at Llwynrhydowen on the occasion of the induction of Mr. E. O. Jenkins to the pastorate. Our outing began with a most enjoyable journey by train and carriage. The day was perfect, the scenery beautiful. It was very enlightening and surprising to note as we went along the number of farms with their neat-looking, slate-roofed, whitewashed buildings, which the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones told us were occupied by Unitarians, and the villages we passed where the Unitarian chapel was the centre of religious life, and seems in this particular part of Wales to occupy the place that the Methodist chapel does in other districts. It is a most curious feature this existence of a nucleus of Unitarian communities hidden away amongst these hills so remote from, and hardly at all in touch with, any centre of English Unitarianism, and yet perhaps of an origin older than any of the English congregations; if, as one cannot but think may be the case, they are the fruit of the seed of free thought cast by the struggle of the so-called Pelagian heresy in this part of the world during the early Christian centuries. The history of that once famous contention is preserved in dusty tomes, which few but the theological student care to disturb. But it is most interesting to think that these communities of Unitarians, or as they are called here Socinians, are the spiritual descendants of those forgotten fighters against conventional belief and early assessors of man's right and obligation to think in religious matters for himself.

The service on this particular day will be always remembered by everyone who had the privilege of attending it. It cannot be said we did more than express sympathy by our presence, since the proceedings were nearly all conducted in an unknown tongue to us. It was what most would call a long service; it lasted a good two and a-half hours. The Welsh are not as we are. They think it but a niggardly allowance if only one sermon is delivered at a service. On this occasion we had nearly six sermons or addresses, one long prayer, besides several beautiful hymns. Indeed, the musical part of the function was a treat to most of us. The Welsh evidently keep up their musical traditions.

Not less to be remembered than the service and the music was the warm welcome with which Miss Tagart's party was received by the leaders and elders of the congregations present, and also by those dear old ladies, and young as well as old, in their picturesque round mushroom black straw hats, who served us so liberally on our arrival to bread and meat at the long tables spread in the chapel grounds. We were touched by the kindness and hospitality of all, though we could not understand their language nor distinguish their different names, so confusing in their repetition of the same common and familiar sounds; still less could we pronounce the names of their villages, so confusing in their strangeness and, to our ignorance, uncouth sounds. This was a general church festival day in which many villages united. The scene reminded one of what one has read in Scotch and Norse stories of great gatherings of worshippers from far and near. The road was full of them. The little chapel overflowed.

As we drove home after a last cup of tea in the cool of that beautiful summer evening, I am sure we were as much thrilled with a sense of brotherhood with these remote folk as if we had understood every word of those six sermons!

In the coming weeks the Pink Party may have other opportunities of becoming further acquainted with their Welsh brethren, but no day will more stand out in memory for its unique experience and enjoyment than this Bank Holiday we spent amongst our people in the Welsh hills.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Aberdare.—"A Question for Edward VII." was the subject of an able discourse delivered at Highland-place by the Rev. H. Fisher Short on Sunday evening. For the real meaning of "King," Mr. Short went to Carlyle's "Heroes and Hero Worship." "Find me the true Konning, King, or able man, and he has a divine right over me. That we knew in some tolerable measure how to find him, and that all men were willing to acknowledge his divine right when found: this is precisely the healing which a sick world is everywhere, in these ages, seeking after." With the exception of Alfred, justly named the Great, and one or two others who followed him at a distance, the rulers of England had been tyrannical, despotic, extortionate, immoral—anything and everything except true kings. Alfred was a true king, and he succeeded so well because, not only had he the intrinsic qualities of a king, but he had besides a lofty conception of kingship. He lived solely for the good of his people. Every man who formed part of the social organism exerted some influence for good or evil. In the case of the British Empire, the ruling power was now in the hands of the people. But if the new Sovereign were a great person, though not a king, he would probably wield a greater power than any other person in the State. Why? Because, rightly or wrongly, he was an object of the mystic reverence, the religious homage, the filial devotion of millions who called themselves his subjects. This being so they had a right to ask in the words of the text, "Art thou a King?" and to tell him that the eyes of the people were upon him, that the nation could not be built up by patronising the turf, the prize-ring and the gaming-table. Righteousness alone could exalt a nation and give it stability and power. The preacher closed his sermon by reading the inspiring verses, "Art thou a King," by H. W. Hawkes.

Colwyn Bay.—The services have been conducted during the past three Sundays by the Revs. E. W. Lummis and C. J. Street. The weather, unfortunately, has not been helpful to large attendances. Notwithstanding that drawback, however, satisfactory congregations have assembled, including friends from many of the inland towns. On Sunday next the Rev. W. C. Hall, of Ashton, preaches, and will be followed on the two succeeding Sundays by the Rev. J. E. Manning, of Sheffield.

Guildford.—Our summer Sunday-school treat proved a very pleasant event, and was held in the delightful grounds at "Summersbury," through the kind invitation of Mr. and Mrs. Edwin Ellis.

Huddersfield.—Sunday week the Rev. W. Mellor preached on "The Education Bill: a Dishonour to the Established Church and a Peril to Religion." His discourse ably set forth the issues involved, and its conclusion was as follows:—The Education Bill must be resolutely opposed. As citizens, they must hold to the all-inclusive principle, in education, as in all else, that wherever there was public expenditure there must be equal public control; and as Nonconformists, while they allowed all such religious education as they were all agreed on in the National Schools, they must insist impartially on the impartial principle that all denominational education must both be given and paid for by the denominations themselves. National education, in a word, must be national, not sectional, and least of all sectarian. National education must not only be fully paid for out of the national funds, but fully managed by the national representatives. Only thus could they ever become one nation and one people, well educated in themselves, perfectly just in their mutual dealings, and truly devout and obedient towards the God and Father of all. The Huddersfield Examiner, which gave a good report of the sermon, said:—"In the heat of the battle and in all the glow of anticipation, the supporters of the Government Education Bill imagine that they are doing great things for their religion, and as they deem theirs the only true form of the only true religion, they are serving the cause of true religion in the land. History and experience alike show that these imaginings are in vain, and that whilst education will be a great loser, religion will not gain. As Mr. Mellor well said, dishonourable action of all kinds, especially on the part of a Church, is utterly alien to religion as well as perilous to it; and to do dishonourable deeds in the name of religion, so far from lessening the evil, only makes the wrong hypocritical as well as vicious."

Hull.—After a long period of waiting the congregation at Park-street will shortly welcome their recently-appointed minister, the Rev. F. Heming Vaughan, B.A., who will commence his ministry here early in September. An induction service, followed by a tea and a welcome meeting, will be held on Sept. 9, when it is expected that the following ministers will be present:—The Rev. Dr. Drummond, the Rev. C. B. Upton, B.A., the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, B.A., the Rev. Alexander Gordon, M.A., the Rev. J. Wain, the Rev. Charles Hargrove, M.A., the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, M.A., the Rev. A. Chalmers, and the Rev. Ottwell Binns. The acknowledgments of the congregation are due and are hereby tendered to the visiting ministers who have rendered such efficient assistance during the past months, and especially to the Rev. J. W. Freckelton and the Rev. Alexander Farquharson for services which have extended over many weeks.

Ilminster.—The members of the congregation have presented a gold watch and a pair of candlesticks as a wedding gift to Miss Mary Wheadon, in token of esteem and as a mark of appreciation of her untiring labours in connection with the Old Meeting Chapel and school. The Sunday-school children also presented her with an ornamental table inkstand. Miss Wheadon has rendered invaluable help in many ways. As voluntary organist of the chapel and of the school, as a teacher, as a manager and superintendent of the sewing classes, as collector and visitor of the Sick Visiting Society, as organiser of social gatherings, she has been a faithful and cheerful worker, and her loss will be deeply felt. At the wedding on the 5th the chapel, which had been beautifully decorated, was crowded with her friends. The children of the Sunday-school lined the pathway beneath the old trees and scattered flowers.

King's Lynn.—The scholars had their annual outing on Tuesday, Aug. 5, when a visit was made to Hunstanton. The weather being most favourable, the party, numbering about forty, passed a very pleasant afternoon. The outing was under the superintendence of the minister, the Rev. J. Pollard, who was ably assisted by Miss Mackey, Miss Clift, and Miss Bigge.

London: Bermondsey.—The Rev. Eustace Thompson will begin his ministery here tomorrow, Aug. 17. The friends who kindly contributed to the expenses of the Band of Hope excursion may be interested to hear that another successful trip was recently made to Southend. Although the weather was not entirely favourable, all present had a thoroughly enjoyable day, nearly ten hours being spent by the sea. The hon. sec. and superintendent, Mr. A. W. Harris, was in charge of the party, and valuable assistance was rendered by the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, Mr. H. Titford, Mrs. R. Whitmore Cox, Miss Cantrell, and several parents and friends. The ordinary meetings are being continued through the summer, with very satisfactory attendances.

London: Stamford-street.—Summer flower services were held on the 27th ult., when the Rev. Frederic Allen preached morning and evening, and Mr. H. G. Chancellor (of Highgate) addressed the scholars in the afternoon. All three services were well attended, and appropriate music was heartily rendered. The Band of Hope and Mercy had their annual excursion on the 30th ult., when four excellent brakes conveyed the party (including several members of the Mothers' Meeting) to Forest Lodge, near Waltham Abbey, a delightful country retreat. The weather being propitious, and catering very satisfactory, everyone had a happy day. The arrangements were in charge of the superintendent, Mr. A. W. Harris, and the Rev. Frederic Allen and Mr. A. H. Biggs were also present. The officers tender sincere thanks to the friends who generously provided the somewhat heavy expense of this outing. The 1st London Company of the Boys' Own Brigade spent the first week of the present month in camp at Cannon Farm, Burgh Heath, Mr. Templeton having again kindly placed accommodation at their disposal. The captain, Mr. F. Edwin Allen, and the lieutenant, Mr. W. H. Ballantyne, were in charge. Visits were paid by many friends during the week, and on Wednesday, the special "Visitors' Day," the Rev. Frederic Allen, on behalf of the company, presented to the founder and late captain, Mr. J. C. Ballantyne, a handsome stationery cabinet. On Thursday various sports were held, Mr. A. H. Biggs acting as judge, and prizes being distributed by Mr. A. W. Harris. On Sunday morning service was conducted in camp by Mr. McNair, of Sutton.

Oxford: Church of the Divine Love.—The Sunday-school treat took place on Wednesday, Aug. 6. In spite of one very heavy rainstorm, a most successful and enjoyable afternoon was spent. Though some stayed away on account of the weather, sixty-two children and ten adults sat down to tea. Much of the success was due to the kind hospitality of Mr. Miles, of Littlemore, at whose farm the treat was held.

Parkstone.—The services held at Emerson Hall continue to attract fair congregations, notwithstanding the weather and the distance many have to come. At the afternoon meeting on Sunday last, Mr. Bushrod spoke upon the value of personal example in total abstinence, and at the close one pledge was taken. In the evening the discourse was based upon Luke x., verse 29, "Who is my Neighbour?" The service was an especially inspiring one, the singing being heartily taken up by the congregation. The Mayor of Poole (Mr. Councillor C. Carter) was present at the evening service.

South Shields.—The Rev. T. Paxton referred to the case of Dr. Agar Beet last Sunday evening, lamenting the barriers that are erected in the path of the religious inquirer, and commending a resolute courage in the search for truth. There was a good attendance. On Sunday, Aug. 3, very successful flower services were held in the church. The attendances were good, and appropriate discourses were delivered by Mr. John Glendining, of Byker. On Wednesday, Aug. 6, the annual excursion of the Sunday scholars took place to Dawdon Dene. There was a good turn-out of scholars and friends, but unfortunately the trip was marred by rain.

Sunderland.—The Sunday-school excursion was arranged for the afternoon of Wednesday, Aug. 6, the place intended to be visited being Dawdon Dene. When the time came for starting, however, the weather was so unfavourable that the trip was abandoned. Instead the children were entertained to tea in the chapel, and various pastimes and diversions arranged for them. Altogether a very pleasant time was spent. The following, amongst others, were present:—The Rev. F. and Mrs. Wood, Mr. J. G. Stirling, Mr. and Miss French, Mrs. Luckley, Miss Crist, and Miss Rutherford.

Windermere.—On Sunday morning last, the first of the summer services was held at this place, in the building known as the Institute. The congregation was small, but included several well-known Unitarians from Leeds, Liverpool, London, Bury, and Warrington, some of whom have residences in this district. The prospect of a fair measure of success is good. The Rev. W. R. Shanks, of Strangeways, Manchester, was the preacher, and he will conduct the service again on Sunday next.

THE SOUTH SHORE UNITARIAN CHURCH, BLACKPOOL,

has purchased, at a cost of nearly £600, a plot of freehold land, and they now appeal for help to erect a plain, substantial building to serve for all purposes. It is hoped to be able to do this for £1,500, making a total cost of £2,100. The land, thanks to the generosity of Mrs. John Grundy, of Summerseat; Miss S. Scholes Wrigley, of Windermere (on her own and her late mother's behalf), and Mr. R. T. Heape, of Rochdale, is entirely paid for. The Congregation have themselves promised over £300 towards the erection of the building. They carry on the Services and the Sunday School without any grant, and they feel that the remarkable success of their efforts justifies them in asking friends to help them to carry on their work under more favourable circumstances than at present. Their appeal has the full approval of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, the North and East Lancashire Mission, and the North Lancashire and Westmorland Unitarian Association; and the B. and F. U. A. has promised £25 to the Building Fund.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

WITH the utmost cordiality the three Boer generals, Botha, De Wet, and De La Rey, were welcomed last Saturday to this country. On landing at Southampton they were introduced by Lord Kitchener to Mr. Chamberlain, but the invitation to attend the naval review was declined, and they proceeded the same day to London. On Sunday, however, they went down to Southampton again, and were received by the King on his yacht in the friendliest manner, and were also presented to the Queen. On Monday evening they crossed over to Holland, but will shortly return to this country. Their presence here will lead, we must hope, to a completer understanding of the situation in South Africa, and hasten the pacification and restoration of that unhappy land.

THE result of the Sevenoaks election will not be known until after we have gone to press, but whatever the result, the contest has shown once more how keen the controversy is over the Government Education Bill. Mr. Balfour has expressed astonishment that the Bill should be represented as handing over education to clerical control, and persists in the assertion that the whole of Secular education will for the first time come "under the complete control of a popularly elected body." If the Bill is not allowed to pass, the present unsatisfactory state of affairs, he says, will continue. But that is impossible. Public attention has been too decisively called to the questions at issue, and "Voluntary schools" must now be brought into line in a system of really national education, and the complete control of a popularly elected body, of which the Prime Minister speaks, must be made a reality.

THE King has granted a Royal Charter for the incorporation of a British Academy for the Promotion of Historical, Philosophical and Philological Studies. The charter, which is dated Aug. 8, states that the Academy aims at the promotion of the study of moral and political sciences, including history, philosophy, law, politics and economics, archæology and philology. Of the original fifty-one petitioners for the charter last January, three are no longer living—viz., Lord Acton and Professors S. R. Gardiner and A. B. Davidson; the rest, with the addition of Lord Rosebery, are appointed under the charter the first Fellows. They include Mr. Balfour, Mr. John Morley, Mr. Bryce, Mr. Lecky, Sir Leslie Stephen, Sir R. J. Jebb, Lord Reay, Professors Rhys Davids, Driver, Sanday, and Salmon, Dr. A. W. Ward, Dr. Fairbairn, Dr. J. A. H. Murray, and other distinguished scholars.

ON July 12 we had to apologise to Mr P. H. Hugenholtz, of Amsterdam, for an absurd misspelling of his name in the previous number of THE INQUIRER. How it could happen again at so short an interval we cannot pretend to say, and we must not shrink from the birch; but it is Mr. Hugenholtz who is editor of the Stemmen uit de Vrije Gemeente, mentioned in our note of last week. That interesting little magazine is in its twenty-fifth year, and is issued monthly by Van Holkema and Warendorf, of Amsterdam. Among the miscellaneous notes at the end of the last number Mr. Hugenholtz has a very friendly reference to the recent sixtieth anniversary of THE INQUIRER, and translates a good part of the article "For Freedom and the Truth," which appeared in connection with that celebration in our issue of July 5.

THE Australian Herald for July reports a notable speech by Sir George Sydenham Clarke, Governor of Victoria, at a meeting of welcome to Mrs. Harrison Lee, the temperance advocate. Sir George, the Herald says, dwelt on the serious dangers to the British race arising from drink. The strength of a nation lay in its health—moral, physical, and intellectual—and anything that retarded the growth of any of these affected the development of the nation. It was true that Parliament could not make people sober; yet Parliament could do something towards lessening temptation. It could prevent the sale of drink to children, and it could prevent the sale of liquor being forced on localities for the sake of private gain. Sir George evidently favours the municipalising of public-houses, and he referred with approval to the efforts in this direction in the old world. This speech the Herald welcomes as one among many signs that public opinion with reference to the Liquor Traffic, and the folly of leaving it in private hands to breed untold misery and evil, is slowly growing; and finds encouragement in the fact that a man in so exalted a position should show such interest in social questions, proving himself alive to the real wants of the nation. And the Herald adds:—

> This is the true patriotism, and a patriotism requiring more moral courage and more patient effort than much which now passes for loyalty and love of one's country. The hope of Britain and Australia is in internal reform—the moral elevation of the people, a nobler national ideal, and the growth of men and women, not of military institutions, luxury, money, and material greatness.
> We do not undervalue the material side of life, but our Christian motto is, "Seek first the reign of God and His righteousness," not "Seek first the outward and material, and let the inward and spiritual take care of itself, or be played with as a Sunday toy."

HOLIDAY-MAKERS by the sea should send to Essex Hall for the August number of the Mill Hill Pulpit (by post 1½d.), in which the Rev. Charles Hargrove publishes a sermon on "Sea Voices." Speaking of Nature as the one great Book of God which is infallible, great and wonderful, far beyond the utmost searchings of our present knowledge, the preacher turns to the sea to ask what it has to teach us, and finds there a great emblem, figuring, though dimly, the omnipresence of God, and that which is eternal. A third lesson which he draws is of the obedience of the sea in its subservience to inviolate law.

> We speak in half-earnest metaphor of the sea, as angry, raging, cruel, treacherous, violent. But we transfer to it in so speaking the lawlessness of human passion, the moods of human changeableness. Always in all its aspects it obeys the law of its being, serves obedient the omnipresent Spirit of earth and air and sea.
> Whether its waves lap the sand, toying with the castle little children's spades have piled up to resist its flow, or whether they dash the helpless ship and break its timbers on the rocks, heedless of the crew clinging in agony of the death struggle to timbers which cannot save; whether it smiles in the summer sun alluring pleasure-seekers to try its smooth highway, or uplifts its raging billows in mountains of water—always everywhere it obeys; no flick of foam caught by the gale off the wave's crest but follows the path which the law of the worlds prescribes it. Ours only the high perilous privilege to transgress the law of our being, to do that which we should not do and to leave undone that which we should have done. "All things serve thee," as says another Psalm, all except man obeys because it can do no otherwise. Ours to obey because it is our duty and our good.

Finding also the quality of omnipotence in the sea, before which man's littleness

has to bow, Mr. Hargrove yet concludes with this deeper thought :—

Yes, omnipresent, omnipotent, obedient, indefatigable worker, this mighty sea which girds us. And yet looking over its waters I seem to grow proud even as I think upon it, and declare puny man, my own self even, the greater of the two. Though little, and of few days, and impotent to do and dare after sea-fashion, yet all this I know, and the sea knows it not.

The breath of God is upon its waters to stir and to calm, to penetrate them with life multitudinous and wonderful, but the hands of God have not fashioned it in divine image; the Spirit has not inspired it to think, to love, to worship, to inspire.

Mine the intellectual vision wider than the sea's expanse, mine the divine ambition for life not of ages but eternity, mine to know the law of my being, and by free obedience to rise ever nearer to the Creator.

O Sea, thou art wonder of God's works; O Soul of man thou art image of God himself, and through the voice of deaf seas and ripple and thunder of waves which know nothing, He Himself speaks to thee who knows and has made them all.

Last week's Jewish World, in a brief notice of Mr. Weatherall's manual on "The Books of the Old Testament," published by our Sunday School Association, says that "as a summary, the book represents faithfully the leading views of the school of Higher Criticism." Mistrusting the results of the modern critical study of the Bible, the Jewish World expresses astonishment that such a book should be published by the Sunday School Association. The point of view of this Jewish critic of the "so-called Biblical Higher Criticism" may be seen from the following description of the kind of results embodied in Mr. Weatherall's "clear and conscientious summary" :—

The late origin of the Hexateuch and its composite character; the different portions of the prophetic writings and of the Psalter; the hand R. Akiba had in the establishment of the Massoretic texts, and other similar figments which rest ultimately on theories which shift from day to day.

Similar criticism would doubtless be directed by the Jewish World against Mr. Montefiore's admirable volumes, "The Bible for Home Reading."

The same number of the Jewish World records the conclusion of Dr. Herzl's third visit to Constantinople, and the failure of the leader of the Zionist movement to obtain from the Sultan the concessions for which he had hoped, to render a Jewish settlement in a part of Palestine and elsewhere in Asia Minor, feasible. Dr. Herzl's visit, which lasted ten days, was made on the invitation of the Sultan, and he was treated with great distinction; but at the same time, while much sympathy was expressed with the Jewish people, the ultimate reply was a polite refusal of the Zionist request.

To the August number of the Unitarian World Mrs. Sydney Courtauld contributes an interesting autobiographical article, entitled "Why I Remained a Unitarian." Baptised by John Kenrick, receiving early Bible lessons from Thomas Madge, grateful also for the influence of Thomas Sadler, Mrs. Courtauld was one of those who were young in the sixties of last century, and, attending the ministry of Dr. Martineau in Little Portland-street Chapel, eagerly welcomed the new light which dawned in that period, after the publication of Darwin's "Origin of Species" and writings of Spencer, Huxley, Max Müller, and others, while John Stuart Mill was the centre of a group of philosophical Radicals in Parliament, and enthusiasm was fed by the poetry of Tennyson. Before such influences, and those of the Broad Churchmen and of Theodore Parker, Francis Newman, and Frances Power Cobbe, the conceptions of the older Unitarianism, entrenched in the "miraculous," could not stand, and the young people of that generation welcomed with delight the new earth and heaven revealed to them. Mrs. Courtauld tells of a series of doctrinal sermons, preached by Dr. Martineau at that time, which greatly to the disappointment of his hearers he declined to publish. "Round these sermons," Mrs. Courtauld says, "the opinions we had been forming at length crystallised themselves. We were not brought up to obey the ipse dixit of any man, but as we listened we assented, and rejoiced at the eloquent words and lofty spirit which justified our negations and affirmed our faith."

Not long after this a Prophet came among us, for he was a Prophet. We know now that there is nothing to preclude such in our own day. A prophet feels God speaking to him without the intervention of priest or saint, and is able to repeat the message so that his hearers acknowledge that these are the words of God. Such was Keshub Chunder Sen, whatever were his limitations. Those who met him felt the simplicity and power of his character, and when he stood up in the pulpit of Little Portland Street Chapel, and quietly pronounced his text, "Thou hast beset me behind and before," it was an experience, not quite unknown, but never before shown among us with such single-heartedness.

Personally the insight thus given into a religion apart from our Western civilisation was the seal to my conversion, and I think there were others besides myself who after that year lost the fear that we might "go too far" when we repudiated myths, or be led into what was "not safe" if we dispensed with sacraments. Above all we took courage to have no shams with our children, and to bring them up without the leading-strings by which we had been guided.

That decade of change, Mrs. Courtauld says, led many of her companions into different paths, some to the Church, Anglican or Roman, some of the most unselfish to Positivism, while others were content with the Agnosticism to which Huxley gave a name. For herself, she remained a "Unitarian."

Those who had chiefly helped me to have at length a religion and principles of my own called themselves Theists, and kept clear of "the benummying wrappers of sect." It was just there that I parted company with them, for I needed public worship, and believed in the advantage of a continuous connection with the stout Nonconformists who refused to say what they did not mean, and gave their children a chance of advancing freely in the path of reason and clear thought.

One stumbling-block Mrs. Courtauld found, because she did not wish to claim the name Christian, considering that "as a disbeliever in the Messianic prophecies" she had no right to it. That surely is a scruple which belongs to a past phase of thought, and we need not do more than echo Mrs. Courtauld's concluding words :—

It does not seem needful to discuss doctrines, since we hold above all that we have a right to differ. I worked out the problem, therefore, for myself, fortified by confidence in that great right and duty of private judgment; and knowing that the name I took bound me to nothing I did not believe, I decided that I could honestly and happily remain a Unitarian.

In a letter which is quoted in the Christian Register, the Rev. P. C. Mozoomdar says :—

The Hindu will never abandon his name and history in preference for any other name or history; but he will undoubtedly have to accept the Christian order of evolution, and put himself in line with the universal religion whose spirit comes from the West. I am convinced that the Brahmo-Somaj in India will make contributions to that spirit which Christendom must accept. What specially disconcerts me is the half-expressed contempt which Christian leaders, even of the liberal school, seem to have of the Hindu ideal and the Hindu spirituality. When I express my ardent love for Christ and Christianity, they are kindly in sympathy; but, the moment I say that Christ and his religion will have to be interpreted in India through Indian antecedents and the Indian medium of thought and emotion, I am suspected of trying to bend down Christianity with heathenism. So we must either renounce our national temperament, slow of growth, or renounce Christ and Christianity, or re-embody our faith and aspirations under a new name and form and spirit. We have taken this third course, and the responsibility rests with us to prove that this is the right course. Though I have abundant respect for the world's denominations and organisations, I feel distressed when the Brahmo-Somaj shows any disposition toward denominational finality. Can we not have the "open door" in religion as in commerce? Let there be individual "spheres of influence" according to the power and spirit of each Church. All religions are by no means the same, but the principles of religious federation must be universal and essential principles. We have no quarrel with propagandists. I have always sat at the feet of anyone who had a message to give. But we must realise and explain what as Hindus we owe to the Christian religion as well as to the religion of our own forefathers.

We may confidently say that so far as the Unitarian propaganda is concerned with India, it looks precisely in the direction of assisting the native development of religious life, and not of forcing a foreign element upon the Hindu mind.

At the recent Intermediate Examination in Arts in the University of London, of the forty-seven successful candidates placed in the first division twenty-eight are women, and among them we are glad to note the names of Dorothy Tarrant (Clapham High School), daughter of the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, B.A., of Wandsworth, and Alice M. Mellor (Huddersfield Technical College), daughter of the Rev. W. Mellor, of Huddersfield.

The Sunday School Association, Essex Hall, has just issued a handy book of Poems for Recitation suitable for Bands of Hope and Children's Evenings. There is a lamentable dearth of really good pieces for this purpose, and the compiler, "E. J. T.," must be heartily congratulated on having got together so happy a selection. The poems range from the very simple to those of a more ambitious character, but all may be commended for their good tone and interest. (Price 6d. net.)

ART AND LIFE IN VENICE.

THE recent lamentable and, it is to be feared, irreparable collapse of the great bell tower of St. Mark in Venice has drawn attention to the monuments of that swiftly-fading but still glorious old city. Probably no city has more to tell us for our encouragement and warning, and I gladly avail myself of the opportunity afforded me by the editor of THE INQUIRER to say something about it.

Venetian history began at nearly the same time as English, but with flight and shame instead of conquest. The inroad of Northern barbarism, which destroyed the Roman Empire in the fifth and sixth centuries of our era, took the English into Britain, and Huns and Longbeards into Italy; and as the Britons fled to the mountains of Wales, the Venetian tribes escaped to the mud-flats of the Adriatic. Misfortune and disgrace, however, proved a blessing. It gave the refugees independence, and set them battling with the sand and the sea. On their barren morass they made themselves a dwelling-place, became hardy fishermen and sailors, and built ships which acquired fame in the Mediterranean. In the ninth century, when generations of toilers were buried, with their stakes, in the salt sand, the island of the Rivo Alto, or Deep Stream, was chief port and centre of the colony. Trade brought stones and treasure—and saints' bodies—from the East. In the tenth century pilgrims, in the eleventh crusaders embarked at the Rialto as the nearest harbour for Jerusalem. The city flourished. Byzantine palaces, and the beautiful Byzantine church of St. Mark, rivalled the buildings of Constantinople. Though every block of stone had to be conveyed across the water, Venice became a city of stone, designed, carved, and adorned in the Byzantine manner, a city of colours, reflecting the ever changing beauty of the sky and sea, yet grave, with the seriousness of her long struggle upon her heart.

We feel this the moment we enter the famous cathedral. The tall, gaunt saints that look down upon us through the dim light from the mosaics in the roof, tell us that the men who worshipped there were an earnest, suffering race, without playfulness or frivolity, children in belief but elderly men in experience and devotion. A single stone of St. Mark's will illustrate what I mean. Outside on the north wall, visible to people in the street, is a piece of sculpture of early Byzantine workmanship, one of the oldest of the "stones of Venice." The design is purely symbolical, an effort to represent Gospel truth when writing was scarce and carving difficult. In the centre is a chair, with a cross in it; at the top of the cross is a circle; and above the circle is a Lamb. This is Christ on his throne. Right and left of the chair, facing it, are Sheep, six each side, one above another. These are the Twelve Apostles. Beyond these, on either hand, is a Palm Tree with twelve branches, and a basket of Dates at the foot. This represents the Food of Life. It is extremely simple, but it is carved with the utmost care and reverence, the work of men who valued the Good News of God.

Now let us pass to the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. In 1204, when Englishmen were thinking about Magna Carta and new designs for their cathedrals, Venice became mistress of Constantinople, and began to develop an independent genius. She gradually ceased to be Greek, and became Gothic. The Gothic spirit followed the Friars to Venice as to other cities. In 1234 the Dominicans began their great church of Saints John and Paul, and in 1250 the Franciscans their yet finer church of Santa Maria Gloriosa—both Gothic edifices. In 1301 a portion of the Byzantine Palace of the Doge (or Duke) was rebuilt in the Gothic style, and it gave such pleasure that from time to time other parts were reconstructed in the same manner. Gothic buildings of all kinds, from palaces to cottages, sprang up through the city, and made her far more beautiful than before. How beautiful she was, we moderns cannot realise. The cities we build now are so dull and ugly that we are unable to imagine her loveliness. This period lasted for about two hundred years, until, say, 1425, when Venice had reached the height of her greatness. I will try to describe two sculptures illustrative of the opening and the close of the epoch.

Take a bit of the carving on the central doorway of St. Mark's. The doorway itself is Byzantine, but the sculpture has the freedom, the boldness, the life of the new spirit. There is a mass of it. I will speak only of that portion on the inner side of the second archivolt. In the centre, the keystone, immediately above our heads, is a figure of Christ, as Creator and Ruler of the world, surrounded by the heavenly bodies which give light to men and are for signs and seasons. To the right and left, in the half circle, are the twelve months with their occupations. January brings home a log on his shoulders, February warms his hands and feet at a fire, March goes forth to battle—the wind blowing the hair from his face, April carries a sheep, May is crowned with roses, June reaps, July mows, August sits sleeping in his chair after honest toil—the Virgin blessing him with the promise of plenty, September has a basket of grapes on his back, October digs, November catches wild birds, December kills swine. The work is vigorous and delightful, doing honour to labour, and speaking, as books cannot speak, to the poor. The peasants who came to Venice to sell their country produce, saw here, as they entered the church, the Will of God in their daily work of making the earth fruitful; and the humblest dwellers of the city, on their way to and from prayer, were reminded of the sweet and wholesome things of the fields. Good Gothic art, in stone or fresco, takes us among the works of God. In this sculpture alone we see trees and foliage, birds, fruit, corn, grass, flowers, sheep, pigs, fish, and objects of the seashore familiar to men who tilled the Venetian islands.

A few yards away is a late Gothic work. It is on the Doge's Palace, on the last-built corner by the main entrance, to remind those who went in and out of the divinity of Justice. Venice was then famous for her rectitude. The Doge was the embodiment of honesty in the eyes of the citizens and of the foreign merchants. At the corner of this palace, therefore, where the Doge lived and tried cases, and where his Council met to legislate, the Gothic architect — for architect and sculptor were then one—told, with a better tool than a pen, the story of the Judgment of Solomon. The passer-by sees the great king bidding the child be cut in two, and the agony of the mother as she pleads for its safety. He sees also that the figures are enfolded by a tree and its leaves, that above them in a niche stands the Archangel Gabriel, and that the capital of the pillar beneath them is decorated with the heads of famous men of justice—Moses, Solon, Scipio, and Trajan.

But in this work, done about the year 1425, we see some signs of a change. Venice grew rich and learned, and tended to unbelief. The old missionary energy of the Friars was dead. The dogmas of the Church became stumbling-blocks to men who read the Greek and Latin authors. Educated people began to take as much pleasure in Homer and Plato and Cicero as in the doctrines of the Church. In the absence of any new presentation of Christian truth the upper circles were gradually heathenised. A new art arose, known as that of the "Renaissance," which was not native and original, nor from the hearts and homes of the people, but borrowed and learned. Senators and ecclesiastics, in the desire for something new, resuscitated the ancient classical art of Greece and Rome, which had long succumbed to the nobler styles of Christendom. It was at first an experiment, then a fad, lastly a fashion, which corresponded with the sceptical, luxurious, dilettante temper of the age. It was passive, cold, exclusive, unbending. It was, as Mr. Ruskin says, full of insult to the poor, and unfitted for wood and brick and rough stone, unsuitable for cottages, appealing in no way to the feeling of the multitude, devoid of any soft touch of nature or of humanity—an art for lordly halls, grand staircases, luxurious terraces, guarded by and associated with servile dependents and menials.

To this period belongs the tomb, so eloquently described by Mr. Ruskin, in the Dominican Church of Saints John and Paul. The church itself, as I have said, is Gothic, erected by the old Friars, Christian, simple, friendly in its beauty, a constant invitation to all. But the monument is Renaissance work—a proud and gorgeous piece of marble, celebrating the virtues of a bad doge, Andrea Vendramin. He died in 1478, after a reign of two years, "the most disastrous in the annals of Venice," years of "a pestilence which followed the ravages of the Turks carried to the shores of the lagoons." He "died, leaving Venice disgraced by sea and land." Yet to him was raised this grand tomb, "the most costly ever bestowed on her monarchs." It is a great piece of expensive upholstery, finely worked but without feeling, a collection of Virtues semi-clad like pagan goddesses, dolphins with boys upon their backs, dragons and other senseless ornamentation that would excite no response from the ordinary beholder. Worse is the effigy of the doge himself. The man who cut it knew how to use his tools, but he had no soul for his subject. He only carved the effigy on one side. That side facing the spectator, from head to foot, is skilfully and carefully done; but the part that is not seen is left a block. Let Mr. Ruskin speak of it in his passionate indignation: "Who with a heart in his breast could have stayed his hand as he drew the dim lines of the old man's countenance—unmajestic once indeed, but at least sanctified by the solemnities of death—could have stayed his hand as he reached the bend of the grey forehead and measured out the last veins of it at so much a zecchin? . . . This lying monument to a dishonoured doge, this culminating pride of the Renaissance art of Venice, is at least veracious, if in nothing else, in its testimony to the character of the sculptor. He was banished from Venice for forgery in 1487."

Later, in the same style, is the church, or rather the church front, for it is little else, of Saint Moses. As it was near the hotel I stayed at I saw it almost every day I was in Venice. Indeed, it was difficult not to see it. It has that showy appearance which attracts attention. In every feature it says "Look at me." And when you look at it you see that it was built for show and nothing else. It is a mass of flourishes and foolish adornment, of pillars and arches that bear no weight, figures without religious association, trophies of Roman warfare or the circus. Above the central doorway, in place of the usual Madonna, is a bust of the gentleman at whose expense or in whose honour the building was erected. And as if to emphasise this atheism an inscription, with a pun in it, records that the honoured Vincenzo Fini "fills all height with his goodness"!

No wonder that Venice fell, that with this loss of faith and character she lost her place among the nations and ceased to be Queen of the Sea, that her shallow magnificence, with the accompaniment of jaded tastes and blunted faculties, led to coarseness and sensuality. Roger Ascham, writing when Shakespeare was a child, says: "Italy is not that Italy that it was wont to be, and therefore now not so fit a place as some do count it for young men to fetch either honesty or wisdom from. I was once in Italy myself, but, I thank God my abode there was but nine days; and yet I saw in that little time in one city"—in Venice—"more liberty to sin than ever I heard tell of in London in nine years." But Venice descended to lower depths. Worse than her licentiousness was her cynicism—which also, as Mr. Ruskin points out, is unmistakable in her architecture. In the Jewish quarter, over the Cannareggio, is a stone bridge of very late Renaissance workmanship. The arch is an unshapely one. On each side, of it ten heads look down upon the water—faces distorted with folly, leering with foul grimaces, devoid of sense or shame. In those countenances may be seen what the Venetians in their degradation cared to laugh at as they glided beneath in their gondolas.

And what is Venice now at the beginning of the twentieth century? The Grand Canal, in one of its most public spots, is spanned by a miserable iron suspension-bridge; the canal below is gradually becoming a ditch; the small steamers that ply on its surface leave a dark trail of sewerage, dead rats, and garbage; Gothic windows, still a marvel of beauty notwithstanding their decay, half hidden by clothes lines, admit a feeble light through their dirty glass to crowded tenements; and the glorious Campanile, a building inspired by God, the embodiment of the faith of a bygone age, a tower that has called a city to its prayers or to its arms for nine centuries, and might, if it had not been neglected and defiled, have stood for centuries more, has come crashing to the ground!

It is painful enough to make one cry out. Yet almost as distressing is the blindness of our modern commercial life to these lessons. In England and in Germany here, where I write, men are accumulating money that they do not know how to spend, and are loading the earth every day with masses of costly trumpery whose durability will only the longer demonstrate our love of show and desire to "scrape the skies."

LITERATURE.

FRIENDSHIP.*

THIS is a beautiful book. It is beautiful, alike in form and in spirit. It is a pleasure to see, to hold in one's hand, to turn the pages of a volume such as this. Bound in light brown cloth; printed on stout paper, with wide margins, side notes and large initial capitals in red, quotations indicated by smaller initial capitals, in black. Would that all books, having something noble and wise to record, could come to us equipped thus, with such simple, tasteful, and loving care! And there is much that is noble and wise recorded here.

"Friendship," said Aristotle, "is a thing most necessary to life, since no one would chose to live without friends, though he should have all the other good things in the world." And when one has read this book one rejoices to think how many human beings have known the truth of that great saying. For here are selections from the long record of human friendship, from the day when Jonathan fell in love with the young shepherd, David, to the age which gave us "In Memoriam," and Walt Whitman's dream of a "city invincible to the attacks of the whole of the rest of the earth . . . the new city of Friends." After reading this volume through, one naturally turned to the 8th and 9th Books of the "Ethics," in which Aristotle has given us his great calm thoughts on Friendship, wondering at first that Mr. Carpenter had made no reference to those chapters here. But on looking through the pages of that ancient treatise again, it no longer seemed strange that to quote therefrom had not occurred to him. For that is a dissertation on friendship, while this book is rather a dramatic presentation of the power and beauty of friendship in many ages of time and among many races of men. Beginning with the customs of savage tribes (surely not altogether "savage," being capable of such sweet grace of loving!), Mr. Carpenter gives examples of wondrous friendships prevailing among Greek and Roman, African and Asiatic peoples, and on through Early Christian, Mediæval, and Rennaisance periods down to modern times. The ceremonies, legends, histories, poetry and philosophy relating to friendship are brought before us in a series of short, well-chosen citations, and the part which this great emotion of the human soul has played in the history of mankind is made to live before the reader with vivid and impressive power.

It is good to read of customs among tribes of Central Africa and the islands of the Pacific which show that from remote periods of time friendship has played a vital part in their social and individual life. Among the wild and warlike tribes north of the Danube, too, Roman invaders found the spirit of comradeship existing in great strength. But it is, of course, when we come to the legends and annals of ancient Greece that the charm of human friendship, in its reality or its romance, finds full expression. The author of "Ioläus" quotes from J. A. Symonds concerning this:—"Greek mythology and history are full of tales of friendship which can be paralleled only by the story of David and Jonathan in the Bible. The legends of Herakles and Hylas, of Theseus and Peirithous, of Apollo and Hyacinth, of Orestes and Pylades, occur immediately to the mind. Among the noblest patriots, tyrannicides, law-givers, and self-devoted heroes in the early times of Greece we always find the names of friends and comrades received with peculiar honour." Plato's great saying, "Tyrants stand in awe of friends," finds abundant illustration in this book. Sparta's great military power is shown to have depended largely on her genius for maintaining the spirit of "fraternity in arms"—lovers, fighting side by side, proving so often invincible against their country's foes. And it is peculiarly interesting to learn that some of the old Doric customs of comradeship still flourish in modern Crete and Albania, closely entwined with the whole life of the people, though apart from any military significance now.

The story of the famous Theban Band—"the sacred band of 300 chosen men," wholly composed of mutual lovers—is told by quotations from Plutarch, Athenæus, and others. When we remember that this band was never defeated in battle till the Macedonian phalanx destroyed it at Chaeronea, every man there dying by his brother's side—and that with their extinction the last stronghold of Greek freedom was destroyed, we realise in some degree the nobility and strength of friendship as it prevailed in the emotional and practical life of ancient days. "Love," said Plutarch, "is the only invincible general."

In his chapter on "The Place of Friendship in Greek Life and Thought" Edward Carpenter shows how far-reaching was the influence of this passion on their political and individual life, and how it enriched their literature and art. He thinks that modern critics have largely missed the significance of this. One passage must be quoted for the clearness with which it brings out the difference between Greek ideas and our own in relation to the motive forces of love, and the hope it expresses of a final blending of these in the richer life of days to be.

Nothing is more surprising to the modern than to find Plato speaking, page after page, of Love as the safeguard of States and the tutoress of philosophy, and then to discover that what we call love, i.e., love between man and woman, is not meant at all—scarcely comes within his consideration—but only the love between men, what we should call romantic friendship. His ideal of this latter love is ascetic; it is an absorbing passion, but it is held in strong control. The other love, the love of women, is for him a mere sensuality. In this, to some extent, lies the explanation of his philosophical position. But it is evident that in this fact, in the fact that among the Greeks the love of women was considered for the most part sensual, while the romance of love went to the account of friendship, we have the strength and the weakness of

* "Ioläus: an Anthology of Friendship." Edited by Edward Carpenter. Swan Sonnenschein and Co. 5s. nett.

Greek civilisation. Strength, because by the recognition everywhere of romantic comradeship, public and private life was filled by a kind of divine fire; weakness, because by the non-recognition of woman's equal part in such comradeship, her saving, healing, and redeeming influence was lost, and the Greek culture doomed to be to that extent one-sided. It will, we may hope, be the great triumph of the modern love (when it becomes more of a true comradeship between man and woman than it yet is) to give both to society and to the individual the grandest inspiration, and, perhaps in conjunction with the other attachment, to lift the modern nations to a higher level of political and artistic advancement than even the Greeks attained (pp. 42, 43).

This is followed by passages from the "Symposium," and the "Phædrus" of Plato, the "Eroticus" of Plutarch, and from the Greek poets from Homer to Theocritus. Reading these, one feels how profoundly this comrade-love had inspired the Greek writers, and how deep was the influence, how lofty the ideal of friendship among that wonderful people.

The chapter on "Friendship in Early Christian and Mediæval Times" is hardly less attractive. We come into a new world, and the old affections suffer shock.

Woman rose to greater freedom and dignity and influence than before. The romance of love began to centre round her. The days of chivalry brought a new devotion into the world, and the Church exalted the Virgin Mother to the highest place in heaven. Friendship between men ceased to be regarded in the old light—i.e., as a thing of deep feeling and an important social institution. It was even, here and there, looked on with disfavour (p. 97).

Yet it survives, becoming "a more private and personal affair," aided, in great degree, by the monastic system; and very delightful are some of the examples given us in illustration of this. St. Augustine, St. Bernard, and St. Anselm have witnessed to the strength and ardour of their affection in words charged with intense and passionate feeling. These confessions of the saints to the influence of genuine human love give a touch of beautiful romance to the somewhat austere religious faith with which we are accustomed to associate their names. The story which follows of Amis and Amile, "the David and Jonathan, the Orestes and Pylades, of the mediæval world," is truly, as Mr. Carpenter says, "very quaint and engaging in its old-world extravagance and supernaturalism."

It is with great interest that one perceives how Plato's idea of two human souls becoming one in friendship prevails through the following centuries. The lover loses and finds himself again in the beloved; the limitations of personality are transcended; the unity of life with life becomes complete, and the wild extravagance of the metaphor of Aristophanes in the "Symposium" is almost condoned by the wonderful harmony of thought and feeling to which friendship has sometimes attained. It is Augustine who writes, when the youth he had loved so much was dead, "Well said a certain one of his friends, 'Thou half of my soul,' for I felt that his soul and mine were 'one soul in two bodies': and therefore life was to me horrible, because I hated to live as half of a life; and therefore perhaps I feared to die lest he should wholly die whom I had loved so greatly."

A chapter on "The Renaissance and Modern Times" concludes this interesting book; and we are left with the music of cantos from Tennyson's "In Memoriam," and the long roll of Whitman's lines in praise of "the institution of the dear love of comrades" sounding in our ears.

Appreciation and gratitude, rather than criticism, this little volume has seemed to claim. It were possible to murmur at the omission of some favourite pieces on friendship. One looked for the lines in Lycidas, beginning

For we were nurs'd upon the self-same hill,
Led the same flock by fountain, shade, or rill. . . .

One might wish too for more of Thoreau and Emerson. The statement that "Plato himself may almost be said to have founded his philosophy on this sentiment" (of friendship) is surely open to question. The love of friends is with him rather a means than an end—a step towards that love of the ideal and eternal beauty, the vision of which is, for him, the end and the perfecting of life.

But these things are matters of opinion, and do not affect the real purpose of the book. That purpose, though not stated in words, is very clear. Readers of the author's "Towards Democracy" and "England's Ideal" will know how great is his faith in the people, how wide his love for that common humanity of which everyone has share, and which is deeper and more significant than all the differences of character and distinctions of class that now divide us; and this love of the race, of the average man, is to find its counterpart and, if need be, its corrective, in a revival of the ideal of friendship. The broad diffusive sympathy for all sorts and conditions of men must be balanced and perfected by the intimate and intense "love of comrades." Whitman, as Edward Carpenter points out, stands for this twofold affection, and therein lies so much of his greatness and significance.

I say Democracy infers such loving comradeship, as its most inevitable twin or counterpart, without which it will be incomplete, vain and incapable of perpetuating itself.

So Whitman sums up the meaning of his message, of which, in truth, his own life is a noble illustration and example. The moral enthusiasm of the soul must be kindled by a love of humanity—"love for the human creature's self," as Wordsworth baldly and prosaically puts it. But the grace and sweetness, the depth and intensity of the life of the spirit will be wanting without friendship. And Emerson's lines will hardly be accused of extravagance by those who have known the fuller meaning, the loftier inspiration of that:

O friend, my bosom said,
Through thee alone the sky is arched,
Through thee the rose is red;
All things through thee take nobler form,
And look beyond the earth,
And is the mill-round of our fate
A sun-path in thy worth.
Me too thy nobleness has taught
To master my despair;
The fountains of our hidden life
Are through thy friendship fair.

The controversies concerning Savonarola's place in history have in large measure subsided, yet the life story out of which they sprang possesses a singular fascination still, owing partly to its dramatic surprises and the picturesque impressiveness of its outstanding incidents, and partly also to the momentous character of the movements and changes that marked the period to which it belonged.

Thus writes Dr. M'Hardy in his preface, and those who are familiar with the history of the great Florentine reformer will probably agree with this opinion, and will appreciate in the book before us the touches of local colouring and picturesque descriptions to be found on many of its pages. Another point to be noticed is the breadth of treatment which the subject has received, which spares us the inordinate hero-worship and one-sided view of character which are apt at times to colour biographical writing.

To form a background for the picture he is about to draw, the author gives us an introductory sketch of the age in which Savonarola lived, and this is a most interesting part of the book, and specially worthy of attention. We are transplanted to Florence in the age of Lorenzo de Medici, and the fascinating story of the Renaissance movement and of the influence of the new learning on the cultured inhabitants is told with discrimination—the shadows as well as the sunshine being depicted.

It is a question whether we are not, some of us, apt, in our backward glances, to gild past epochs of history. For example, in the glamour which the rebirth of learning cast over Florence we see clearly the advantage attendant on the breaking of the fetters of scholasticism and the awakening spirit of intellectual liberty, but do we always take into consideration all the characteristics of what Dr. M'Hardy terms the "Humanist factor" in the Renaissance? The following quotation from his book is to the point.

The tendency of such a movement was rationalistic and sceptical. It generated a critical and inquiring temper, a disposition to question the grounds of established laws, traditions and beliefs, but it led to no active crusade, no strenuous struggle to rectify the errors and evils of the world. The humanists were not heroic reformers. They were content with the mental emancipation their studies gave them. Amid all their scholarly industry they sought only their own culture, and recognised no mission higher than to make life as pleasant for themselves as they could, and leave the world to go as it pleased. It was therefore a thoroughly secular spirit which lay at the heart of the movement. It sapped reverence, high seriousness, self-restraint. It fostered a taste for what was graceful, beautiful, intellectually or artistically refined; yet it left the mind destitute of any grand or noble aims, and exposed it to the insidious allurements of earthly ease, luxury, self-indulgence, and in many cases sensual gratification. Hence the widespread disregard of the common principles of morality which was too patent an accompaniment of the Renaissance. The standard of conduct was pagan, not Christian.

Thus, the well-known story of the youth of Savonarola is presented in its right setting. If the reader would have been otherwise unfamiliar with the state of Florence in the latter half of the fifteenth century he cannot fail, as he follows the narrative, to appreciate the fact that the love of power and wealth among the nobles and the sordid life of the people combined to produce a tide of evil which neither the Renaissance movement nor the Church of Rome could stem, and to see how circumstances led Savonarola to grow up with a high moral ideal and a longing to influence men around him in the direction of practical Christian morality. The whole story of the life is attractively written. Details are not left to be filled up by the student's memory. All the chief events are woven into the web of the story and in chronological order, and the short but picturesque account is all-sufficient for the purpose.

In an early chapter we enter upon Savonarola's life in the Convent of San Marco in Florence. It is only to be expected that at the opening of the ways, when the youth made choice of a religious life, the culture of his early years and all his past interests and associations should lead him to join the Dominican rather than the Franciscan Brotherhood, and it was a congenial occupation to lecture to the novices of the convent and rouse their enthusiasm in the topics which were so dear to his own mind. It is well known that as a preacher, in the early days in Florence, he possessed no power. By some biographers a letter is quoted in which he laments, "My preaching disgusts everyone, I cannot move so much as a chicken"; and in a chapter on his mission some of the causes are detailed which led to the development of that marvellous power of oratory by which in the course of time he was able to sway the excitable people who flocked to hear his sermons in the Cathedral of Florence. Stress is laid on the power which came to him through his prophetic instinct concerning the disasters threatening the Church and through his growing consciousness of a call to waken the slumbering consciences around him. Perhaps something was also due to his four years of wandering missionary life spent in great measure among simple-minded hill peasants. To them plain-spoken, earnest words were acceptable from the preacher who had not been able in his inexperience to touch the souls of the citizens of Florence, whose favourite preacher was the rhetorical Mariano. Amid the vivid pictures drawn of the stern patriot priest thundering denunciations and threats from the pulpit, the gentler side of Savonarola's character is not neglected. His sympathy for the sorrow-laden men and women who sought his counsel is noted, and his marvellous influence over the young—recalling to one's memory the saying recorded of him in other histories, "You must let me talk to my children if you would have me preach well."

As Prior of San Marco, furnished in 1493 with a Papal Brief that freed him from all ecclesiastical authority except that of the head of the Church in Rome, Savonarola entered upon the work of reform and reorganisation of the Convent, and a few pages are devoted to a description of the rigorous, self-denying rule he laid upon himself and the Brethren, while at the same time he encouraged among the latter the cultivation of the fine arts and the study of Oriental languages, showing how the spirit of the Renaissance had laid its hold upon him; but the "New Learning" was tinctured in his case with the spirit of moral and religious reform. In Chap. X., entitled "Amid the Throes of Revolution," we enter upon the exciting time in Italy when freedom and unity were crushed by tyrants and strong Northern nations, "Barbarians," were threatening to overwhelm the land. Then follows the history of the treachery of Piero, the worthless son of Lorenzo de Medici, the intrigues of Charles VIII. of France and Pope Alexander VI., and of the restoration of the Republic in Florence by a revolution which, thanks to the wisdom and influence of Savonarola, was bloodless. It is very plainly shown how the Prior was forced by circumstances to step into the arena of politics. While busying himself in calming the popular unrest and relieving distress, his sermons in the Cathedral possessed, as George Eliot says, "the interest of political bulletins." The Medici tyranny had crushed out of the citizens of Florence all power of leadership, and Savonarola was compelled, without holding any official post, to take up the rôle of head of the State and come to the front. "I was in a safe harbour," he cried, "the life of a friar, and the Lord has drawn my bark into the open sea. Before me on the ocean terrible tempests are brewing. Behind I have lost sight of my haven. The wind drives me forward, and the Lord forbids my return."

The well-chosen titles of the chapters that follow almost furnish an epitome of the life story: "The Hand of the Pope," "The Uncompromising Witness," "The Pyramid of Vanities," "Sentence of Excommunication," "The Pope Defied," "The Bursting of the Storm," and "The Tragic Close." We follow the wonderful history which these chapters graphically tell, and read how Savonarola tried to make Florence into a city of God; how the pressure of authority, when the free moral choice of the people was absent, failed at last; how factions arose and the grand dreams and ideals ended in apparent failure. It is to be wished that space could have been found in the history for more details concerning the beautiful life and personality of the faithful disciple Fra Domenico. A quotation from the concluding chapter may fitly end this notice of the book.

A particularly important factor in Savonarola's influence as an epoch-maker was the fresh arresting light he threw on the essential value for the good of the world of practical Christian morality. This, in fact, was his supreme idea which he held up and flashed on men's minds in every sermon, book or pamphlet, whether he dealt with religious, political or social themes. . . . Many of his reforming measures, as has been seen, collapsed. In the impetuousness of his zeal he fell into mistakes as to the methods and means by which the end he sought could be attained. But the great idea itself—the idea of practical righteousness, justice, purity and good-doing as the fundamental conditions of well-being in the Church and the State, in social and private life—was so strikingly presented and pressed, that it laid hold of men's inmost convictions, and gave to the moral sense of that generation a stimulus which was passed on, to stir to higher moral life the generations following.

OBITUARY.

MISS E. J. GARRETT.

It is with deep regret that we have to record the death of Miss Elizabeth Jacqueline Garrett. She died at Sidmouth on Saturday, August 16, of peritonitis, after five days' illness, at the age of forty-four.

It would be impossible to express in a public print the sense of irreparable loss and overwhelming sorrow which those who knew and loved her feel. There are many at Mansford-street Church to whom she was the dearest, truest friend on earth. There are many others who have long felt her to be one of the noblest and best of women, and who have rejoiced in her friendship as one of the great blessings of their life. But such feelings are best hidden in the heart, and must find expression in lives made better by her presence, not by many words of sorrow or of praise.

She was herself very quiet and unobtrusive, one who worked strenuously and loved deeply, but who did not say much about her work or love. There was no sense of strain, no excitement, no self-consciousness about anything she did. We hardly realise how much she did; assuredly she had no idea of it herself.

For twelve years she has been a deeply inspiring influence at Mansford-street Church and Mission. She did many other things as well, collecting rents for Miss Octavia Hill, and working upon Charity Organisation Committees. But no mere description of the work done by her can give an idea of its value. It was the spirit of love and sympathy and perfect self-forgetfulness which those who knew her will remember best. Doing good was natural to her. She never seemed busy, never in a hurry or worried, hardly ever tired. She found time for many friendships in addition to her work. In spite of her many interests she seemed always at leisure to enter into the troubles and the joys of those she loved, and to give whatever help she could. Her infirmity of deafness was never made by her a trouble to others, or a cause of complaint for herself. She participated in all the simple pleasures which were going on about her, and when it was impossible for her to join she looked on with a happy smiling face. To all whom she had helped, to all whom she loved and who loved her, she leaves a memory which will inspire them to a larger, fuller, more self-forgetful life. She leaves a hope which will only cease when it is realised in death.

A memorial service will be held at Mansford-street on Sunday evening at seven o'clock, conducted by the Rev. Henry Gow, B.A.

Envy is, perhaps, the greatest enemy of gratitude. Because some others have, or seem to have, more blessings than we, we feel aggrieved, and consider that we have no occasion of thankfulness for our smaller fortune. It is impossible that all should fare as well as the most fortunate. If our fortune is as good as the average we ought not to complain, and, even if it seems worse than the average, we may find many whose enjoyments are fewer than ours, in whose eyes we are among the favoured ones of the world.—J. W. Carney.

HEREAFTER.

"Hereafter, in a better world than this, I shall desire more love and knowledge of you."

Now and again amid the thronging streets,
As hastening through our daily round we go,
The pulse in some unwonted measure beats.

We see some face of light,
Seen and then lost to sight,
Whereat we think, "How fair a soul to know!"

Now and again, in quiet peaceful hours,
Some precious page will steal our hearts away.
The while we read, we feel life's slumbering powers.
"To touch that robe so white,
Live in that presence bright,
Why dwelt we not close to that Saint?" we say.

Now and again the tranquil waiting faces
Of aged folk whose sands are nearly run,
And gentle manhood, childhood's winning graces,
Bring wistful joy like pain.
Might we near these remain,
How different were life beneath our sun!

Or soon or late, in realms beyond the sun
Surely must come to every patient heart
The never found, the loved and lost, each one.
For man's deep yearnings give Promise that none who live
Shall fail to know all love when time is done.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

You will understand from what I wrote last week, that an ode is a poem in honour of a special occasion or a special person. And it is generally a person, for on most special occasions there is some one person to be honoured, like the King on Coronation Day. An ode is usually written not about this person but to him.

In odes we find high thoughts and deep feelings put into musical words. The poet, in a state of rapt imagination, speaks as if all Nature were alive, and as if the absent, or even the dead, could hear.

It is natural for children to pretend, in this way, to talk to the trees and flowers, to the moon and the stars, to the lost doll or the absent mother. I have heard a little girl, not yet three, talk in this way when she thought herself alone. One day as she passed a small plaster bust of Emerson, the American poet and philosopher, she looked up at the kindly face, gently touched its glass shade, and whispered: "Good morning! good morning!" Perhaps many children speak in this way, but when once grown up, only the poets and philosophers can do it naturally.

Thinking of things as if they were persons is called personification; and speaking to them as if they were alive and could hear is called apostrophe. In an ode a poet is like a child in his readiness to greet persons and things, to ask questions, to make use of interjections and exclamations, to express hopes and fears and wishes. And it may be easier, therefore, for a child than for a grown-up person to follow and enjoy the varying moods.

In his "Coronation Ode," William Watson speaks for England to England's King. He speaks without a single compliment, without any praise, but he honours the Sovereign by supposing him to care more for England than for himself. Thus whilst the poem addresses the King on the occasion of his Coronation, the main subject is England. It is in connection with England, the different parts of the British Isles, and the British Empire as a whole, that the personifications come in.

The English will best fulfil their responsibilities towards Scotland, Ireland and Wales and the further portions of the Empire by remembering the different characters and needs of the different nations. It is not by forgetting such differences that the closest union is obtained. In applying the golden rule, we are far too apt to judge for others by ourselves as to their wants and wishes. And in national, as in family matters, we must take some thought about the characters and needs of others or we cannot be just, much less considerate and generous.

I said last week that the poem is not easy. It is more difficult than if it were a story. But perhaps we may think of it as our national story, with England for heroine. With a new King we begin a new chapter, but the story is still unfinished. Its end lies in the future. A well-told story moves to its end, its climax, and a poem, too, moves in this way. This poem moves forward to the thought of England's future, and what the poet, speaking for us to-day, would wish it to be. Here, too, the picture is made more vivid by personification.

The ode is arranged in five parts, and it is interesting to see how the various subjects connected with the Coronation are distributed.

Part I. treats of the age of our nation, the growth of our kingdom since the Norman Conquest, our pride in our past history. Britannia, no longer confined in her island home, stretches one hand to Canada, the other to India, whilst the edge of her garment is bathed in the spray of the Australasian Seas.

(See extract in The Inquirer of June 28, page 408. "Time . . . fold.")

So great, so old, so proud, we bring a duteous heart to the King for his Coronation.

In Part II. the poet imagines that the King's greatest predecessors mix in the pageant and marshal him to the awful throne he has inherited.

(The Inquirer, p. 407, column 3, and p. 408, column 3.)

Part III. begins with the outward splendours of the occasion. The Coronation takes place in the summer season, when nature is at her brightest. Why should not we too be gay in colour? So all the land is ablaze with decorations. In London brilliant robes are worn, and from window and balcony the flags wave welcome. The time comes for the procession itself.

Now the long glories prance and triumph by.
And now the pomps have passed, and we depart,
Each to the peace or strife of his own heart.

These three lines, in the very centre of the central part, are like a change of key in musis. The pomps of ceremony are over, but the beauties of nature remain. As the hours of the momentous day pass by, we see the mysteries of twilight along the Thames, sunset on the Welsh mountains, and the last light of evening fading over St. George's Channel and the Irish Sea. But even amidst the peace of twilight and sunset there are suggestions of strife. The river flowing eastward, "down leagues of hope and fear, and pride and shame, and life and death," suggests the struggling life in our great cities. Nor is the strife yet over between invading Teuton and retreating Celt. There has been much waving of our Union Jack, much display of the rose beside the shamrock. But there is still unrest at the heart of Ireland, a deeper loneliness than that due to mere insular position. She is the lovely and the lonely bride

Whom we have wedded but have never won.

After the high noon, twilight, and sunset of Part III., Part IV. opens with nightfall on our island on Coronation Day, and the complete darkness that has come upon older kingdoms in Great Britain. Scotland, and Wales retain their names, their nationalities. But England, Scotland, and Wales have themselves, in the remote past, absorbed "Kingdoms and thrones forgotten of the sky." We who stand established on the dust of the past may well beware. The Roman Empire, and others long ago, have fallen to pieces—empires that had grown like ours, "dominion fold in fold." Part V. begins with exclamations of fear lest such a doom be ours, and of hope that England may escape such a fate.

Mr. Watson urges education for the people. Let the workers, whose life is such a dreary round of drudgery, have knowledge of our history, knowledge of our literature. Let them be shown

Whence glories come, and wherefore glories go,
And what indeed are glories.

"Already is doom a-spinning" if we are too self-satisfied, too content with what has been already done, too ready to jog along old pathways, to keep in the old grooves. Let England be up and doing, alert, up to date, if she would keep her place amongst the nations.

But the poet's wish for England goes far beyond mere outward worldly success in the race of life. She must not "yield up yet the generous dreams," the high ideals, but, ever pressing forward, turn her dreams into realities.

Let England use her power as a responsibility, as an opportunity for bettering the lot of those over whom she rules. Mere power wins salutes of hand and head only. Let England "live to be saluted in the hearts of men," as one who is fulfilling a high destiny.

Let her be saluted as one "who, greatly loving freedom," loves to grant freedom to others; as one in whom we see united strength and the gentleness that overcomes when strength alone would fail.

(See The Inquirer, p. 409. "Nor must she . . . grace.")

May our England live to be thus honoured, thus "throned and crowned" in the hearts of all her children!

SUMMER REST.

LESS than thirty miles from the heart of London one can find many quiet places of rest amid country scenes of perfect beauty, where no echo of the city's turmoil, no breath of its dusty, jaded air, can penetrate. Here, amid green pastures, in quiet lanes, on the wooded hill-side, on the open common or the upland height, where there are great spaces and distant views over the rich plain to the hills beyond, one can put one's armour off and unbend from the stress of difficult duty. The children are making holiday and one can be a child again, while at the same time drinking in that deeper delight in the quietness and beauty, which are among the divinest gifts of our maturer life.

The hardest battle of life for most of us nowadays is in the city. There are the darkest shadows of our existence and the ugliest things, side by side with its greatest splendour and its noblest achievements, the strong endeavour of its earnest purpose and the great mass of its honest work. There, for the most part, we have our place of habitual duty and of work for daily bread, and have to take our part in the endeavour to make the common life of a great community, hemmed in by many artificial bonds, as natural and wholesome as may be, to preserve or to restore to the crowded millions all that is possible of the clear skies, the fresh air and pure water, which should be their natural inheritance—not forgetting decent house-room—and not these alone, but something also of the beauty that there may still be in city parks and gardens, in great avenues, where trees can grow and the sky can be seen, and along the banks of a noble river.

To these outward things the true helpers aim to add the greater wealth of the interior life, such as knowledge and the manifold interests of the world provide, and the riches of art, whether pictured or sculptured, or in the infinite delight of music and poetry, and these, blended with all true human sympathies, in happy social intercourse and the fellowship of earnest religious life.

Yet in the city all this is not without the burden of care and the exhaustion which demands its summer rest; and for this, even where the conflict and the strain do not deepen into tragedy, thank GOD that the country is not far away!

It is the great quietness that is so restful, in the fresh, pure air, the silent order, so wonderful in its manifold complexity, wrought into beauty on every side, and yet with a resultant sense of the Divine simplicity of life. Surely it is Infinite Power in which we rest with complete abandonment and happy trust, because He doeth all things well. And we are no longer afraid even of the terrors of the Lord in His mighty works, the terrible things of His providence, because here in the quiet places of His world we learn to know what is at the heart of life. Our delight in perfect beauty, so marvellous in the humblest wayside flower as in the glory of the heavens, so pure and uplifting in its influence, bids us be no longer of a doubtful mind, but trust the vision with a full assurance of faith, for such a world,

> Despite of all that seems at strife,
> With blessing, all with curses rife, can only come out of the heart of Infinite Love.

Such refreshment and rest for tired mind and body, with restoration of exhausted energies and renewal of faith, may be found with great thankfulness in any quiet country place, where Nature has her way and the skies are clear, and paths lead through the meadows, and the flowers are free to bloom. This England of ours, in spite of its huge cities and its Black Country and other tracts of land as well deserving of the name, is wonderfully rich in natural beauty, and no one has very far to go to find that best medicine which Nature has to give in summer rest. But while the Home Counties are among the happiest in that respect, one may be thankful for a wider choice, and among the mountains, especially of the North Country, there are treasures not to be found elsewhere. The green pastures, it is true, are His, and He leadeth us beside the still waters, yet these cannot give all the strength and inspiration and the visions of glory, which are amid the mountains of GOD.

There one seems to be brought nearer to the primal forces of the world. There is a sense of grandeur and stupendous power, not to be realised in the lowlands, as one climbs the great heights, and traverses, perhaps, long ridges of the mountains, far above the homelier walks of man. In that keener air, with the wider outlook over hill and dale, and perchance to the sea beyond, one seems to have life in miniature at one's feet. One sees how those immense masses have been upheaved, and how from the upper heights the streams flow down for the fertilising of the land. The sinews of the mountains are laid bare, and one recalls the ancient word concerning the strength of the hills, which, no less than the strength of eternal righteousness, is of GOD. And somehow those two thoughts seem to go together. The great mountains give character to the land, determining the flow of every stream and the whole configuration of the country, and so righteousness must be in human life as the backbone of a true manhood, the one factor firmly established, about which every other grace must be fitly disposed. With a mountain country one associates the thought of a hardy, freedom-loving race, men and women of sterling worth, accustomed to no shams but face to face with the realities of life, truthful and as open as the day, of great endurance and ready hospitality; with them one is drawn into close sympathy with the true spirit of the hills. And one returns from days of manifold delight in the great companionship of the mountains with quickened pulse and a new ardour to test that strength in loyal service, and to bring the keener breath of life and the loftier ideal into the ordinary concerns of everyday duty.

This is a part of the inspiration of the hills, but there is much more; and one other thought we must add here. The strength of the hills is His. But there are times when one seems to surprise the secret of an infinite tenderness—when the gentleness of heaven broods not only on the sea, but on the great mountains. Most often it is in the fresh morning hour or in the quiet evening, when with a marvellous clearness the hills are transfigured in celestial light. Then in utter silence there is a presence, telling not of strength alone, but of love. And if eternal Righteousness is there, as we know it is, for the redeeming of our life from all evil, we also know that it is perfected in Love.

LOYALTY TO TRUTH.

FROM a sermon preached by the Rev. Frank Walters in the Church of the Divine Unity, at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, on Sunday evening, August 10th, we take the following passages, warmly commending the whole discourse to the attention of our readers. It may be had from Essex Hall for a penny.

As a text for "Loyalty to Truth," Mr. Walter's takes Prov. xxiii. 23, "Buy the truth, and sell it not," and eloquently shows how love of truth is piety of the mind, and an essential part of the worship of God, who is Infinite Truth. The connection of the following passages must be sought in the sermon as a whole, but they speak for themselves.

Luther's Great Example.

"I do not think there is a more heroic scene in modern history than that where Martin Luther stands before the Diet of Worms; his enemies threaten him, his friends plead with him to make some compromise with the proud church he has offended. At that moment the Reformation hung in the balance; Luther stood as the representative of the conscience of Europe; and, if he had failed at that supreme crisis, tyranny and superstition would again have forged their chains for Christendom. If Luther had shuffled in that business as our twentieth century heretics do, where should we have been at the present hour? But the destiny of Christendom was decided, when the great man answered: 'I cannot, and I will not retract anything; a man must not speak against his own conscience; I can do no otherwise; God help me, Amen!'"

The Sad Case of Dr. Agar Beet.

"Only this last week we have had a sad example of the tyranny of ecclesiastical authority. Dr. Beet is the finest theologian in the ranks of the Wesleyan ministry. By his scholarly study of the New Testament he has come to the conclusion that in regard to the agony of the lost 'the Holy Scriptures do not plainly and categorically assert its endless continuance'; and this conviction he has published in a book which has been widely read. Last week, the Conference decided that this teaching 'fell short of and contravened the doctrines held and taught in our Church'; but, at the same time, provided that no further steps be taken in the matter, 'on condition that Dr. Beet did not preach in our pulpits the doctrine of his book, and that he published nothing further on the subject except with the consent of the Conference." That is, Dr. Beet shall be permitted to occupy his official position, on condition that he allow himself to be muzzled on one of the most solemn issues of Christian doctrine. It is clear that the Professor still adheres to his view of New Testament teaching on the matter; not all those long and weary discussions in Committee and Conference seem to have shaken his convictions, for after this decision he said it was God, 'who, he believed, had put the words into his lips.' And yet, it is tragical to relate, this fine scholar and brilliant theologian consents to be silent on the truth of what he regards as the oracle of God at the bidding of an ecclesiastical authority. If they will let him keep his chair, he will never preach this doctrine of the New Testament, he will never expound it to his students, and he will never print it without the consent of the Conference. What a shameful compromise! What a miserable humiliation! I wonder whether the students of the Professor will ever ask him the meaning of the severity of Jesus in those words:—'He that loveth father or mother more than Me is not worthy of Me.' I wonder whether he will, sometimes, ponder that utterance of an ancient prophet who tried to be silent concerning the word of the Lord:—'But His word was in mine heart as a burning fire shut up in my bones, and I was weary with forbearing, and I could not stay.' Better far would it have been, if he had been unfrocked and excommunicated,—better for him to have cast offices and honours to the wind, and to have stood up bravely for truth, and truth alone, against all the traditions of the elders. To retain his ecclesiastical position, he has suffered the most disastrous humiliation possible to a prophet of God—he has allowed himself to be silenced! I cannot understand how the Conference dared to insult Dr. Beet by demanding his silence; still less can I understand how he could consent to be silent concerning the Word of God in slavish submission to the word of man. As the British Weekly admirably puts it: 'We have no hesitation in saying that we thoroughly disbelieve in the plan of silencing a Christian minister on one of the most awful and pressing subjects on which a Christian minister has to speak. We understand neither the silencing of Dr. Beet by the Conference nor his submission to that silencing.' Here, then, in this latest heresy case, we have a distinct proof that to be loyal to truth a man must renounce sectarianism and all its works."

The Preacher's Own Experience.

"I can myself quite well remember that when my early creed became incredible I found great strength in the deep assurance that there were no steps backward; even in the depth of my doubt, never, even for a moment, did it seem possible to believe again in what, by a strange irony, is called 'Evangelical' Christianity. Whatever the truth might ultimately prove itself to be, that was incredible; the whole system, from the fable of the Fall of Adam to the drama of the Final Judgment, the whole machinery of this Apocalyptic Theology was opposed to all the evidences of natural law and all the finer impulses of spiritual life. Even though faith was unattainable, it was better to go on doubting, better to wander in the cool shades of agnosticism, than to force oneself to confess what had for ever become incredible. 'Go!' was the advice of one of our sternest masters—'go to hell if thou must. But with a lie in thy mouth? By the Eternal Maker—No!' We must deeply convince ourselves that there is one absolute sanctity, and that is the sincere mind. All religion begins, not with the acceptance of dogmas, but with faithfulness to one's own soul. It is more important to be loyal to one's own nature than to submit to any ecclesiastical authority. Only by such resolute courage is it ever possible to work out a personal faith."

Why Suffer for the Truth?

"It is not that men are unprepared for higher truth, it is that dogma and convention and compromise paralyse the lips of those who ought to be the apostles of a living faith. Surely, if truth be the object of our passionate search, we ought to make it the standard of our lives. No cost too great to make it ours, no risk too hazardous to profess its beauty, no labour too great to serve its glorious cause! Truth has ministered to us; now we must become ministers of truth. The word martyr really means a witness; and there is a deep sense in which every man may say:—'To this end was I born, for this cause came I into the world, that I should be a martyr for the truth.'

"Can we do too much in the service of our faith? And we must remember that the issue at stake is that of our own moral destiny. You cannot, after all, afford to be unfaithful; for no more awful disaster can come to a man than to be convicted of infidelity to his own soul. Truth can manage to achieve its own triumphs without our help; but how terrible for the Lord of Conscience to condemn us for having been ashamed of him and of his words! I know how we sometimes reckon up all we do for religion—the sacrifices we make, the inconveniences we suffer. But we have only to remember what truth has done for us, how it has ransomed us from superstition, inspired our life with divine courage, strengthened us to bear our burdens and endure our sorrows, and transfigured even the grave with light from heaven—we have only to remember these blessings of truth to be ready to spend ourselves in its vindication, and so commend it to the world as the crown and consummation of the seeking generations of mankind."

We have also received a copy of another sermon preached at the same time, and with the same moral, by the Rev. Charles Travers, of Carlisle, but dealing more particularly with the doctrine with which Dr. Beet's heresy is concerned, as indicated in the title of the sermon, "Eternal Punishment: the Wesleyan Conference and the Heresies of Dr. Agar Beet."

THE ECCLESIASTICAL QUESTION IN DENMARK.

SIR,—Pastor Uffe Birkedal, the accomplished and esteemed minister of the Free, or Unitarian, congregation in Copenhagen, placed in my hands on my recent visit a long and careful statement of the present ecclesiastical problem in Denmark, asking me to revise it so far as might be necessary to make it suitable for the pages of THE INQUIRER. He is naturally solicitous that Unitarians in England should really understand the situation and its historical genesis. With your permission I will lay before your readers a statement substantially identical with that of Pastor Birkedal, but modified in presentation just so far as seems to me to be required that English people may thoroughly understand it.

RICHARD A. ARMSTRONG.

It is difficult for foreigners to grasp the present condition of things religious and ecclesiastical in Denmark, since the history of the Danish Church in the nineteenth century has been singular and almost unique.

No exposition can be of any avail which does not give a prominent place to the name of N. F. S. Grundtvig (1783-1872).* It is not too much to say that no single individual ever so profoundly influenced his people as he. His genius covered the spheres of poetry, history, mythology, pedagogy, and politics; but its centre was in his religious faith. Though he held no more prominent post than the pastorate of a Copenhagen almshouse, yet his church was crowded with hearers in his later years, and eager disciples spread his views throughout the land. As a hymn-writer he is among the greatest whom Scandinavia has produced, and he has sung his ideas into the heart of his nation. He was far from orthodox in the common sense of the word, though he ardently preached the Deity of Christ, and believed in the Bible miracles. His characteristic doctrine was that the Apostles' Creed is the word of the Lord's own lips, delivered between his resurrection and ascension, and handed down unaltered to the present day. He held it to be the one essential to the validity of baptism, and to constitute the test of Christianity amid all other diversities of belief and practice. It is "the word of life and light," and to believe it and live by it is the sole condition of salvation. Narrow as such a view may seem, it came in the early part of the last century as a great liberation. It simplified Christianity. It has not, indeed, proved the corner-stone which he and his earlier disciples expected. It has not held its own against historical criticism and largening conceptions of the mercy of God; and after Grundtvig's death, it suffered the stain of all theological dogma—the spirit of intolerance. But the generation whose Shibboleth it was is passing away, and it is Grundtvig's conception of human nature which has broadened the mind of the people. Here he is altogether at variance with the Reformed Church, with its doctrine of total depravity. Grundtvig saw in man the image of God, and pressed this point with the fervour of Channing. The natural man is to him the soil of Christianity. "First man then Christian."

* This is unquestionable. The extent to which the Danish religious consciousness is saturated with the personality of this most remarkable man—outside Scandinavia almost unknown—amazes the foreigner who enters into the matter at all. A man of the broadest liberal spirit, yet extraordinarily eccentric in actual belief, by his immense force of character he has stamped himself indelibly not only on the religious thought of Denmark, but on her politics, her sociology, her education, her learning, and her philanthropy. The crudity of his theological teaching, though wholly emancipated from Calvinism, amazes one only less than the splendid influence of his personality on the ethical life of his country. A short sketch of his career will be found in the "Encyclopædia Britannica," but it gives no account of his theological teaching.—R. A. A.

And this led him to believe in the beneficent effect of liberty both political and ecclesiastical. He claimed for the priesthood of the Established Church liberty to preach according to their convictions—and for the parishioner a corresponding liberty to elect for himself the ministrations of another priest—a point of crucial importance in the ecclesiastical controversies of Denmark, distinguished as the right "to loosen the parish bond." The "High School" system—the system of adult peasant schools, of such immense importance in the recent history of Denmark—is also his creation. "A free people," said he, "must be an enlightened people." These schools now spread as a net-work over Denmark, and have extended to Sweden and Norway and even unhappy Finland. To these institutions, lavishly supported, is largely due the high standpoint reached by Danish agriculture. And the High Schools have fostered a spirit of civic and religious liberty throughout the country. They were in the van in the long struggle against political absolutism. That battle has now been won; yet but for Grundtvig victory might still lie in the distant future.

In the "Fundamental Law," the formal constitution, promulgated in 1849, which governs every political question in Denmark, liberty of worship was conceded. But the Lutheran Church, hitherto known as "the State Church," was renamed "the People's Church," and its right to State support was formally based on its inclusion of the mass of the people. A definite ecclesiastical constitution was at the same time promised; but the promise has never been redeemed, and in the absence of definitive law of a liberal character much old usage continues. Appointments to livings continue to be made by the Crown on ministerial nomination, and Parliament retains the sole legislative control of the Church. Individual acts of legislation have, however, been passed tending in the direction of personal liberty. Such legislation is mainly due to Grundtvig and his followers. Among these acts are that already referred to establishing the right of "loosening the parish bond" and another legalising "electoral congregations." By the first, any member of the People's Church is permitted to leave his own parish clergyman and connect himself with the incumbent of another parish. By the second, twenty heads of families may unite to form a congregation within the People's Church and to elect a minister of their own choice, provided he be duly qualified and that they provide a church building and keep it in repair. They must, however, themselves provide the ministerial stipend. The "loosener of the parish bond" and the members of an "electoral congregation" are alike required to continue to pay tithe to the regular parish priest. So only can they personally remain members of the People's Church. Although the "electoral congregations" are still subject to the superintendence of their respective bishops, and their clergy must use the authorised forms of the People's Church in Baptism, Marriage, Funerals, Confirmation, and Eucharist, they enjoy much more independence than the ordinary parish congregations. Hitherto the Grundtvigians alone have formed such congregations.

These societies, however, are an important material stepping-stone towards a People's Church emancipated from any obligation to a particular system of doctrine and entrusting the choice of her parish ministers to the parishioners themselves. The new Liberal Government has incorporated this last proposal in its programme. The Minister for Ecclesiastical Affairs, F. C. Christensen, has brought in a Bill to establish congregational councils, one of whose principal duties will be the selection of the parish priest.

Now it is true that to us Unitarian Christians who desire to remain in the People's Church the main point is liberty of doctrine; and Herr Christensen, though an earnest and religious man, and by no means inclined to draw tighter those dogmatic bonds which the spirit of the time has loosened, evidently fears that if they be put altogether aside the People's Church will fall to pieces. The highly Calvinistic party known as "the Inner Mission," who have developed an extraordinary activity, threaten to leave the People's Church if Christensen's Bill becomes law. Nor will the party commonly called "High Church," with the bishops at their head, listen to any such proposals. These two parties have accordingly united in a demand for an Ecclesiastical Commission which shall represent the voice of the Church, by which they mean the clergy. The object of this demand is to postpone the whole question and drown it in endless discussion, as has been the case before. The opponents of the Government Bill are scandalised at the very thought of "unbelievers" voting in connection with the proposed electoral councils. But Herr Christensen, backed by his colleagues and the great majority of the nation, is deaf to their representations. He himself, however, is orthodox, though mildly so, and is most unwilling to annul the requirement that the priest, before entering on his living, shall solemnly promise to teach in accordance with the Evangelical Lutheran doctrine. But no doubt the Bill when passed will tend further to widen that liberty of preaching according to conviction which, since Grundtvig's day, the course of time has in some degree inaugurated, in spite of the Augustinian Confession and the influence of the bishops. Indeed, some of the bishops themselves are, strictly speaking, "heretics," since they are Grundtvigians in theology. This is the case with the Bishop of Sealand himself, the chief ecclesiastic in the realm. Tried by the standard of the Confession of Augsburg, these bishops themselves have broken their vows. The fact must necessarily gravely discount their authority when they denounce heresy and point out the motes in their brethren's eyes.

It is obvious, too, that a Government based, like the present, on universal suffrage must be chary of offending the religious sentiments of their constituents. If the majority of the Danish people, well educated as they are, consists of "unbelievers"—men heterodox in opinion though far from irreligious—they will elect clergy in harmony with their views. The older Grundtvigianism is, as I have said, passing away, and to the new generation, not the Apostles' Creed, but a more humanitarian Christianity is the essential point of Grundtvigianism. The clergy are but the children of their time and nation, and they spring from the people themselves. When they are chosen by the congregations themselves and preach to the satisfaction of the majority of their hearers, the Government may be trusted to leave them in peace, however questionable their orthodoxy may be. And so the time will come when the solemn obligations of the Augsburg Confession and the Lutheran Catechism will be given up as unworthy of the general enlightenment, and freedom will be conceded in the matter of hymns and ritual. Not a few even of the "Old Grundtvigians" join in the demand for this reform, foremost among them Pastor J. H. Monrad, the editor of the Church Tidings, a man held in high esteem and the most influential clergyman in Copenhagen. Though orthodox, so far as a Grundtvigian can be so, he sides with us in the plea for the abolition of dogmatic restraint in the People's Church. His programme is "A People's Church honest and tolerant."

In short, we Unitarian Christians desire, if possible (and we think it possible), to remain in the People's Church with rights identical with those of our fellow-Christians of other types. The ideal of the People's Church in future must be not the sham uniformity of rites and symbols, but the real uniformity of a common belief in the One True God as preached by Jesus Christ, and acceptance of the great moral principles of Christianity. It is in such a Church and in such a Church alone that the State, conceived as the organised people, has an interest. In the twentieth century the State must be wholly indifferent to questions of dogmatics.

CHIDE me not, laborious band,
For the idle flowers I brought;
Every aster in my hand
Goes home loaded with a thought.

One harvest from the field
Homeward brought the oxen strong;
A second crop thine acres yield,
Which I gather in a song.

WORDSWORTH.

I.—THE PRELUDE.

THERE is something admirable in the devotion of a life and the subordination of passing interests and advantages to any object pursued through discouragement and difficulty. The impression of personal power and of confidence and stability is fascinating, though it persist toward so narrow an object as the building up of a successful business connection, and the establishment of a great profitable trading concern. The manufacturer or trader who at the same time that he is building up his own fortune has in view the well-being and success of all who work with him, and the production of things honest and useful and healthful to those who use them, is perhaps the typical hero of our time, and it may be difficult among a people whose ideal is manufacturing pre-eminence to win adequate respect and honour for a man who believed it was the business of his life to write poetry, and who set about it as if it were a business, devoted his energies to that object and the expression through the medium of verse of ideas on philosophy, ethics, religion, and human life.

Wordsworth felt that he was called to be a poet, and meant to be one, or rather was one, and that he would substitute nothing else for that use of life. He was to be the poet of nature and man in companionship, and when his friend Calvert left him a legacy of £900 he settled in a quiet country place, Racedown, in Dorset, and afterwards near Coleridge at Alfoxden, in Somerset, and began his work and produced a few poems. He had earned very little money by his poetry when, not far short of thirty years of age, he settled at Grasmere, intending "to construct a literary work that might live." In retirement, with the sympathetic companionship of his sister, and, later, of his wife, no other object was allowed to spoil the purpose of his life. The simplest of fare, the devoted and careful management of household resources, a cottage at £8 a year and no extravagances of living, made this possible, and the ridicule and abuse of reviewers and practical people and other poets who lacked his steadfastness, and the blank want of interest on the part of the public who made no demand for his wares, did not cause him to desist. These things probably increased his self-assertiveness and made him appear more stubborn. What is nothing more nor less than devotion to a noble object and confidence that he is called to do a certain thing, created for a purpose, looks like stubbornness and conceit when, under general discouragement and opposition, a man reaffirms his intuitions and goes his own way or the way of his mission, with an emphasis on the I as against the world. And yet in the secret places of his own experience that egotism may melt into something not far distant from "Yet not I but the Father which sent me." Wordsworth dwells excessively upon himself, his ideas and egotistical details, in his prose explanations, but, it appears to one at least of his minor critics, not in the "Prelude," which is avowedly a poem about himself.

During the six years ending with the thirty-fifth of his life he was engaged in the composition of this autobiography, this "history of a poet's mind," while he was considering how far nature and education had qualified him for such a work as he afterwards determined to produce, "a philosophical poem containing views of Man, Nature, and Society." Can any man who writes a book do better than give us a candid and sincere account of himself and his experiences, or of such part of him and them as on consideration he deems useful and helpful for others? Indeed, what original writing can any author give us but an account of something he himself is, has been, has seen, has learned, or has felt? The question of value lies in the worth of the man and of his experiences. Unworthy egotism is that which belittles other human beings that self may be distinguished, or is lacking in perception of the insignificance of selfish and individual interests compared with Eternal Truth and Right and Beauty. And, who finds this littleness swollen large in Wordsworth, save perhaps in a few minor passages of his accompanying prose? The I in the poems is the ego of principle and ideal, and does not detract from the dignity and excellence of men and humanity; is rather an affirmation of self as a type and example of all men in their possibilities, if not always of their present attainments.

"The Prelude" is a poet's account of the circumstances which brought to consciousness his poetic gift, addressed to the friend who was companion of his early aspirations, Samuel Taylor Coleridge; it also shows in large measure what was the special character of his poetic inspiration; and, without any formal arrangement of topics or artistic construction of the poem as a whole, following the easy lines of the passing years, and thus leaving to providence its artistic form, it tells from time to time of feelings and other experiences which were his education and inspiration, whose transmission to others by means of verse constituted his power as a poet.

The poem begins with exultation and relief from

> The heavy weight of many a weary day
> Not mine, and such as were not made for me, spent in the vast city from which he has now escaped, and at once expresses the expansion and delight of those to whom town life is a restraint and oppression, and who have got away for a holiday in the country or to live a country life. The actual occasion of this outpouring was on leaving behind the city walls of Goslar, in Saxony; but it serves well as a preamble to the record of his own early life, expressing as it does the freedom that he felt among his native hills, and streams, and lakes—freedom not to be wantonly used, but which brings with it > the hope

> Of active days urged on by flying hours—
> Days of sweet leisure, taxed with patient thought
> Abstruse, nor wanting punctual service high,
> Matins and vespers of harmonious verse.

In such circumstances his life work could be done, and only in such circumstances with freedom, joy, and completeness. At the outset he gives expression to the egotism or confidence which made him a poet and enabled him to go calmly and steadfastly forward with his mission when he was one of the very few who believed in his powers amid frequent ridicule and general neglect.

> To the open fields I told
> A prophecy: poetic numbers came > Spontaneously to clothe in priestly robe
> A renovated spirit singled out,
> Such hope was mine, for holy service.

Then he tells how from the first the Wisdom and Spirit of the universe had intertwined for him the passions and experiences that build up the human soul with life and nature, with high objects, with enduring things, "not with the mean and vulgar works of man." His first years spent by the Derwent river with Skiddaw in view, his schooldays at Hawkeshead ever among the mountains and running or placid waters of stream and lake, boyish sports and excursions and adventures, were ever among scenes grand and beautiful, at an age when he was unconscious of their significance. Yet did memory store them for the enriching of coming years, and associate them with every gain of knowledge and power. And the time approached > when the winning forms

> Of Nature were collaterally attached
> To every scheme of holiday delight
> And every boyish sport, less grateful else
> And languidly pursued.

Boating on Windermere, searching for ravens' nests, rustic dinners in woods or by river-side when, returning from the holidays, the boys had store of pocket-money, and could supplement the scanty fare which the Dame who fed them could supply; on rare occasions, drawing largely from their funds, horseback rides to places more distant than their common haunts: such were the sports of youth, producing health of body and health of mind; and all the inexhaustible sources of nature, day and night throughout the seasons, poured forth influences

> To feed the spirit of religious love
> In which I walked with Nature.

These gave him the calm amid the storm of life, these preserved in him youthful purity of heart, and removed him from little enmities and low desires, and—

> When good men
> On every side fall off, we know not how
> To selfishness, disguised in gentle names
> Of peace and quiet and domestic love, it is due to these that he despaired not of human nature.

His residence at Cambridge did not develop in him any ordinary type of academic ambition. He appreciated the memories of great men, he found delight in nature, though seen in her less grand and glorious phases, in the beautiful form of an ash tree, the lofty elms, or the moonlight beauty of a winter's night. He could neither follow studiously the prescribed course nor contentedly pursue an original plan of work; but geometry was a fascinating study and appeared to him in its "permanent and universal sway" as

> A type, for finite natures, of the one and books, then as beforetime, were to him of vast importance recording the inspiration of great men; but were second to nature in their renovating power over the human mind and character.

His return to his native district for a summer vacation brought renewed and more deeply conscious delight, and more perception of the source of the consummate happiness which awaited him there; and then it was that a revelation came to him of his high privilege and obligation as a servant of God who could read his meaning in the open revelation of nature seen, alas! by so few. After an occasion of revelry in country and youthful exuberance of animal spirits, dancing and gaiety kept up through the brief night till the summer dawn began, on his homeward way,

> Magnificent
> The morning rose in memorable pomp
> Glorious as e'er I had beheld—in front,
> The sea lay laughing at a distance; near,
> The solid mountains shone, bright as the clouds,
> Grain-tinctured, drenched in empyrean light;
> And in the meadows and the lower grounds
> Was all the sweetness of a common dawn—
> Dews, vapours, and the melody of birds,
> And labourers going forth to till the fields.

In the midst of such vision of the law-abiding miracles of nature came Wordsworth's serious call.

> To the brim
> My heart was full; I made no vows, but vows
> Were then made for me; bond unknown to me
> Was given, that I should be, else sinning greatly,
> A dedicated spirit. On I walked
> In thankful blessedness, which yet survives.

The experience recorded must have been quite a dozen years earlier than the composition of the verses, and therefore there is great significance in the phrase "which yet survives." After such revelation of his appointed course, to have succumbed to opposition and misunderstanding and reproach and mockery, would have been to sin against the spirit; to persist was to be stubborn; to justify himself in words of explanation was to be egotistical.

A later vacation was spent in France and among the Alps instead of cramming for examinations. The enthusiasm of the movement for political freedom, and the majesty and beauty of the Alps mingled in his regard. A short period spent in London is recorded in a manner which exemplifies his appreciation of the outdoor life of the city—that which keeps it in touch with the country, and his comparative dulness when enumerating the things which belong exclusively to city life. There are very few passages of any length in the whole of the "Prelude" which are prosaic to those who have the key of emotion and calmness by which to interpret them save in this one part, and, even here, there are most sympathetic and exquisite touches of nature, as when he briefly depicts the workman who has stolen an hour from labour to bring out his sick child into the fresh air and sunshine. Nature, however, has led to the love of man, and man is seen and appreciated adequately only with nature as part of the picture.

After less than a year in London, Wordsworth crossed to France in a time of universal ferment, intending to reside for a while at Orleans: there he was ready to join in the Revolution which he looked upon as necessary for the emancipation of the people, and had confidence that, although a foreigner and but imperfectly acquainted with the language, he could be a leader, believing and conscious of his own disinterested purity of purpose. Lack of money supplies necessitated his return to England.

> That man is only weak through his mistrust,

When Britain put forth her strength in league with the confederate Powers against the new Republic, Wordsworth received the first shock that his moral nature had ever experienced.

> All else was progress on the self-same path
> On which, with a diversity of pace,
> I had been travelling: this a stride at once
> Into another region.

A conflict of sensations was in him, and when, in the congregation of worshippers, prayers or thanks were offered for his country's victories, he sat "like an uninvited guest," and

> Fed on the day of vengeance yet to come.

In the following years of violent feelings, disappointment, and bitterness of heart, he was saved from despair;

> in Nature still
> Glorying, I found a counterpoise in her
> Which when the spirit of evil reached its height
> Maintained for me a secret happiness.

He was "a child of Nature" still. Yet he had been at war with himself, had examined the moral world with microscopic view, finding fault and doubting the existence of nobility of character; and in like manner he subjected the visible universe to superficial examination, comparing scene with scene, dwelling on the novelties of colour and proportion, > to the moral power,

> The affections and spirit of the place,
> Insensible.

Yet, were these joys "vivid though not profound," "sought insatiably"; new pleasures and more were eagerly seized, proud of his perception, while laying to rest the inner questionings by outward activity of sense and mind. How different was all this from his earlier joy when he "loved whate'er he saw."

> I felt, observed and pondered; did not judge,
> Yea, never thought of judging; with the gift
> Of all this glory filled and satisfied.

The critical, sceptic mood did not last long: the early inspiration had been too forcible, too persistent, to be annulled even by the distractions of his violent disillusion as to the progress of humanity.

> I shook the habit off
> Entirely and for ever, and again
> In Nature's presence stood, as now I stand
> A sensitive being, a creative soul.

Feelings that had stood the test of such a trial were trustworthy, and with renewed communion with the permanent whole of Nature came renewed confidence in the advance of general humanity, but not by sanguine schemes and ambitious projects. He was prepared to find

> Presumption, folly, madness, in the men
> Who thrust themselves upon the passive world
> As Rulers of the world; and vagueness and unsoundness in them even when they were honest; and having brought the theories of statists and economists to their proper test,

> Life, human life, with all its sacred claims
> Of sex and age and heaven-descended rights,

he discerns

> how dire a thing
> Is worshipped in that idol proudly called
> The "Wealth of Nations."

He asserts the dignity of the individual man, and relies on the steady advance of humanity through the education of all, not a surface education, but the development of character and spiritual perception by such influences as are traced in the "Prelude."

"The History of a Poet's Mind" has not been adequately traced without mention of the companionship of his sister, and, in its later activity, that of his wife. To his sister, he says that his soul "retained too long a countenance severe";

> But thou didst plant its crevices with flowers,
> Hang it with shrubs that twinkle in the breeze,
> And teach the little birds to build their nests
> And warble in its chambers.

When Nature, so long foremost in his affections, had fallen back into a second place, > pleased to become

> A handmaid to a nobler than herself,
> When every day brought with it some new sense
> Of exquisite regard for common things, her breath "was as a kind of gentle spring" that went before his steps. His wife's presence in his home belonged only to the latter part of the time during which he was writing the "Prelude," but she, his sister's early friend, came > an inmate of the heart

> And yet a spirit, there for me enshrined
> To penetrate the lofty and the low.

To the placid happiness preserved by these two women in his home, and, their housewifely frugal carefulness, combined with companionship in his highest and most spiritual flights, Wordsworth, and those who have found him a prophet and interpreter, owe very much.

OUR CITY YOUTHS AND MAIDENS.*

BY THE REV. J. L. HAIGH.

I.

Stand in any one of the principal thoroughfares of a big city, say Fleet-street, London, for an hour or two, and watch the masses as they pass: the hurrying business man, the quick messenger, the slow, stately, self-centred man or woman of fashion, the dogged workman, the lazy drone, the poor, the sad, the wicked, the mad—all sorts and conditions of men and women, youths and maidens, lords and ladies, passing by on foot, or whirled by in innumerable vehicles; stand there and let the significance of the scene sink into your mind, even if it only be as an indication of the physical movement of life, pulsating and throbbing through the countless avenues of the great city—and a feeling of pity, wonder and awe is almost sure to take possession of you: pity for those who seem so utterly wretched and woebegone; wonder at the indifference and callousness stamped upon so many countenances; awe at the multiplicity of interests displayed, and in the thought that each man or woman is a particular entity with his or her own particular physical life, his own particular individuality to carry about all the days of his life. Even as human machines, each to do his own bit of work in the complex arrangement called modern civilisation, each to make his own little hum, to swell the deep eternal hum of the accumulated myriads, even from this point of view the wonder, the pity, the awe are intense.

Coming Out from Work.

Now, I want to introduce you to another crowd—the crowd, the mass of young people leaving foundries, factories, and other huge places of employment at knocking-off time. Have you ever watched them? Here is the stream of young girls from the cigarette-maker's warehouse. They are nearly all dressed alike—sailor hat, blouse, jacket, and the inevitable slim-sticked umbrella. The older ones go off arm-in-arm and look very lady-like and meek. The younger ones scamper across the road and indulge in laughter, always shrill, if not always sweet. The stream of young fellows from the foundry or ship-yard have their inevitable—not an umbrella this time—but a cigarette. There is a fashion in everything and in all grades of society—and although the poor travel a long way behind the rich and catch most of the dust, they have their own particular uniform, their collars, their hats, and shoes, shabby though they be, still fashionable according to their class. Even in their working clothes the members of each trade and calling are somewhat careful not to be too outrageously original. I suppose there is a certain comfort in not being too conspicuously individualistic, and the saying, "I'll pass muster in a crowd," has a vague suggestion of modesty in it which readily wins a smile of easy-going approval. Watch the faces of these young people, and what do you see? I think the first thing that strikes one is a definite sharpness of expression. When young they like to tell you that they were not born yesterday: when old, and unfortunately they become old so soon, they look as if there might be a faint chance of their coming alive to-morrow, if somebody would be kind enough to give them a shock.

Grown Old too Soon.

A short, sharp life is theirs—a red-hot, wasted life in too many instances. A decade and a half full of vitality, then a little smouldering, then a dull grey ash. Men of thirty and thirty-five are hanging round our street corners in a dull, stupid, helpless way, waiting for somebody to turn up to revive their drooping grace with the ordinary pick-me-up. Professional men who receive an important appointment at that age are often looked upon as rather young for the post, no matter what their ability may be. They need no pick-me-up. They are just settling down in life; the others are settled and done for. Why this difference? The difference is brought about through waste of energy—physical energy—sheer wanton waste. Think of it. Here's a lad of sixteen or eighteen has to be at work by six or half-past every morning. Very often he loses a quarter. Then he gets home at half-past five or six at night. What has he been doing all day? Well, for at least eight hours he has been doing close, heavy work amid the constant whirr of machinery. In the middle of the day there comes an hour's cessation, during which he bolts his dinner and has a game of football in a side street flanked by huge cotton warehouses. Not a quiet, easy game (he doesn't believe in that), but a mad, headlong, go-at-it-for-all-your-worth exhibition, as if your very life depended upon it. Charge and screw and shoot, dribble and dash as if you were playing in the final at the Crystal Palace. Then back to your work, perspiring at every pore, and continue the heavy monotonous task until five o'clock. When that hour arrives, light the inevitable cigarette and off home, playing pranks on the way and ready for all mischief you come across. It is marvellous to see that look of sharp expression after such a hard day's work. You feel interested in these lads. You feel as if you wanted to get hold of them, win a firm grip of them and compel them to go with you on the right road for a year or two. That is the difference between a miscellaneous crowd, a coronation crowd, and this long line of lads leaving their daily labour.

After Work, What?

Keen, full of vitality, overflowing with animal spirits—there they go; but their day is not yet done; not a bit of t. We might want to have a good stretch on a couch, close our eyes and give our aching limbs a chance of rest. Not so with these young fellows. They have a good wash. They take a good solid tea when they can get it; and then put on a collar and tie, and saunter forth to various places of resort until half-past ten or eleven o'clock at night. Six hours sleep and the same programme to go through on the morrow. Physical stamina! Physical Samsons when you come to think of it. Why there are hundreds of surprises meeting us in the face every day, and we never think of them. Let us look at one or two of these surprises.

Crisis in the Lad's Life.

Perhaps you knew the lad when he went to your Sunday-school, and when he was in his seventh standard in the day-school—a good sort of lad, perhaps a little mischievous, but on the whole fairly satisfactory. Then he left day-school and started work. That is the crisis in the boy's life. For forty or fifty years he may be compelled to follow that employment. At first he is very glad. He has been looking forward to it for several years. But what a change! New surroundings, new associations, a new atmosphere, a new life. And the same with the young girl going into the cigarette-factory. They are both very shy, very quiet and reserved to begin with. They are absorbing—drinking everything in as hard and fast as they can. At school they were head of their class. Now they are the butt for the vulgar joke! Need I picture to you the change that takes place in a week or two. There is the loss of perfect innocence; virtue must step in and take its place. There is the feeling of the wage-earner and the sense of independence that accompanies it. Right in itself—but a little dangerous just at this period. And then gradually the parents' authority begins to lose its hold; and Tom, who a month or two ago was whipped for staying out in the streets until nine at night, coolly marches in at ten as a matter of course. That is the point I want to dwell upon.

The Young People's Leisure.

You meet these youths and maidens coming home from their hard, their dull and monotonous work at half-past five or six, and you feel deeply interested in them. In an hour, or an hour and a half, they are in the streets again, and from that time until ten or eleven—extending as they grow older—their life is their own. Three and a half, four and five hours every night of the week.

Their best friends—for Sunday-school teachers are their best friends at this period—meet them for one hour on Sunday afternoon. Including Saturday afternoon from twenty to thirty leisure hours every week are spent among shop-mates or street-associates.

Why is it so many girls refuse to follow domestic service? Chiefly because they want these evening hours to themselves. They prefer to live on bread and tea and have their liberty rather than have good wholesome food and wise discipline. They are too young and thoughtless to see the evil of this street life; and their parents are not wise enough to exercise discreet authority.

At the Street Corner.

Our city youths and maidens begin o foregather at the street corner. What they find to talk about night after night puzzles many thoughtful people. In my opinion it is sheer exuberance of spirits that carries them through. There is a certain phraseology and a freemasonry of manner required in order to become a fully qualified member of the fraternity. The phraseology consists of a limited number of the particular popular catchwords of the day, but of which you are to ring as many changes as possible. Repetition never palls. The manner is that of perfect self-confidence. Everything you do and say is worthy of the highest praise. All these corner gatherings are mutual admiration societies. That is the secret of their success, and their great danger to society. The girls repeat the gossip of the workroom or sing the chorus then in vogue; the boys recount their great victory over the foreman, or whistle snatches of the last tuneful ditty; they all have a laugh at some odd character who happens to pass, or, by way of variety, a quick rush and a scrimmage seizes them, sudden as a gust of wind among a pile of autumn leaves; or a run round the corner when the policeman appears; and then a quiet settling down, another cigarette, and a return to the programme you had last week, until it is time to saunter home, or until the usual clarion voice shrieks out its curfew from the corner of the court. Now the day is done and it is time for rest.

The Music Hall.

Two things I have purposely mentioned in this rough sketch will give you a hint of the institution which influences and colours the lives of these young people to an extent almost beyond computation, and to that institution I now mean to refer. I spoke of the girls singing "the chorus then in vogue," and the youths "whistling snatches of the last tuneful ditty." Where do they get these ditties and choruses? From their shops and from their street corners to begin with, but after a time, when they get a little more pocket-money for themselves, and their leisure hours gradually extend, they go to the fountain head, the Music Hall itself, and get them at first hand. Some very good people, in their prejudice, their prejudgment, have nothing but wholesale condemnation for the Music Hall. Generally speaking, the atmosphere, moral and physical, is bad; but parts of the programme are passable, and some parts are very good. I say that to show that I am free from "wholesale condemnation"; but while acknowledging the cleverness of the jugglers, the courage and strength and surprising agility of the athletes, the fine selection of the music given by the orchestra, and several other things deserving of praise—I must say that the principal attraction of the place is not above reproach. The loud harsh tones of the singers, the coarseness of the jokes, the holding up to ridicule all the sanctities of common life—from temperance to the holy or even legal bond of matrimony—these are the things that fill a sensible man with disgust. The pathos is even worse than the ridicule. It is sentimentalism pushed to its border line and a little bit over so that it lands one in the kingdom of perfect idiocy. There is nothing in the shape of artistic restraint to be found in the majority of these productions. You find these places packed night after night with people—chiefly young people—who must have everything presented to them in the usual big glaring fashion. Lime-light and paint are what they pay for, and they get them. There are two houses every night—the first from seven to nine, the second from nine to eleven o'clock. Many of you have simply heard of these things; but I have made it my business, my duty, to know from personal experience, so that I might not ignorantly exaggerate and blindly condemn.

Some of you here will know that I have kept within due bounds in this rough sketch of the street-life and music-hall recreation of thousands of our city youths and maidens. Some of you will know how they get to revel in these things, buy the song-books and con the wretched productions better than they ever conned their lessons at school. They suck the poison in and smile as though they were taking milk. Ah! there's the pity of it. We meet some of them on the Sunday, but where are they during the rest of the week?

Shape this Young Life for Good.

I want to lay the emphasis upon the life of the city—the life at its most interesting period—the period when it is pliable and can be turned to good account if the right tactful force is brought to bear upon it. Wonder, awe, pity, are good and right and noble feelings; we do well to keep them alive; but it is this call upon our tact, our judgment, our strength, to be exercised in the cause of righteousness and reform that fills us when we meet a stream of physically exuberant youth. We may not be able to give it utterance or attempt to analyse it; but it is there all the same. We are drawn also by a desire to shape their way of thinking and ennoble their sense of humour. In their perfect freedom and utter carelessness of life they have only liberty to become stereotyped in their dress, their manner of speech, their way of living, in their leisure and pleasure and admiration. What we call the force of circumstance presses very heavily upon them; and it is this thing which all good earnest characters are constantly fighting against—for the sake of their own individuality and the world at large.

> Were wisdom in the scorn of consequence.

This call upon us to re-shape, remould and ennoble the young life around us is a perpetual one. We cannot escape from it. We do not want to take away one bit of the natural joyousness of youth; we seek to enlarge it and beautify it. Its physical, mental, moral and social aspects are all attractive to us. Physically many of us feel in sympathy with Walt Whitman; but morally always with Jesus.

The Right Sort of Religion.

If we could only make these young people understand that we do not want to take anything away from them, but that we want to add to that which they already possess, we might begin to make some headway. Religion is not, at least for the mass of the people, a system of hard renunciation and self-denial. It certainly ought not to be that during the sunny days of youth. "Religion never was designed to make our pleasures less." Unfortunately too many of these youths and maidens think it was designed to make life grim, heavy, and dreadfully monotonous; perhaps also a little respectable, but not the sort of respectability which proves very attractive to them. Sunday services and a silk hat are too closely associated together in their minds. The stiff restrictions of Puritanism are still with us, and the parson is the long-faced fellow in a white tie—just a bit of a humbug. Is there any possibility of making these young people see that religion is not over and done with when we sing "Abide with me" on a Sunday evening (not over for ourselves, I mean)? Not so were we "taught" religion. We may have heard of men, we may have known men, who were constrained to support their church on account of the "decency of religion"; it helps them to a larger, a more influential circle of social sympathisers; it supports them in their growing business; it gives them an opportunity to start their sons in a better way of living; it gives their daughters a better opportunity of settling down in life very happily and comfortably. In addition to all this—yea, above all this, is the call for personal service in the cause of righteousness, not only on the Sunday in our classes and at our services, but during the week in our hours of pleasure and leisure.

(To be concluded.)

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Aberdeen.—On Sunday evening, Aug. 10, the Rev. A. Webster began his open-air addresses for the season on the Broad Hill. The evening was dull and cold, but there was a large gathering. Last Sunday, the 17th, the weather was more favourable, and an audience of 500 gathered to hear. Mr. Webster in these addresses is dealing with "Objections to Unitarian Teaching." A number of questions followed the addresses. Pamphlets were given away in large numbers. The plans for the new church are being matured, and work pushed on for the bazaar at Christmas.

Byker.—The annual flower service in connection with this Mission Church took place last Sunday. The Rev. Frank Walters preached in the afternoon and Mr. John Glendining at night. Notwithstanding the heavy rainfall, large congregations assembled on each occasion, and the services were much enjoyed by those who were present. The children of the Sunday-school sang special hymns, and solos were also given by Mrs. Eardsley and Mr. Smith.

Chelmsford.—The annual excursion of congregation and school was held on Wednesday, Aug. 13, to Mill Beach, Maldon, and was much enjoyed.

Halstead.—On Saturday, Aug. 16, the Rev. F. and Mrs. Allen accompanied the members of the congregation on a visit to Mrs. Sydney Courtauld's, at Braintree, where a delightful afternoon was spent in the beautiful grounds. Subsequently the party was met by the Rev. F. H. Fuller at the schoolroom adjoining the Free Christian Church, where tea was served. The rest of the evening, until the homeward journey, was also spent in Mrs. Courtauld's grounds. The service on Sunday was conducted by Mr. Allen, and was much appreciated.

Liverpool: Bootle.—Preaching in the Bootle Free Church on Sunday week, the day after the Coronation, the Rev. J. Morley Mills took for his subject "The Crown and the People," eloquently interpreting the meaning of the symbolic service, and drawing out the lessons of freedom and of Empire for the people of this country. With all sincerity they could join in the cry, "God save the King," but remembering where the real sovereignty is now vested, must add earnestly and solemnly, "God save the People," and each one remembering the Kingdom in himself he had to rule, must reverently and humbly pray, "God save me, that I may be equal to the great demands of life—that Thy Kingdom may come and Thy will be done on earth as in heaven."

London: Islington.—Appreciative reference was made at Unity Church last Sunday morning to the life and work of the late Mr. I. M. Wade, formerly a member of the congregation. The service was conducted by Mr. E. Capleton, who, in speaking of Mr. Wade, quoted Montgomery's well-known hymn, which begins:—

> "Servant of God, well done,
> Rest from thy loved employ;
> The battle fought, the victory won,
> Enter thy Master's joy."

London: Mansford-street, Bethnal Green.—At the conclusion of his sermon on Sunday evening Mr. J. Classon Drummond referred in very sympathetic terms to the death of Mr. I. M. Wade. To-morrow (Sunday) evening a memorial service for the late Miss E. J. Garrett will be held, conducted by the Rev. Henry Gow.

Moira: co. Down.—Last Sunday the Old Meeting House, which has been undergoing substantial repairs, and has been improved by the renewal of a large part of the ceiling and the replacing of five windows and a door by new ones, was re-opened, with an afternoon service, conducted by the Rev. Principal Gordon. Friendly sympathy was shown by members of other denominations in the neighbourhood, who attended the service, and friends drove over from Dromore and Lurgan, so that there was a good congregation. Mr. Gordon, who was preaching morning and evening at Dromore, also drove over the hills in a heavy downpour of rain for the service, and his kindness was much appreciated. Great efforts have been made by the congregation to meet the liabilities incurred by the renovation of their old building, but the whole amount has not been raised, and the treasurer, Mr. W. J. Agnew, Quay House, Moira, would be glad to receive and acknowledge donations for that purpose.

Stourbridge.—Anniversary services on behalf of the Wollaston-road day-schools were held at the Presbyterian Chapel on Sunday Aug. 10, conducted in the morning by the Rev. G. St. Clair, and in the afternoon by the Rev. E. A. Voysey, of West Bromwich. There were large congregations, and the collections realised £14 6s. 8d. At the close of the morning service a brief meeting was held, at which Mr. A. W. Worthington presided, and Mr. J. T. Short, on behalf of the congregation, made a presentation of a set of fish knives and forks to Mr. St. Clair, in recognition of his very acceptable services during the past six months. On the following Tuesday the "Protestant Dissenting Ministers of Warwickshire and neighbouring counties" met at Stourbridge, the service at noon being conducted by the Rev. A. H. Shelley, late of Dudley, at present officiating at Cradley, and the sermon being preached by the Rev. G. St. Clair. The members subsequently dined at The Hill, Old Swinford.

No law can make men equal, for nature and circumstance have combined to make them in every respect unlike; but there is an equality which the law should ensure, and which it too often violates. It is the equality of rich and poor, peer and commoner, Churchman and Nonconformist, in their relations to the State.—Charles Hargrove.

Highgate Hill Unitarian Christian Church.

Proposed "Spears Memorial Hall."

At a Meeting of the Congregation held on Monday, July 14th, it was resolved that an Appeal should be made, first to the Congregation and then to the Unitarian public, for funds to provide additional accommodation for carrying on the different institutions connected with the Church.

Soon after the opening of the Church in 1890, the Free Library and Reading Room (the only Institution of the kind in the Borough of Islington with its population of over 340,000) were founded by our late Pastor, Rev. R. Spears, and subsequently the University Extension Centre was formed. These institutions have attracted large numbers on five nights in each week, and exercised a most wholesome influence on the neighbourhood, and it is felt that such valuable work should be continued. Unfortunately, however, this results in the School-room being only available for purely Church purposes on one evening in each week, and as a consequence the Social Institute, Band of Hope, Dorcas Society, Young People's Guild, and other institutions have either had to be suspended or have only been kept going with great difficulty and comparative inefficiency.

The Sunday School also requires additional facilities, and many of our adult scholars who would almost certainly remain with us and join the Church could we properly provide for their needs, are lost to us at a time when the Church's influence in directing their thought and developing their character should be of the greatest importance to them both as individuals and as citizens. The percentage of elder scholars is exceptionally large, and in order to retain them during the transition period between School and Church age it is desired to divide the School into Junior and Senior Divisions, and aim at developing the latter into an Adult School. For this purpose devoted teachers and willing scholars are ready, the one thing needed being a suitable place of assembly.

It is also desired to provide on week-nights facilities for the physical culture of our young people.

A Boys' Club has been founded and is well attended, the Members being pledged to abstain from smoking until the age of 18. Besides boys from our own Sunday-school, this Club is attended by a class of lads who will not join a Sunday-school in the first instance, and only requires more room to allow of its rapid growth.

The need is also felt for an Adult Temperance Society and other social efforts.

In view of all these promising activities, and the presence of willing helpers to carry on the work, further accommodation has become absolutely necessary.

For three years the Congregation was without a Minister, but with the advent of a new Pastor, whose ministry has opened with great promise, it is felt that an effort should be made without delay, and that new buildings should, if possible, be erected before our winter work commences.

Plans have been prepared, involving an estimated outlay of about £1,000. These plans include the erection of a Hall to be called the "Spears Memorial Hall" (as a memorial of the devoted labours of the Rev. R. Spears, the founder and pastor of the Church during the first fourteen years of its existence), and an additional Class Room and Church Parlour, which would provide for our present needs.

On behalf of the Congregation we make an earnest appeal for your sympathy and support. Donations will be thankfully received by any of the undersigned Members of the Finance Committee.

THE SOUTH SHORE UNITARIAN CHURCH, BLACKPOOL,

has purchased, at a cost of nearly £600, a plot of freehold land, and they now appeal for help to erect a plain, substantial building to serve for all purposes. It is hoped to be able to do this for £1,500, making a total cost of £2,100. The land, thanks to the generosity of Mrs. John Grundy, of Summerseat; Miss S. Scholes Wrigley, of Windermere (on her own and her late mother's behalf), and Mr. R. T. Heape, of Rochdale, is entirely paid for. The Congregation have themselves promised over £300 towards the erection of the building. They carry on the Services and the Sunday School without any grant, and they feel that the remarkable success of their efforts justifies them in asking friends to help them to carry on their work under more favourable circumstances than at present. Their appeal has the full approval of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, the North and East Lancashire Mission, and the North Lancashire and Westmorland Unitarian Association; and the B. and F. U. A. has promised £25 to the Building Fund.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE "Life of Dr. Martineau," on which Dr. Drummond and Professor Upton have been engaged for the past two years, is announced for publication by Messrs. James Nisbet and Co. in the autumn. It will consist of two demy octavo volumes of between four and five hundred pages each, and the price is 30s. net. The biography is Dr. Drummond's work, to which Mr. Upton has added a study of Dr. Martineau's philosophical teaching. Both volumes will contain portraits and other illustrations. Mr. Philip Green, 5, Essex-street, Strand, W.C., offers to send the volumes directly they are issued to any part of the country, on receipt of orders enclosing the net price. We understand that the work will be ready for delivery before the end of October.

THE Sevenoaks Election was fought upon the Education Bill, and though the seat was not wrested from the Government the astounding reduction in Mr. W. H. Forster's majority is almost as conclusive as if the seat had been actually won by Mr. Beaumont Morice. It was the Education Bill that did it; "the electors won't let me talk about anything else"—"the people think and talk of nothing else," said the Liberal candidate. The question is what effect this election will have upon the prospects of the Bill. It scarcely seems possible that it will now pass in its present shape; it is not unlikely that many Unionist members who feel their seats unsafe will revolt; it is within the range of probability that the Bill will be withdrawn. As far as the country has had an opportunity it has condemned the Bill at the polling-booth. This will have more weight with the Government than any number of resolutions passed at public meetings. The Church Times in a significant article has declared its loss of confidence in the Government, and especially in Mr. Balfour, and makes an appeal to the Liberal leaders, who, it says, "have a great opportunity." The Government has succeeded in strengthening and uniting its opponents without pleasing its friends. "If things are in the air," says the Church Times, "it is not surprising."

MR. MACNAMARA, contemplating the possible defeat or withdrawal of the Education Bill, writes to the Daily News urging that the friends of progressive education must be prepared in that case for effective action. The education of the children in "Voluntary" schools must be brought up to the standard of the Board schools, which cannot be in their present impoverished state, and as the public in one way or another must find the necessary means, effective control must be in their hands. Such control is bound to come.

Dr. Temple saw that clearly enough when he urged denominationalists not to put their schools upon "the slippery slope of the rates." In their wisdom they have deliberately decided to do so. But it is futile to seek to evade the consequences. Indeed, if Mr. Balfour's gerrymandering scheme of two-sixths representation for the public upon the local management of the denominational schools were passed into law to-morrow, how long would it last? I would give it ten years at the outside; ten years of acute local bickerings, at the end of which time we should be on the highway to a thoroughly national system of public elementary education.

But supposing this Bill out of the way, Mr. Macnamara lays down the following points for an effective alternative scheme:—

(a) Public education co-ordinated in all its grades;
(b) Public elementary education maintained exclusively from public sources mainly, if not entirely, national; and
(c) Public education administered in each area of suitable size by effective local Boards of Education directly responsible to the people of the locality.

IN a letter to the Times on August 14 the Archdeacon of Richmond told how in the parish of Bishop Monkton, where half the population is Nonconformist, they have given half the seats on the board of management of the Church schools to the Nonconformists (exclusive of the chairman, who is the vicar); and how in pursuance of this plan they had found no religious difficulty. Replying in Wednesday's Times to two correspondents whose letters absence from home had prevented his seeing earlier, the Archdeacon explains that the school trust-deed had no management clause, but that if the trust had prevented, they would have invited the Nonconformists to attend the managers' meetings for consultation; and as regards the Catechism, that they have found it unnecessary to quarrel over the subject of baptism.

Wesleyans, Congregationalists and Baptists all accept the ordinance of baptism, and we are content to believe that they are all "members of Christ, children of God, and inheritors of the Kingdom of Heaven." We have no Quakers or Unitarians. If we had, and their children were not withdrawn from religious instruction, we certainly should not teach them that they were outcasts, or that the Friend of little children was the Friend only of little baptised children. So I daresay we should get on together well enough.

In conclusion, the Archdeacon expresses his conviction that a larger measure of rate-paying representation on the management committees of the schools would be an advantage to the Church. Ratepayers' representatives are as likely to be Churchmen as Nonconformists, and "anything that would tend to national unity and good-will in this difficult matter is worth some sacrifice."

THE Manchester University Settlement at Ancoats has done a great amount of good, but while the work is excellent in kind, and the spirit which animates the associates and members is in itself a proof of the value of such an institution, the number of residents is small. In fact, there has hitherto been no satisfactory accommodation for men. The women under Miss Crompton's Wardenship are lodged in Ancoats Hall; and the men are now to have a house of their own in the near neighbourhood. Mr. T. R. Marr has accepted the appointment of Warden of the Men's Settlement, and his position as Secretary of the Citizens' Association for the Improvement of the Unwholesome Dwellings and Surroundings of the People opens out to him and his fellow-workers a large and important field of investigation and service, in addition to the wide range of settlement work already undertaken. Young men and young women who would otherwise reside in lodgings in or near Manchester would do far better for themselves and for their fellow men and women if they would, at no increase of expense for lodging and board, join the small but earnest band of men and women who seek to know the conditions of life in the poorer parts of our cities by actual experience of the people and daily observance of their conditions. There is comradeship for any who have the desire to be helpful: books and lectures are accessible for information. Those who spend their leisure in helping others secure for themselves at the same time training in good citizenship. Either of the Wardens would willingly give any information required to those who write to them at Ancoats Hall, Manchester.

"THE Settlement for Religious Study which has just been held at Windermere," we quote from the August number of the British Friend, "cannot fail, we believe, to be fraught with rich spiritual blessing to the Society of Friends. Any who were privileged to be present must have felt that the fears of those who imagined that the movement meant the substitution of a merely intellectual for a spiritual apprehension of religious truth were simply blown to the winds. The lectures and classes, full as they were of interest, were felt to be secondary to the devotional gatherings, which were attended by practically the whole body of the "Settlers," and were seasons of uplifting and spiritual refreshing such as had rarely been known by most of those who were present. Nothing was more remarkable than the restraint exercised. There was no excitement; the gatherings were quiet, and held absolutely in the freedom of the Spirit The utterances were, with very little exception, short, pointed, and harmonious one with another, and penetrated to the very depths of Christian experience. It is a deep joy to know that many were helped out of dark and lonely places, not only into the joy of human fellowship, but also into a fuller experience of the light and love of Christ. A noteworthy feature was the continued expression of desire that those who had experienced help and blessing might be made serviceable to others, in the various meetings throughout the country. We are confident that this will be the case."

THE same number of the British Friend has also a fuller record of this summer settlement, which was held at the Storrs Hall Hotel on the shore of Windermere, where the party, which numbered about a hundred, overflowed into adjoining houses, and some had to find quarters at Bowness, two and a half miles away. The chief lecturers were Professor A. S. Peake on "The Epistle to the Romans," and Dr. G. A. Barton on "The Religious use of the Old Testament"; and in the second week Professor James Orr, of Glasgow, on "The History of the Doctrine of the Atonement," and the Rev. Kirsopp Lake, M.A., of Oxford, on "The Text of the New Testament." Among the lecturers were Canon Rawnsley on "Ruskin's Country"; Mr. Edward Grubb, M.A. (editor of the British Friend), on "The Teaching of Jesus and Simplicity of Life"; and Miss Alice Crompton, of Ancoats, Manchester, on "City Settlements." A lecture which made a deep impression was that by M. Catharine Albright on "The Unity of Religious Experience." It was a study of conversion, taking as instances the experience of four great religious reformers—Gautama the Buddha, Mohammed, Augustine and Tolstoy.

THE excursions naturally were an important and delightful feature of the Settlement proceedings. The record from which we are quoting tells of one notable ascent of Helvellyn by night, in hope of seeing the sunrise. It had been planned for the night of July 9, but weather prevented. A week later, however, a glorious evening invited the attempt, and a party of thirty made their way to Wythburn for that purpose.

Starting from the inn about midnight, after a hearty supper, the party, in three detachments, each carrying a Chinese lantern, wound slowly up the path to the summit. The clear moonlight gave place to the twilight of early dawn, promising a magnificent sunrise, when, to their disappointment, the mist descended chill and dark around them. Reaching the top soon after 2 A.M., they put on warm wraps, and after boiling water with spirit lamps, took some tea and food. As the dawn brightened their laughter sank into silence, and an impressive selection of passages, prepared by Rendel Harris, was recited, and was followed by a time of quietness and prayer. Unhappily the mist still enfolded the mountains, and only once did it lift for a moment to reveal, far below, the still depths of Ullswater. Cold and damp the party began the descent to Wythburn, whence a heavy shower followed them most of the way home. They reached Storrs Hall about 8 A.M., the cyclists wet to the skin, but all resolutely maintaining that the result was worth the cost.

THE editorial note, quoted above, refers to the great helpfulness of the devotional meetings, to which the first half hour of the morning at Storrs Hall was regularly devoted. The fuller record also tells of this.

A master in one of the Friends' Boarding Schools said to the writer, that to him, living as he did in a small and rather dull meeting, they were worth all the rest of the Settlement put together. Certainly there was a wonderful power present, both in the silence and in short and simple utterances which went right to the heart of Christian experience, and showed how this is not only possible to, but is known by, many whose minds are not narrowed, but are wholly open to new light. In the first of these meetings J. Rendel Harris gave the keynote of the whole Settlement by recalling the walk of two disciples in the country, when an unexpected Stranger joined them and opened their eyes, enabling them to "translate Emmaus into Emmanuel." Thus we, too, might have our eyes opened, and make our Settlement a Sanctuary. This hope was wonderfully fulfilled as the days went on. When, after a few days, the "Settlers" got to know each other, a beautiful spirit of love developed, and drew them together in a way that could not have been anticipated. Quite naturally and spontaneously, as they wandered among the trees or rowed upon the lake, reserve broke down, they dropped into intimate talk on the deepest matters, and many who were seeking light began to find it through the helpful influence of those who had advanced a little further in the Christian life.

THE August number of the Abolitionist, the journal of the British Union for the Abolition of Vivisection, contains a trenchant examination by Dr. W. R. Hadwen of the reply of the Senate of the London University to the recent memorial protesting against the use of the Brown Institution in Wandsworth-road, South Lambeth, for vivisection, as a grave breach of trust. Dr. Hadwen's article should be read by all who are interested in this painful subject, and not less by those who are concerned for the honour of the University of London.

IN recognition of the valuable services rendered by Lady O'Hagan in connection with her hospital work in South Africa during the late war, the authorities presented her with the war medal. It came in time for her to wear it on the day of the Coronation Service at Westminster Abbey.

THE TIDE.

"Thou causest the dayspring to know its place, and sayest to the sea, 'Here shall thy proud waves be stayed."

TWICE a day over the shore
Comes the strong sweep of the tide
Out of the green ocean wide;
Twice a day, now as of yore,
Rising resistless and grand
Over the welcoming strand;
Twice a day—now—evermore.

Out of its far-away home
Swells the sea further and higher,
Quenching earth's eager desire,
Flinging pure snow-wreaths of foam;
Onward and up to its bound,
Filling with manifold sound
All the air's crystalline dome.

Bringing its billows' long roll
Foot after foot o'er the sand,
Over the marge of the land.
Pausing at last at the goal,
Resting at height of its power,
Then to return, sinking lower,
Drawing away from the land,
Down, ever down, o'er the sand,
Yielding to lawful control.

Sometimes it comes with a song
Caught from the wind of the West,
Learnt at the vast ocean's breast,
Sung with a voice sweet and strong,
Sometimes with laughter and play,
Wave after wave will advance,
Frolicsome, sparkling, and gay,
Ready to join in the dance,
Leaping 'neath sunlight along.

Sometimes it comes with a moan,
Comes with a sigh and a wail,
Breathing a pitiful tale
Low to each listening stone.
Sometimes in anger it comes,
Loud with a roar as of drums,
Wild in confusion and strife,
Heedless of man and man's life,
Working its purpose alone.

Whether in peace or in war,
Rises the tide in its glory,
Telling its wonderful story,
Singing the praise of the Law;
Out of the heart of the ocean,
Kingly, majestic in motion,
Whether it rise or withdraw,
Owing obedience to Law.

Seek ye your idols afar;
Seek them in breakings of law.
Deity dwells in the sway
Greatest and least must obey.
Even the atoms of dust
Bow to a law we can trust,
Shaping the cup of the flower,
Arching the rainbow above,
Calling the tides at their hour,
Tinting the wing of the dove.
Hark, to the sea's thunder-voice
"Lo, I obey, and rejoice."
Hark, to the murmured reply
Sent by the earth and the sky.
Law is beginning and end,
Law a beneficient friend,
Guiding the drift of a straw,
Watching the fall of a bird,
Law is the mightiest word,
For Love is the name of the Law.

THEODORA MILLS.

Gower Coast.

THE KESWICK CONVENTION.

Its Body, Soul, and Spirit.

(I.) its body.

The Vale of St. John and the Vale of Naddle! Leave Naddle alone with the splendours of its enigmatic etymology—"a thing imagination boggles at"—; yet not so shall we contemplate the other without some sense of disharmony from the mere juxtaposition of name and place. But the Vale of St. John has other disonances. For here on its utmost ridge, far above Derwentwater, among the foothills of Helvellyn, walled in by lordly terraces of Skiddaw and Blencathra from all prospects but of mountain peaks and the canopy of low skies to which they point, lies a primitive stone enclosure of the kind we are apt to think we have sufficiently explained when we call them "Druid Circles."

What has St. John to do with Druid Circles? Surely there is something here that the seeing eye and the understanding heart may find to repay the coming.

Yes. In the middle of the "circle" there is a notice-board, which may have been put there originally for some other and less obvious reason, whose post has served many a score of visitors as a runestick for the emblazonment of their autograph signatures.

Two girls from New Zealand have just discovered a nick upon its crowded panels where, with the aid of a pocket-knife, they are immortalising the great fact of their presence at this point of space and time. The seeing eye and the understanding heart always requisition a penknife or a rusty nail or a stout lead-pencil to advertise next comers, they, too, have once "bin thar." When the supply of notice-boards or some equivalent medium is adequately maintained, it is what folk in the valley below would call a "merciful Providence." It effects a sort of insurance upon the "interests" that make the nominal objective of the visit; in this case, perhaps, these solemn monolyths have escaped some chipping and carving, with the further suggestiveness of the incongruous which would belong to the double function of witnessing at once to an ancient dignity and a modern impudence.

But we must not digress into reflections upon other aspects when with one only are we here justly to be concerned. Apart then from its visitors, its picnics, and its autographs, what is this Druid Circle?

The Druid Circle.

As a circle, it clearly represents a conception of the figure that could only obtain in times and places where Euclid's definitions had not penetrated. We have seen, and sometimes made, similar attempts in fear and in much trembling upon a class-room blackboard. But it was probably in pride and much satisfaction that the area was mapped out on this green sward by the grim archdruid who could still afford to ban intrusive compasses—had any been forthcoming—as heretical contrivances, tending to a shipwreck of some faith.

Circle or no circle, it is a plane figure enclosed by one line; and the wonder of the thing is in that fact.

These great stones stand at least in perpetual witness to some earnestness of purpose in those who put them there. Faith can remove mountains; and, presumably, can also ignore them. Such a faith it surely was that ordered these black blocks upon the slopes below Latrigg, and summoned hither our hardy forefathers to the solemnities of the first great Keswick Convention.

Sitting here, under the shadow of the emblazoned notice-board, we can imagine many probable scenes of the past drama of the place.

The Rationalist who appealed to compasses was not the only disturber of the orthodoxy of his generation. There was a spirit of unrest in the air, no doubt; and the day arrived when—but why try to retrace the process when the Editor has said pauca verba, and the dull present will be ousted from notice altogether if we indulge ourselves with picture-dreaming of the past?

An Eloquent Silence.

Suffice it that the reader understands the old "Keswick Teaching" did not pass away without much seaching of heart, much ranting of orators, much prophecy of doleful dooms; and that it did pass away, with all its stupendous apparatus of creeds and mythologies, ritual and circumstance, till of all that was once transacted yearly, perhaps daily, in this arena, nothing has survived to us but this inexplicable circle of silent stones. Yes; it is the silence that is the most impressive factor in the occasion. The utter silence where men were once so noisy with their explanations that things must be "just so" or the world would come speedily to a dismal finish. And the sense of this silence is the more impressive, the more delicious, the more invigorating from one's consciousness that down yonder in the valley a new type of Druids are explaining to a new type of audience a new type of teaching with a similar noisy insistence upon its inspiration and finality. "My thoughts are not your thoughts, neither your ways my ways, saith the Lord."

The Past and the Present.

These two religious systems, the one past, the other passing, thus brought into mental association, give to this sweet valley of the Derwent a significance for a man's religious life not the less real and stimulating though too infrequently apprehended by its votaries. There has been some cleaning of windows, some enlarging, no doubt, of window-spaces in the interval between the first pre-historic undated Convention of Keswick and that of A.D. 1902. But it is still the same light that lighteth every man coming into the world; and the same light will continue to light every man, whether his windows be small or large, stained or colourless, red or blue; provided only they be not shuttered up.

So, in a degree, that, we fear, would scandalise our modern Druids, we feel towards them in their assembly in the valley and towards those great departed who once met here that we are ALL ONE IN CHRIST JESUS.

The site of the ancient assembly is incomparable for grandeur with that of the modern Convention; and in such surroundings we can scarcely fail to attain to some understanding of those souls who as it were but yesterday made articulate for us with new forms of worship the dumb influences that awed our fathers into the choice of such temple-sites as this. What Wordsworth attempted with sonnets, that these old priests had meant with rows of stones. They saw God on the mountain peaks, in the deep sky spaces, and the open fields; and they built altars to Him where they found Him, and sacrificed to Him of their best and dearest. To-day we look not outwards but within; not the high and holy place, but the humble and contrite heart do we prefer for a temple for Him. So it is without any regret that we pass from these scenes of the ancient nature-cultus to those of to-day's Convention, from the sky-canopied stone-circle among the cloistered hill-tops to the dull canvas meeting-hall in the cramped and crowded roadside building site. And yet in describing the one we have described the other; for the walks and drives, and climbs and views, and ramblings over brake and fell are not less of the Keswick Convention than its mass meetings and its platform utterances. Is there a dell in these valleys that is not consecrated to the memory of some secret prayer from a heart at unrest seeking God? Is there a rock on any hill-top that has not served as an altar of some sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving, or echoed with the refrain of some favourite hymn? Blencathra has been for how many their mount of vision? Transfigurations have taken place on Latrigg. Not Mount Zion itself has such a wealth of sacred associations in some hearts as Helvellyn; and these little hills rejoice on every side. Call it all, if you like, Psychopathic imaginations. It is these things that invest a place with a character we call sacred. Mecca for some; for others, Benares; for many Jerusalem; for a few, Keswick.

About the "foolish superstitions" of any of these places it is an easy matter for the spectator, according to temperament, to wax humorous or indignant. But the "superstitions" explain nothing; they count for nothing. If there is anything of value to the life of a people to be gathered at such assemblages it must be in spite of, not because of them.

Origin of the Convention.

The Keswick Convention is the outcome of an effort, dating some thirty years back, to bring about a "deepening of the spiritual life" of professing Christians; in other and familiar phrase, to induce them to walk more worthily of their high calling in Christ Jesus. Transplanted from its original foundations in certain mission meetings held at Oxford, it was by the late Vicar of Keswick converted into an annual gathering in his parish, which has now just met for the twenty-eighth time, larger, more enthusiastic, more hopeful than ever. To say that approximately six thousand people attend the annual gathering is far from conveying an adequate idea of the scope of its influence. They come from all parts of the world. A large proportion are teachers; very many are clergy; some are missionaries. If you ask them why they come they will give you various replies, all more or less worthy of their coming; but for the most part it will be that they may "get a lift"; that they may "wait on God"; that they may have a "time of refreshing." It is easy to use such phrases and not mean anything very definite or intelligible by them. But there is earnestness of purpose at Keswick not to be concealed by the mass of mere affectation. This is the temper and attitude of the audiences.

Many Influences at Work.

But individual influence is multiplied by the Press in an enormous aggregate output of publications directly or indirectly disseminating the speeches made at the gatherings.

There are other media by which such influence is transmitted; not the least being the large number of missionary and other philanthropic societies which take occasion by the Convention to hold simultaneous meetings, more or less loosely affiliated to the Convention itself; which has come in fact to stand for the synthesis of all "evangelical" activity throughout the country. It has also a world-wide propaganda, and the reception and dismissal of its delegates is a remarkable feature of its annual meeting. The form the proceedings take is a series of meetings extending over ten days (with a tendency to become a fortnight), of which all the principal are held in two tents, each seating more than two thousand persons, and admitting to audience several further hundreds.

The Tents of Meeting.

The principal tent occupies a vacant building site in Eskin-street; the other a meadow with some pleasant outlook beyond, upon the nearer hills; and both are similarly furnished and equipped.

Over the main doors and platform of each is scrolled the Convention's motto, "All One in Christ Jesus." From the three mast-heads above the ridge-pole of each float the three flags, respectively inscribed with "Love" and "Joy" and "Peace." It is a sight to warm the heart of the spectator, who, in his darker moments, is too often tempted to "despair of the Republic," to say, "As for this Christianity we wot not what has become of it." Surely it is at last something new under the sun. Moses indeed pitched a tabernacle for God's worship in the wilderness, and a more multitudinous congregation gathered to its precincts. But when in history was any tabernacle pitched in any wilderness beneath such a motto and such flags as these, that could gather its thousands to their daily watch and worship?

Thousands there and elsewhere.

This is how we might be moved to rhapsodies, were it not that the mixed world which sends its six thousand to Keswick sends its six million or so to Mrs. Eddy, to Theosophist gatherings, to Spiritualist "circles"; and no folly is so great but that some few thousands of its "all sorts" can be found by the puzzled world to give it a numerical respectability.

Nevertheless, at the soberest estimate, the Keswick Convention as viewed from this standpoint, from the outside, in the body of it, is a thing to be glad of, to inspire one with a new sense of worth in life by reason of its mere existence.

The many Meetings.

These hundred or so of meetings—general, evangelistic, missionary, devotional; for ministers, for Bible-study; for ladies, girls, growing men or children; in tents, in public halls, in churches, chapels, private apartments; in the open market-place—who shall say what they have meant? Not always good, not good only; but good, and much good.

But a picture of the Keswick Convention is not to be pourtrayed by a mere catalogue of special features. For the time being Keswick is the Convention and the Convention is Keswick. The influx of so many visitors into a little town of a normal population of not more than two-thirds of their number is in itself sufficient to transform the character of the district.

When the character of the immigration is such as it is, the effect is a condition of things that appeals to some of its people in the aspect of "a little millennium."

The Effect on Keswick.

Those less familiar with eschatological anticipations are not less impressed by the change that has come over the spirit of the dream of this pleasantly dreamy little township. For a fortnight per annum Keswick is very wide awake; and more things result to the life of the neighbourhood than can be handled in parenthesis.

Not the least noticeable feature is the orderly character of the local "crowd." A whole generation have grown up familiarised with the Convention. It has none of that inducement to facetiousness which novelty produces on the men of Belial in all places.

The townsfolk attend the meetings in their hundreds. The Salvation Army takes occasion for a little incidental skirmishing and produces its latest sensation. In the present case it is a "Converted Burglar," who harangues the curious in convict uniform—or as colourable an imitation as may pass scrutiny of the law.

Men and women with Bible under arm are encountered at all moments in every street. They are buttonholing one another at all corners that each to each may declare "what God hath wrought."

The air vibrates from open casements, through floors, through ceilings, from harmoniums, pianos, even from street musicians, with hymn tunes of that pensive, sometimes lugubrious, character, which seems to be the natural expression of a certain type of devotional fervour. Mystic initials—the cognisance of various religious societies—S.V.M.U., or S.A.G.M., &c.—head placards or locate the quarters of representatives in lodging-houses or hotels.

Such a gathering is not to be without much organisation; and it is perhaps significant of the perfection to which the organisation has attained that its machinery is so little in evidence.

A block of two houses belongs to the trustees. In these between the sessions the various properties, seats, &c., are, so far as may be, stored; and during session they are thrown open as club-rooms and offices for the convenience of officials and visitors.

The Sale of Books.

There are two large book-stalls called par excellence of the Convention; and as a check upon the importunities of Mammon an area is delimited within which "all book-hawking is forbidden." Beyond these barriers the street cries are "Life of Faith!" "Hymn-books!" "Marked Testaments," and so forth; and a series of extemporised shops, mostly representative of religious publication firms, occupies a space just beyond the precincts of the principal tent. At Ephesus it was thus that the stalls of the men who made shrines for Diana encroached upon the Temple approaches. And there is more in the analogy than we have space to elaborate, nor can we quote the list of names. But why is Essex Hall not of them?

Six thousand people gathered together to sing hymns, pray and worship the Bible, and do all that in them lies to promote the hymn-singing, prayer, and Bible-worship throughout the world: such is the Keswick Convention! What else it is, following papers will attempt to suggest.

A BIT OF EDUCATION HISTORY.

In the Christian Reformer, October, 1847, there is a notice of A Plan for the Establishment of a General System of Secular Education in the County of Lancaster. This plan was proposed by a "number of gentlemen of various denominations"; in essence it anticipates that which is now asked for by all, or nearly all, undenominationalists. "The merits of voluntary effort are duly acknowledged, but its insufficiency maintained."

The plan adopted by the Government for aiding voluntary effort is, we conceive, in one essential respect, imperfect, considered apart from the conscientious objections which are felt to it by great numbers of Dissenters. The Government gives money in proportion to the amount raised by voluntary subscription; and must therefore be granted in an inverse ratio to the necessities of the people.

And what was the principle advocated in 1847 by these Lancashire gentlemen?

We believe that the only fair and equitable mode of raising and apportioning public money for the purposes of education is to give to the people themselves, in their various localities, the power of taxing all equally, and of exercising control over the expenditure.

After a lapse of fifty-five years we are still found contending for this principle. Though the schools proposed upon this plan were to be called secular, the moral and devotional parts of the Bible were to be used and read in them. The scheme for the selection of readings which the Christian Reformer describes as equitable, we should rather call fanciful and impracticable. The County Board was to appoint a Committee of nine individuals (for this purpose only) no two of whom should be of the same religious denomination. A selection of readings having been made, the Committee would be dissolved. But as no single passage could be selected if objected to by the representative of any one of the nine different denominations, we are disposed to think that if the Committee had been appointed it might be sitting still. But this was only a detail, and generally speaking no difficulty has been found in Board schools in settling this matter.

The Christian Reformer hoped that the Government might take a leaf out of this book, and concluded its notice by saying, "the Lancashire plan is, we believe, too wide and just for the 'religious world' par excellence; which should, however, be its recommendation to the Government, whose great fault has hitherto been the attempt to satisfy religious demands, instead of simply avoiding religious offence."

LITERATURE.

AT THE LAKES.*

Mr. Collingwood's book is not an ordinary Guide to the Lakes. Taking its place in a series of County Guides, it follows, indeed, the general plan of the series, which includes a brief, but useful, gazetteer of the district dealt with, and special chapters, by various writers, on its natural history and sport. These together make up nearly half of the volume, and we may note in passing a delightful chapter on the Birds of the Lake Counties, by Mary L. Armitt. Among the chapters on sport, which include yachting, angling and cycling, there is one in which a fox-hunting parson writes with unmistakable enthusiasm on his own special sport among the fells, and another on "Mountaineering," which will be eagerly scanned by aspirants to the honours of roped gymnastics and the glories of "climbers' gullies."

But it is with Mr. Collingwood's own part of the "Guide" that we are specially concerned. It is not, as we have said, a guide in the technical sense. The "Thorough" will still be required by those who look for minute directions as to routes, and in the ascent of the chief mountains want to be told which gate to go through, and how the track will behave itself at every turn. What Mr. Collingwood offers is something very different. His book is the best introduction, so far as our knowledge goes, to the Lake District as a whole, giving in the pleasantest manner a very true impression of the character of the country and of the great wealth of beauty and manifold interest it contains. To be "personally conducted" is not always a pleasant process, but with Mr. Collingwood we are very safe, and indeed are unusually privileged. A native of the Lake country, whose home is at Coniston, a friend of Ruskin's, and himself an artist, he becomes our companion, and takes us, in a series of eight itineraries, through the whole of the three Lake counties, North Lancashire, Westmoreland and Cumberland, chatting delightfully all the time, showing us the things most worth seeing, both of scenery and places, and telling us the things most worth knowing about a district rich in associations of the past and of more recent times. And it should be specially noted that we are not confined to the "Lake district," properly and strictly so-called, which lies within a circle of about thirty miles across, but are led at the same time through "a fringe of hill-country, full of charming scenery, full of interesting story, which is far less known than it deserves"; and thus penetrating without undue haste to the heart of the district, we learn to appreciate, much more fully, its central glories.

Our first glimpse of the Lake hills is across the sands as the train from the south passes Hestbank, after leaving Lancaster, and then we start with our guide on foot from Burton and Holme, the station just north of Camforth, and passing Milnthorpe, and Levens Hall and Kendal, find ourselves already in a beautiful country, of which our companion has many interesting things to tell, and so come to Windermere with mind and heart fully prepared for that wonderful scene, which is unfolded when one comes to the brow of Orrest Head. Or we may choose to approach the Lakes from the Lancashire or Cumberland coast, skirting Morecambe Bay, taking Grange and Cartwell and Furness Abbey on the way, and so to Coniston; or still holding to the coast, make the circle to Black Combe, and then from Ravenglass penetrate into Eskdale and so into the very heart of the great hills. This is one of the finest approaches, and our guide wisely lingers in that border-land by the coast, from which the magnificent range of the Wasdale hills is seen, and where is also Calder Abbey, with other relics of the past, such as the old cross in Gosforth churchyard, standing fourteen feet high, blending in its imagery the emblems of Christian faith and Norse mythology.

With vivid imagination Mr. Collingwood pictures for us the Roman Camp on the ascent out of Eskdale to Hardknott Pass, and then penetrating further up the dale, he thus describes the scene:

Hence upwards Eskdale is a glorious wilderness. Dungeon Gill and Wasdale-head Hotels are the nearest houses, five miles as the crow flies, but with Bowfell in the way of the one and Scafell in the way of the other: due north it is more than six miles in a bee-line to Seathwaite in Borrowdale over Esk Hause. You can play at being lost, and imagine a great lone land; yet the heights and distances are only big enough to give the illusion for a few hours' ramble, and you are sure—barring accidents—to come down somewhere into civilisation before nightfall. We have no other bit of wild country like this, and hitherto it has not been spoiled for the purpose of a playground by too much meddling. A very little path-making and setting up of sign-posts would take away the charm of finding your own road, attacking Nature single-handed, which is the one thing that gives our homeland an advantage over more stupendous Alps, where you must take a guide, or more extensive mountain tracts where you cannot go without a whole caravan.

Among those hills, climbing up towards Scafell Pike, our highest English summit, many wonderful things are to be seen, and especially if the morning clouds are wreathed about the hills. You may be disappointed of the final view from the top, but there are other things not less worth seeing in the "drama of mountain gloom and mountain glory." Of this, our artist-lover of the hills is well fitted to speak:—

Possibly, if it is so minded, the sun may help and throw blazing searchlights on green and gold and lilac, or dewy rainbows, or even the rare fog-bow, with your shadow in the centre, the true Brocken Spectre; possibly, climbing higher still, as you follow the frequent cairns that lead to the topmost cairn of the Pike, you may feel the blue overhead penetrating the vapour, and at once stand above a waving sea of opalescence, with islands of hardly recognisable peaks blocked on the silent void. I have seen these things when folk below were kicking their heels and grumbling at the weather; but even if there is nothing but rain and rain, with a map and a compass, and some habit of mountain walking—without which the fear of being lost overbalances the pleasure—even then there is a delight in wandering here, through the heart of the hills, far beyond the easy amusements of the sunny roads and lake shores.

Another glimpse of the joy of mountain walks Mr. Collingwood gives in the Ennerdale Itinerary, which includes Buttermere and Crummock. There, speaking of the walk from Scarth Gap along the ridge of High Stile to Red Pike, he says:—

The Lake mountains have a trick of giving you backs, grassy ridges connecting summit with summit, easy and pleasant walking on springy turf or nearly level scree, where the air seems to lift you along, and the changing view lends an impression of great speed and getting over an amazing range of country. Such walks one can find along the backs of Coniston Fells, the Crinkle Crag range, the Wastwater Screes, this Red Pike group, and perhaps best of all on Helvellyn, where you get six miles of grass above the 2,500-foot contour line, with only a slight break at the Sticks Hause. This is the compensation for our want of Alpine peaks; for the practical purpose of health-giving exercise, no fancy climbing can touch the high-level stroll.

Such passages as these furnish the best evidence of the quality of Mr. Collingwood's book, and we will add to them two others, to show that his delight in the valleys belong and by the shores or on the lakes themselves is no less keen.

Buttermere, to most people, is only a halt for luncheon and boat to Scale Force, after the excitement of Borrowdale and the Seatoller Hause, and before the rather weary homeward ride to Keswick. But I always think of this valley as made by Heaven for summer evenings and summer mornings; green floor and purple heights, with the sound of waters under the sunset, or lit with the low north-eastern sun into pure colour above, and the greyness of the dew upon the grass.

Our last quotation is, perhaps, the most characteristic of all, because with its appreciation of the natural beauty is blended the thought of historic associations, so constantly in our companion's mind. Throughout our journeyings he helps us to see the country peopled once more by its old inhabitants, whether Roman legionaries, or early settlers from the Northern seas, the monks of Furness or the independent dalesmen of a later time, or finally the poets and other distinguished men, who have added so much of personal interest to the country which they made their home.

Coniston Water is a singular instance of nature's vis medicatrix, the way she heals old sores. Along the beach and in every little dell where an unfailing streamlet runs down, there used to be iron furnaces (bloomeries), where small charges of ore, brought on pack-horses and boats from Low Furness, were smelted with charcoal. At one time the woods were nearly destroyed, and we can imagine a period when the barren hills were only varied by smoking "pitsteads," where charcoal was made, and flaming "hearths" where grimy workers toiled at the bellows, or shovelled the red ore and black coals, with shouts and rattling, and the thud of the little water-wheels that worked the hammers and drove the blast. Perhaps not all the scene was at any one time so filled, but that was the character of the place. And now there is no such dainty frondage and foliage, no such utter peace and stillness, as in the coves and crannies of the water's edge, where softly rowing you may start the otter and the kingfisher, and hear no noise but the splash of the leaping trout, and the distinguishable call of many streams—this one tinkling, that one gurgling, and one beyond belling through the woods, and another across half a mile of water chattering over the stones and roaring down its coppice-hidden ravine.

Mr. Collingwood's enthusiasm for his native north-country is delightful, and he may be assured that many readers will enjoy and be grateful for his companionship.

The maps are sufficient for the purpose of the book, but for practical use cannot, of course, take the place of the ordnance maps. The illustrations by Mr. Cuthbert Rigby are not all equally successful. Of the slight sketches in the text the best are perhaps those which contain bits of old buildings; the full-page illustrations give more of the spirit of the lake-country, and especially those of Crummock and Buttermere, and the frontispiece, which is the view of Derwentwater and Bassenthwaite from the Watendlath bridge.

LOYALTY TO TRUTH.

We have received from the Rev. W. Mellor, of Huddersfield, a letter commenting on the Rev. Frank Walters' sermon, from which we published some passages last week on the case of Dr. Agar Beet. Though "completely and cordially" approving of the main principle of that sermon, Mr. Mellor yet thinks that we should do better to attend rather to our own disloyalties, to some of which he refers at length. The following is the conclusion of his letter:—

"Though Mr. Walters suggests the only possible remedy for such disloyalties, whether at home or abroad, in the renunciation of 'sectarianism and all its works,' yet he cannot fail to know that the sectarian, not to say sectional, attitude of himself and many others, in their endless talk about 'Unitarianism as the religion of the future,' and their persistent attempts to convert, or pervert, an essentially Free Church into a Unitarian sect, are utterly alien to the non-sectarian panacea he thus prescribes for the disloyalties he deplores. I do not forget that all who speak and act thus try to get out of their own inconsistency, not to say disloyalty, by vainly, illogically, and desperately contending that 'Unitarianism is not sectionalism,' and that 'a Unitarian Church and a Free Church are one and the same thing.' It is palpably a bootless enterprise they are thus engaged in, and can only end in adding one inconsistency, contradiction, or disloyalty to another, ad infinitum. Let Mr. Walters and his friends dare to be absolutely loyal to the remedy he has himself now suggested for all the grave disloyalties he deplores in other Churches, and which some of us equally deplore in our own, and then there will be some real chance both for our own Churches and others in this supreme question of 'Loyalty to Truth.'

"Meanwhile, I do not feel at all able to fully judge of 'the sad case of Dr. Agar Beet' on its own merits, not having seen anything like a full report either of the charge brought against him or of his self-defence. Knowing, however, as I do, a great deal more, in general, of Methodism and its ministers than many of their present judges know, I am inclined to believe that both Dr. Beet and the Wesleyan denomination to which he belongs are making as much theological and kindred progress as is possible to them, and are, at least, as conspicuous for 'loyalty to truth' as we ourselves are. 'Look at home' and 'Physician heal thyself' are both thus words in season to us if we did but know it."

ECCLESIASTICISM AND POLITICS IN SCOTLAND.

Recent events arising out of the union of the United Presbyterian and Free Churches of Scotland provide much food for reflection in connection with modern Scottish ecclesiastical controversy, and serve to show that at least one section of the Scottish people is distinctly hostile to any change whatsoever in its ecclesiastical institutions. When the union of the two great Scottish dissenting bodies was agreed to, and finally marked by a great united demonstration in Edinburgh, influences representing a hostile minority began to manifest the bitterness of the opposition which existed in certain parts of the Highlands to the newly celebrated union. Indignation meetings were held in various districts, protests were recorded, and in some cases clergymen favourable to the union were attacked in the most outrageous manner. From this stubborn opposition to a change in the mere matter of Church organisation, it is clear that the old covenanting spirit is far from dead among the Scots. The great fight for freedom from the yoke of Rome made a deep impression on the Scottish people It made them alert in watching, and active in checking, anything which appeared to them to be an encroachment upon their freedom, and that alertness and activity have remained potent factors in the Scottish mind. For a long period, however, there has been little to disturb the religious feelings of the Scots, and each section of the community has gone on in its own groove, exercising a spirit of tolerance towards others, and in turn enjoying complete immunity from outside interference. But it is evident that the condition of theological quietude which has so long existed in Scotland will be disturbed in the near future. In addition to the anti-union movement which has been agitating certain parts of the country, there is a broader, a deeper, and an infinitely more serious controversy spreading throughout the land. It is the Higher Criticism controversy. Though this controversy bearing on the authenticity of certain parts of the Old Testament is not, in any sense, of latter-day origin, it may fairly be said that it has only in recent years become a question of serious contention within the Church itself.

The higher critics are extending the sphere of theological criticism. The views contained in the "Encyclopædia Biblica" are becoming known, and are being discussed widely among Church people. It is gradually being recognised that certain thinkers inside the Church "are disintegrating the Old Testament and, to some extent, discrediting the New"; that they are shaking the foundations of the Christian Church, and must, as they proceed, shake the faith of the people in the inspiration and absoluteness of the Biblical account of the creation. In some quarters there is, at present, displayed something bordering on consternation. It is being realised that the old doctrines are seriously assailed from within the Church; that an attempt is being made to modify the creed of the Church in relation to the fundamental basis of theology.

When the controversy becomes anything like general, something approaching an ecclesiastical revolution is bound to take place. The Evangelical party who accept the Bible literally as an infallible book will come into conflict with the Broad Church party, who call in reason to aid authority, and there will be a violent controversy over the views of the compilers of the new Encyclopædia. To the layman there will be great interest in the controversy. He will behold the great evolutionary principle at work in the thought of the Church, "tending to weaken the influence of dogmatic Christianity" in discounting the Mosaic theory of the origin of man.

In the assault on the old theological strongholds by those who might have been expected to be their defenders, the layman will detect evidences of the decay of ecclesiasticism, and signs of the development of a rationalising force within the Church. He will foresee a slackening of the disputations over supernatural and ultra-rational conceptions and a good augury of a greater spirit of tolerance in religious matters, which in turn can hardly fail to exercise a beneficial influence on political and social progress.

After all, the religious and the political questions have always been closely associated in Scotland, and any recognition of the need for a broadening of the religious outlook means a corresponding recognition of the necessity for a like broadening of the political purview. The robust liberalism of Scotland in the early days of the last century owed its existence largely to the influence of the religious movement, as philosophic radicalism was due, to a considerable extent, to the broad religious convictions of certain thinkers whose works were much read.

In ecclesiastical matters, as in political matters, the present time may be called a great transitionary period; the disintegrating influences which always precede the great integrating forces are actively at work in religious and political thought in Scotland. A spirit of active controversy is abroad in religion and in politics, and is threatening to rend all cohesion. In politics the parties are intermingling in such a way that it is difficult to detect evidence of any well-defined political principle in their organisation. Then, in the field of economics new forces are at work which are tending to change orthodox ideas of the social organisation of the classes. The old economic doctrines are being attacked. It is being insisted, on all hands, that the people must have a political creed which will fulfil the requirements of the time. The development of industrialism has accentuated the social needs of the people, and it is contended that if there is no attempt made to bring the principles of the old progressive party up to date, so to speak, a new party will be created. That the germs which will one day develop into an organic force are alive in the political atmosphere, no serious student of the political condition of the time doubts; and that such an organic force in politics will play havoc with existing economic and social conditions is very clear. Since Gladstone's time there has been no people's party in the country. Liberalism has been allowed "to stagnate in the weeds of sloth, without a conscience or an aim," and Democracy has been outraged in the interval. Great Britain, and more so Scotland, is the natural soil for the development of the true democratic spirit. Scotland's religious experiences have fitted it well for such. The Scots are not only among the greatest lovers of free institutions, but they have been among the most successful in gaining free institutions, and the most active in using them to the full. Scotland demanded greater religious freedom. She obtained, and has enjoyed it.

Moreover, she has learned to appreciate the necessity for political and social freedom; and one day, out of the activity of religious thought, which in turn develops lively political thought, may come a movement which will surprise the political world.

To some the religious controversy among Scottish Highlanders on matters of Church organisation, and among Scottish theological thinkers on questions of dogma, may appear to be deplorable, but these influences do but demonstrate the spirit of the people. "The Scots," said Macaulay, "are a people who will always exercise a powerful influence on the conduct of affairs." There is need that such an influence should be exerted in present-day politics. It will be exerted, and that in the near future. Then will it be seen that the moral and mental robustness which the Scots built up in their religious controversies will exercise a profound influence on the political conflict of the future.

The spirit of freedom of thought and action in religion is akin to the spirit of liberty in politics; and it is this spirit, and this spirit only, which can democratise political institutions, give expression to the inarticulate desire for a broader school of political thought, and for a more democratic and more humane condition of social life.

It is because they love independence and are jealous of any encroachment on the religious freedom for which their fathers laid down their lives that the Highlanders resist the union of the Churches; it is because of their consciousness of the influence of the time-spirit that certain theological thinkers are endeavouring to broaden thought within the Church through theological criticism; and it will be because of the lack of social freedom, through economic inequality, resulting from the inordinate development of an artificial and one-sided industrial era that the coming political renaissance will come about.

In these days it is difficult at times to detect the progressive tendency in society, as an organic development, so great and so many are the impeding influences; but, nevertheless, the current of events is unmistakable. The evolutionary principle in social development is eternal, and like all natural tendencies, it goes on more freely than ever when the influence of the course of time sweeps aside the impeding obstacles. Robert Gunn Davis.

Archbishop Whately used to say, "Throw dirt enough, and some will stick;" well, will stick, but not stain. I think he used to mean "stain," and I do not agree with him. Some dirt sticks longer than other dirt; but no dirt is immortal. According to the old saying, Prævalebit veritas.—John Henry Newman.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

A Great Kingdom.

There is a beautiful kingdom, one of the largest in the world, and the dwellers in it are always bright and happy; not that sorrow and anxiety pass them by altogether, but they receive their troubles as friends, not as enemies, as something from which they are to get some good, not as evils, which will blight and mar their lives.

They look always on the bright side of things, and so in this kingdom one always sees bright and happy faces, and it seems as if there was everlasting sunshine and no storm clouds at all in that happy land.

Now, these people spend their time much as the rest of the world does: working and playing, learning and teaching; but they never waste any time, for when their special duty is done, they find their greatest joy in trying to help their friends and neighbours, and even their enemies, if they should happen to have any.

There is a strange thing about these people, and that is that one part of them never grows old; their hearts are always young and fresh, even when their bodies are worn and weary with age and toil.

Over this kingdom there reigns a Queen; always young and beautiful is she, and her subjects are ever ready and eager to obey her smallest wish. She rules her people with kindness and gentleness as long as they go about their work cheerfully and faithfully, and are helpful and kind to their companions; but if any are unfaithful to duty or selfish or unkind, then they can no longer be dwellers in her lovely land, and, with sorrow, she sends them from her, until they have learnt to do better.

This good and beautiful Queen has many enemies, who are constantly trying to win the hearts of her subjects away from her, and she and her people require to be always on guard against these foes, for they are cunning and treacherous, and may come any hour of the day or night. But the queen has a son, strong and handsome, who is always watchful in times of danger to help her and her people to overcome aad drive back their enemies.

It happened one day that all the Queen's enemies took counsel together how they might put an end, once for all, to this kingdom, which they so much disliked.

They determined to collect all their forces and make one mighty effort to accomplish their purpose. They fixed on a day when they had reason to believe that the Queen and her son would be absent, for they felt sure they would then have little difficulty to evercome.

When prepared for war they were indeed a formidable host, and the hearts of many of the Queen's subjects failed them as they saw this great army advancing against them. And to make matters worse, their Queen and her son were not to be found anywhere. What was to be done?

Many threw themselves on the ground and gave themselves up for lost. "Alas! Alas!" they cried, "our Queen and our Prince have deserted us in our time of need; we are lost indeed, for without them we can do nothing." And although others tried to cheer and encourage them to make some effort to save themselves and the honour of their Queen, they still continued their lament.

By this time the enemy was close upon them and all seemed indeed lost, when suddenly their Prince rushed into their midst crying, "Up! Up! my people. Face your enemies like brave men. I will lead you to victory."

This gave the weak-hearted strength and hope, and in a moment the Queen's people were standing in line ready to receive the attack of the advancing foe.

Just then the Queen herself appeared on the height, where all could see her. She smiled encouragement to her son and his followers, and the sight of her so filled their hearts with hope and love that when their enemies rushed upon them they stood firm and immovable as a rock; and finally the victory was theirs.

The enemy was driven back, but not destroyed. Still the people have to be on their guard, for fresh attacks may be made at any time. But in spite of this, the Queen's subjects are a happy people, and, what is better still, bring happiness with them wherever they go.

Surely this is a kingdom to which we should all like to belong. Well, I can tell you its name and where to find it, and the name of its Queen and of her son, and you can all belong to it at once, if you will.

This kingdom is to be found everywhere all the world over; all may live in it, old and young, rich and poor. It is called "The Kingdom of Loving Hearts." The Queen's name is "Loving Kindness," and her son's name is "Courage."

As to the enemies, if I name them you will know that we must be on our guard against them. There are Selfishness, Greed, Idleness, Cruelty, Untruthfulness, Thoughtlessness, and many others.

But hearts filled with Loving Kindness and Courage will enable us to conquer them all. J. H. M.

Who is the happy Warrior? Who is he
That every man in arms should wish to be?
It is the generous Spirit, who, when brought
Among the tasks of real life, hath wrought
Upon the plan that pleased his boyish thought:
Whose high endeavours are an inward light
That makes the path before him always bright:

. . . . .

Whose powers shed round him in the common strife,
Or mild concerns of ordinary life,
A constant influence, a peculiar grace;
But who, if he be called upon to face
Some awful moment to which Heaven has joined Great issues, good or bad for human kind,
Is happy as a Lover; and attired
With sudden brightness, like a man inspired;
And, through the heat of conflict, keeps the law
In calmness made, and sees what he foresaw:

. . . . .

Who, whether praise of him must walk the earth
For ever, and to noble deeds give birth,
Or he must fall, to sleep without his fame,
And leave a dead unprofitable name—
Finds comfort in himself and in his cause;
And while the mortal mist is gathering, draws
His breath in confidence of Heaven's applause:
This is the happy Warrior: this is he
That every man in arms should wish to be.

LONDON, AUGUST 30, 1902.

VACATION SCHOOLS.

THE PASSMORE EDWARDS Settlement in Tavistock-place is happy, under the inspiration of Mrs. HUMPHRY WARD, in having been able to set before this country two object-lessons of the highest value in the matter of popular education, each in its own way making a distinct contribution to the happiness and well-being of the least fortunate among our city children.

First came the school for crippled children, to take its place side by side with the ordinary day schools, and distinct from the special schools for mentally defective children. The Settlement School was the first of its kind to be established under the authority of the London School Board, and having shown what could be done, opened the way for a wide extension of this most beneficent work. And now a second experiment has been brought to a successful conclusion, and it has been demonstrated for the first time in this country how happy are the results of a Vacation School carried out on a plan which after some years of private effort has become a recognised part of the American school system. We noted three weeks ago that such a school had been opened for the present holiday month at the PASSMORE EDWARDS Settlement, and in The Times of Aug. 6 an account of the school was given, in a report of the meeting held to celebrate the inauguration of this work in England. In Tuesday's Times a fuller account of the experiment appeared, by Mrs. HUMPHRY WARD, giving a delightful picture of the school and summing up the results of the four weeks' work.

The idea of the school is to provide some regular hours of happy and wholesome occupation for the poorest children of the city during the summer-holiday, when otherwise they would be merely idling about the hot and crowded streets, and naturally getting very little good. The children's country holiday movement is of the utmost benefit to many, but even if that movement were extended far beyond its present proportions, there would still, as Mrs. WARD points out, be many thousands of children in London to whom such Vacation Schools would be "almost a boon of fairyland."

In New York and Boston and other American cities this work, as we have said, is no longer an experiment. Last year, in greater New York alone there were twenty-eight such schools at work. What this means in America Mrs. WARD tells in the following passage of her Times article :—

> This year, in New York alone, nearly 24,000 children have been gathered into Vacation Schools, while for some 46,000 more organised play, swimming, gymnastics, and kindergarten occupations, under trained teachers, have been provided in the school playgrounds, the recreation piers, swimming baths, outdoor gymnasiums, and park kindergartens. Very encouraging reports of the Vacation Schools and playgrounds in different parts of the States during the last four years are now forthcoming, and it is interesting to see how, originating as they did in private effort, they are now being taken over more and more by the public authority, paid for out of public money, and supported by an enthusiastic public opinion. A lady writing from Boston speaks of the general satisfaction felt in the development of the Vacation Schools there, of the light they throw on many educational problems, of the happiness of the children attending them. A New York paper which has just reached me speaks of the good effect of the schools on the health of the crowded districts, and insists that "no other expenditure by the city provides anything like a proportionate amount of happiness to the children."

The school at the Settlement was organised at short notice, and this year's August weather was a great drawback; the distractions of Bank Holiday and the Coronation, and school-treats, have also to be taken into account; but considering that the attendance of the children was entirely voluntary, the figures alone are a good test of the success of the effort. In the first week the attendance ranged from 374 to 514, and in the third week rose once to 606; in the last week, on Monday, which was very wet, it was 498, and on the closing day 563. In the announcement inviting their attendance at the school children were told that it would be as unlike regular school as possible, and all that was asked of them was that they should be "obedient, orderly, unselfish, and happy." This last they certainly were, and altogether the order and good conduct seem to have been beyond all expectation. There was constant variety of occupation, and evidently there was very capable management. The effect was not confined to school hours, for one of the staff, visiting some neighbouring buildings, reported the opinion of the mothers :—"Never such a holiday! There was no fighting; the children were always happy and always clean."

The programme was to meet, on the five school-days of the week, from 10 to 12.30 and from 5 to 7.30. Capable teachers were provided, under admirable direction, and the subjects taught were manual training, housewifery, needlework, nature study (botany), gymnastic and musical drill, kindergarten games, drawing and brushwork, stories from history, mythology, fairy tales, &c., singing, dancing, clay modelling, and use of library. (This last with a teacher in a special room.) The garden as well as the class-rooms was used, and the plan was for each child to be alternately indoors and in the garden for successive classes, but the weather unfortunately prevented this from being fully carried out. Yet the arrangements worked with wonderful smoothness, and the children thoroughly enjoyed their novel experience.

One other passage from Mrs. WARD's article we cannot forbear from reproducing here, picturing as it does so vividly the contrast between vacation in the street and in this happy school :—

> Last Thursday afternoon a lady interested in the school was passing through one of the slum streets to the west of Tottenham-court-road. Much good work has been done there by many agencies. But in August most of the workers are away. Dirty, ragged, fighting, or querulous children covered the pavement, or seemed to be bursting out of the grimy houses. The street was filthy, the clothes of the children to match. There was no occupation; the little souls were given up to "the weight of chance desires"; and whatever happiness there was must have been of rather a perilous sort. The same spectator passed on, and half a mile eastward entered the settlement building in Tavistock-place. Here were nearly 600 children divided between house and garden, many of them from quarters quite as poor as those she had just traversed. But all was order, friendliness, and enjoyment. Every child was clean and neat, though the clothes might be poor; if a boy brushed past the visitor it would be with a pleasant "Excuse me, Miss"; in the manual training-room boys looked up from the benches with glee to show the models they had made; the drawing-room of the settlement was full of little ones busy with the unfamiliar delights of brush or pencil; in the library boys were sitting hunched up over "Masterman Ready," or the ever-adored "Robinson Crusoe"; girls were deep in "Andersen's Fairy Tales," or the "Cuckoo Clock"; the little ones were reading Mr. Stead's "Books for the Bairns," or looking at pictures; outside in the garden under the trees clay modelling and kindergarten games were going on, while the sand-pit was crowded with children enjoying themselves heartily without either shouting or fighting. Meanwhile in the big hall parents were thronging in to see the musical drill, the dancing, or the acting, or to listen to the singing; the fathers as proud as the mothers that Willie was "in the Shakespeare," or Nellie "in the Gavotte." The visitor had only to watch to see that the teachers were obeyed at a word, at a glance, and that the children loved to obey. Everywhere was discipline, good temper, pleasure. And next day the school broke up with the joining of 600 voices in the old hymn, "O God, our help in ages past." Surely no contrast could be more complete.

This first experiment, while so abundantly successful, has suggested to the workers points for further development. The constant variety of occupation and change of scene evidently contributed greatly to the success of the school and the happy order which prevailed; and yet, as Mrs. WARD says, "the girls wanted more time for cooking, washing, and needlework; and the bigger boys clamoured for more than one whole morning in a week in the manual training-room. The younger children left their building or sand geography in the sandpit with sighs of regret; and in general the kindergarten side might have been extended."

It may be possible in future to divide the school into sections, so that boys and girls and the little ones may each have more of their own special interests. And yet, Mrs. WARD adds, "for boys and girls alike all that tells merely on manners and imagination has immense value; and the singing, brushwork, dancing, story-telling, acting, and library hour must on no account be omitted."

The cost of the school for these four vacation weeks (with the loan of desks and other apparatus and the purchase of materials at cost price from the School Board, and no rent to pay) seems to work out at about 2s. a head per week, which is the estimated weekly cost per child in the New York and Chicago schools. For needful considerations in regard to the teachers' holidays we must refer our readers to Mrs. WARD'S article in The Times. Her appeal for an extension of this work must surely meet with a warm response. The demonstration is complete, and we must be grateful for the ready sympathy and generous imagination which, aided by much patient and unselfish work, have opened this new way of helpfulness, so rich in promise for the children's happiness.

AT the last gate, before one reaches the summit of Orrest Head, with its glorious view over Windermere and the great range of the hills beyond, there have recently been placed two blocks of stone, one on either side, bearing the following inscriptions, which tell their own welcome tale of generous thoughtfulness and of a great treasure secured for the public good. On the one side one reads:—

This Stone was placed here in the year 1902 by the inhabitants of Windermere, in remembrance of the wide and beneficent liberality of the late Arthur Henry Heywood, of Elleray, and as a mark of gratitude to his widow and daughter, who, as a memorial of him, dedicated Orrest Head to the use of the Public for ever.

And on the other side are the familiar lines:—

Thou who hast given me eyes to see
And love this sight so fair,
Give me a heart to find out Thee,
And read Thee everywhere.—Keble.

RELIGION IN LOWLY PLACES.

THERE rises before me the vision of a Welsh moorland parish, in which I found myself during a holiday a few years ago. The road I travelled wound before me like a white ribbon unfolded amongst the purple heather. It came from out a sparsely peopled region and led again into a wilderness. Cottages were few and far between; sheep and ponies were the only living things in sight. As I went forward the thunder of the Atlantic dashing against high cliffs filled the air, and, far off, a streak of sunshine lit up the sea.

Presently, at a turn of the road, a clump of trees came into view. Wondering to find them solitary on that wide moor, with no attendant ricks or barns, I turned aside to see what they sheltered. I found a little chapel and a manse. Looking in at the windows of the chapel I saw the pulpit with its crimson cushion tasselled and faded, its well-worn Bible, and the other simple adjuncts of Nonconformist worship. I walked round the small enclosure, trying to decipher the epitaphs on the few weather-beaten gravestones, and paused at the wicket which led into the garden of the manse. Here an old man was giving a mid-day meal to some chickens confined in a wire run. I had time to examine him before he saw me, and was at no loss to find in him the pastor of the church. Thought and the refinement of selflessness were stamped on his face and showed in his air and mien. His dress, much worn but neat, had an old-world air of the ministry about it. When he caught sight of me, he came forward and asked me in to rest in his garden or the house. I accepted the invitation, and we sat together on a bench in an ivy-covered arbour.

We talked of many things, and at last I ventured to ask him how long he had been living there.

"Nearly five-and-thirty years," he said.

"Thirty-five years!" I exclaimed. "Here, twenty miles from a railway station or a library, for thirty-five years! Summer and winter — winter on this moor! Haven't you found it dull sometimes?"

"Dull," echoed he, in turn. "I suppose that is a natural question. Are you dull in a London theatre, when a noble tragedy is being played before you, with all the accompaniments and illusions which art, as I understand, now lends to the stage?"

I replied that I supposed people were not dull in such a time and place.

"Or a comedy?" the old man went on, "or watching a great procession like that of the Diamond Jubilee the other week? or trying to puzzle out the answers to great questions, or in presence of stupendous natural events? A constant succession of these things would keep you from being dull, I apprehend?"

"Forgive me," I begged. "It was a thoughtless question——"

"Nay," said he, "I have no wish to scold you. I only wanted to set your imagination at work. We have tragedy on this moorland, and on the great deep out yonder, and with such scenery and stage effects as no manager could ever emulate. We have comedy, too, sometimes. And great processions move day and night above us and around us. We haven't many books, but we are continually beset by the deepest questions. Why —to give you a very minute illustration— when you first saw me I was thinking that the mystery of the origin of evil was not less a mystery because some evil temper made two chickens fight: but," with a deepening voice, "when it declares itself in human life, and the ruin or salvation of human souls is involved— no, I am not dull here. It is, in fact, here as elsewhere, a hand-to-hand fight against drink and sin in various forms, and against religious bigotry, which reaches us even here. But fighting is fighting, whether you do it in a red coat or a black one, and while you are fighting you cannot be dull."

I learned more about my old friend from my landlady.

"I was 'brought in' under him," she said, "but I can only seldom go to the chapel now, being as it's so far. But he is greatly beloved by the people, and so he ought, for he's been a father to us all. But they're all poor up there, and can do but little towards a stipen'. There's times when he hasn't enough to eat, I'm almost sure. Many wonders at him staying in such a place, with nothing stirring, and he a scholar; and he has had plenty of chances to move away. But he always said 'No; a one-sided old fellow like him was the man for that place.'"

"What does he mean by 'one-sided?'" I asked.

My landlady smiled.

"He's a bachelor, ma'am. Some love trouble in his young days, we understan'. But, anyway, he's gave his life, as one might say, for them people, and they love him like one of theirselves."

And she retired with the tray. But that evening and during many after-days the words, "Five-and-thirty years," dwelt with me, till it almost seemed as if I had lived through their slow succession.

Teufelsdröckh, or his progenitor, Carlyle, was doubtful whether a peasant-saint survived upon the earth in his day. I could take the philosopher to where a band of them are keeping alive the principles of Nonconformity, and making a stand for Christlike living. In a pretty riverside village, gay with flowers in the summer, and gayer still with pleasure-seeking visitors, there stands, retired from the street, a little chapel. The services there and a Sunday-school are kept going mainly by a handful of artizans, gardeners, hinds and domestic servants. Even the tradesmen of the village do not go to the little Bethel, for "the church" is more respectable, and competition is a hard taskmaster. Lay help comes to them on a Sunday from a distance, but they rarely see the face of a minister. When one is free to visit them that is a high day and a holy to the congregation. Attachment to the chapel and its services and the principles for which it stands has cost one and another of them work and wages from time to time; but they are undaunted still, and by sheer force of character they have wrung from prejudice and domination the right to call their souls their own. As in all villages, good workers move off just when, perhaps, they were becoming most useful; but the main body—half-a-dozen! hold together, and will do till death sounds Retire!

I remember one of the half-dozen. A peasant with a high bald forehead and obstinate mouth, but in his eyes a look of ineffable patience and serenity which had only come after many a hard tussle with trouble and many dear-bought victories. He was "difficult to get on with," people said, who were themselves deficient in tact or courtesy, and he was apt to be critical if a preacher drove to chapel who might have walked.

His wife drank, but he maintained a proud reticence about it, and it was long before I found it out. Then I had to make some inquiries.

"Yes, ma'am," he said, the lines round his mouth growing firmer, but the patient kindly look deepening on his face. "Yes, ma'am, its true. That's my wife's affliction."

I heard from others that many a time, after a hard day's work, he had spent the greater part of the night watching his wife, lest, in the violence of a drunken fit, she should raid a neighbour's cottage. But he was always in time to open the chapel on Sunday morning, and it was he who kept its surroundings bright and neat with flowers.

"Sublimer in this world know I nothing than a Peasant Saint. . . . Such a one will take thee back to Nazareth itself; thou wilt see the splendour of Heaven spring forth from the humblest depths of Earth, like a light shining in great darkness."

Only one other outpost will my thought visit to-day—one planted on a wide upland amongst far-reaching masses of woods. Tradition exists of the brigands who, long ago, under cover of the ancient forest, cursed this and the surrounding region, and even a century ago the district was sunk in gross ignorance and depravity. Here during one hundred and eight years four ministers have held the pastorate of a little church—an average of twenty-seven years to each. The village takes its name from a crusader who went out from thence to the Holy Land to recover the earthly tomb of our Lord from the possession of the Saracen. His generous but mistaken zeal and valour will not bear comparison with the heroic fortitude of the men and women who in this hamlet, year in year out, for more than a century have, one after another, fought the good fight, and finished their course. They warred against principalities and powers, the more terrible because unseen, and for a higher reward than access to that grave on which "the Syrian stars look down"—for material to build the living temple of God. When one considers the conditions under which this work has been maintained for Christ, especially during its earlier years, one can only wonder at the brave persistence, the unconquerable resolution which held out against all odds, and in face of every wile and every form of assault which the enemy could devise. The want of books was then felt less than now, when everyone is expected to chatter the terminology of every science, and the few books which stood on the minister's shelf were of the best. It may be the monotony of the life also was less felt at a time when life, except for the wealthiest, was of such even tenor, and leisure was enjoyed leisurably. But the remoteness of the village, the absence of opportunity for intercourse with other ministers, the long waiting for the harvest of souls, must often have tried the faith and courage of both the minister and his wife. I can fancy winter days in that little stronghold, when the long lines of beechwood loomed a solemn purple-brown through the fog, like the battalions of a sinister army investing the hamlet, when poverty, like an emissary of Satan, stood upon the threshold of the manse, and the faces of the children pleaded in the terms of its harsh message—days when the stoutest heart might have trembled and the bravest might have surrendered or fled. But a courage born of high communion upheld the little garrison, and human love brought help. They lived moment by moment till the sun warmed in the heavens, and the fog lifted, and the woods smiled in amity, putting on their bridal robes, and the harvest of souls was gathered in, and winter was forgotten. And the minister and his wife asked only the Glory of virtue, to fight, to struggle, to right the wrong,

Only the glory of going on and still to be.

Mary Ralph.

WORDSWORTH.

II.

AN EXCURSION WITH WORDSWORTH.

The review of his own life and of the origin and progress of his own powers which Wordsworth recorded in "The Prelude" resulted in the determination to compose a philosophical poem containing his views on Man, Nature, and Society, which he intended to call "The Recluse," the principal subject being the sensations and opinions of a poet living in retirement. This poem was to have been in three parts, but only the second, "The Excursion," was ever finished. The beginning of the first part was written, and the material of which the third would have consisted was incorporated in poems written later than "The Excursion."

The Salutary Influence of Nature.

That the record of an imaginary day's outing, in which, however, the remembrances and impressions of many days in the open air are brought together, should be the means by which he expressed his philosophy is characteristic. Man was meant to live among the sights and sounds and myriad impressions of nature, and there is no healthy existence which is cut off from her influence. "The Excursion" is no casual holiday jaunt away from the world's business and our own homes; it is a walk in a familiar country-side, starting from home and returning home; the observance of new beauty in familiar scenes, with old companions and friends. Home for Wordsworth was at Grasmere, a small but separate white cottage at a rental of £8 a year, simply furnished, with a modest garden in which no violence was done to nature, but she was led to give a most charming and graceful display of her common glory and delicacy and vitality. A comparison of Wordsworth's garden at Dove Cottage with the artificial wonders of Pope's garden at Twickenham would efficiently depict the difference in their poetry and their views of life.

Excursions and Excursions.

An excursion in the general opinion of our time is a run into the country or to another town than that in which we dwell, when, in a few hours, we see as many celebrated sights as may be possible in the time, or, throwing off all business cares and worries, give ourselves to unaccustomed merriment, comic or senseless, boisterous or lethargic, according to our mood and character; it is an occasion apart from the ordinary run of our lives, when we have nothing serious in view and concentrate attention on present enjoyment, eating, drinking, sports, pastimes, or whatever will make time fly pleasantly; though we do some homage to nature in our general perception that recreation and change and enjoyment are to be sought sometimes in the country.

But in Wordsworth's view, country life and surroundings were essential to right living, and his "Excursion" is in no way a departure from the common business of life; it is of a pieces with the rest, a day given to companionship and observation instead of the more regular duties, but not carrying the actors away from familiar and ordinary conditions; it is the occasion for a meditative review and the expression in friendly conversation of thoughts matured in daily life.

The Wanderer.

The Wanderer whom he makes the companion of his journey is a Pedlar who has carried a benevolent heart with him in all his journeys, and has gained much besides money profit from his intercourse with simple people who have learned to welcome him as a friend. Herein is one of the principles of Wordsworth's poetry and insight declared; for he held that not only in the exceptional but in the ordinary creation, in man as in nature, God was manifested; that if we see not truth and beauty set forth in the grass and the wayside flowers, and the pedlar and shepherd and cottage child, we have not got near to the heart of God, and are unfit to declare the meaning of nature which we do not ourselves know.

We must eliminate from our thoughts all that refers to the Lake District as a show district, a resort of many tourists. There were but little wayside inns to refresh the passing traveller, or the hospitality of farm-houses and cottages. Westmoreland and Cumberland lived on the industry of the yeomen and peasants; the inhabitants did not look to visitors to provide them with an income, and it was not as an acknowledged holiday resort that Wordsworth made his home at Grasmere; it was from love for the country, his own native district, and for the simple self-supporting and self-contained way of life of the people.

His pedlar philosopher and friend, a patriarchal tramp with a large heart that grew by what it gave, is a Wanderer such as the author is conscious he himself desires to be though knowing that to give way to the tendency so far as to let it interfere with settled purpose and steady occupation would be ruinous. But he deftly gives his hero a business which makes it his duty to wander, and so combines the settled purpose with the experience of much travel, and brings out his own ideal of himself. Without egotism he could thus depict in greater completeness than he was conscious of in himself some characteristics which he believed to be worthy and his own.

The Seclusion of Blea Tarn.

After several days of walking together as the choice of one or the other determined, the Wanderer claims absolute dominion for the day and leads his friend up Great Langdale. He will not be drawn aside from the plan he has made for the day's ramble, though the annual Wakes of the Langdale village offer attractions to both to partake in the "simple pastimes of the day and place." He is not loth to linger,

But know we not that he, who intermits
The appointed task and duties of the day,
Untunes full oft the pleasures of the day;
Checking the finer spirits that refuse
To flow, when purposes are lightly changed?

They are walking along an ample valley towards the higher mountains, "stern and desolate," but set off "in the majesty of distance," with aërial softness clad,

And beautified with morning's purple beams.

The Wanderer leads his friend towards the secluded abode of a lonely man whose history he recites as they proceed up the wide vale, then climb the steep and pathless side of Lingmoor Fell, traversing its wild heights with far greater summits before them, till they see beneath their feet,

A little lowly vale, and yet uplifted high
Among the mountains,

Shut out from the world,

A quiet treeless nook, with two green fields,
A liquid pool that glittered in the sun,
And one bare dwelling; one abode, no more.

This pool is Blea Tarn of all the Blea (or bleak) tarns of the Lake District now specially remembered and visited for Wordsworth's sake. The most popular and perhaps the most helpful guide-book of the Lake District says that it is an "insignificant sheet of water," measuring significance by size in a way which has no kinship with that of Wordsworth, who says:

Full many a spot
Of hidden beauty have I chanced to espy
Among the mountains; never one like this;
So lonesome, and so perfectly secure;
Not melancholy—no, for it is green,
And bright, and fertile, furnished in itself
With the few needful things that life requires.
—In rugged arms how softly does it lie,
How tenderly protected.

The Solitary.

Here dwells the Solitary, a man who, besides severe domestic afflictions, has suffered from the prostration of his hopes and enthusiasm for the regeneration of man and the unbinding of their burdens which he had looked for from the French Revolution, and who had now retired far from the affairs of men and his own past activities to find a lodging for himself, his books, and his philosophical instruments in this wild and secluded dwelling, bare of all the luxuries and most of the comforts of social life. Doubtless he represents in large measure the despondency and disappointment that had been felt by Wordsworth himself. His hopes had run high for the coming of a better age through revolution, and he himself would have joined with youthful vigour in the actual struggle, expecting by a short series of mighty blows to break down the oppressions of ages and set up a brotherhood of equal and helpful fellow-citizens in the space of a few short years; and he was severely shaken when the materialism, and therefore failure, of the movement became manifest. He had, however, risen above the despondency, and had seized upon the permanent elements of good in the movements of that violent period, and believed in the regeneration of mankind by the building up of individual men and women into a fuller realisation of the dignity and character of manhood. The revolution failed because it did not permanently ennoble character.

The Wanderer's Faith.

The Solitary receives them with hospitality; a frugal meal is taken at his abode; the twin Langdale Pikes,

two huge Peaks
That from some other vale peered into this, fronted the window of the small apartment where their pastoral banquet was spread. These mountains are the Solitary's prized companions, viewed by his guests as they sit with him. There and on the mountain in a quiet rocky nook, and on the further journey in which all three are fellow-wayfarers, he tells his story, and some thoughts are suggested by his companions, especially the Wanderer, which should lead to a renewed faith in man founded on intercourse with God, the loss of faith having resulted from the concentration of attention on mere man and his frailties and the slackening of the hold on duty, whereas in fellowship with the Eternal Spirit and obedience under all conditions of success or failure, man's true life consists. This it was needful to learn:—

And that unless above himself he can
Erect himself how poor a thing is man.
But, above all, the victory is most sure
For him, who, seeking faith by virtue, strives
To yield entire submission to the law
Of conscience—conscience reverenced and obeyed,
As God's most intimate presence in the soul,
And his most perfect image in the world.

Disappointment over the lack of character and principle among those who might have made the Revolution the beginning of a new and better age, and despondency because of the failure of his hopes for man, should be corrected by the observation of nature's ways which are slow and sure. And in like manner human nature could be developed to higher things, not by a sudden leap, but by gradual education of individuals. Not by "the weak functions of one busy day" could man succeed in changing

What all the slowly-moving years of time
With their united force have left undone.

It was pride that had made such confidence, and this infirmity of noble minds needed to be eliminated,

By nature's gradual processes be taught.

The rash hope of a sudden flight celestial would produce misery and shame; it must rest secure upon a foundation of character:

But wisdom of her sons
Shall not the less, though late, be justified.

By such thoughts the Wanderer and his friend endeavour to persuade the Solitary from his despondency. But Wordsworth does not make the mistake of representing that they are immediately successful; that would be contrary to the lesson he has been teaching of slow and patient development: at most they moderate his melancholy, as much by their friendly presence as their arguments and delight in nature. In this delight he shares, not drinking it in like them as a draught from a pure spring, but as a partial quenching of thirst with brackish water, a mingling of bitter and sweet.

The Grasmere Parson.

Down Little Langdale the travellers proceed till, somehow, with the light steps of the poet, intermediate spaces are annulled, and they have Grasmere in view and visit the church, where they meditate and converse on its monuments and graves, and are joined by the Pastor, who tells the story of many whose bodies lie in the churchyard, and some yet living among the surrounding mountains. Thus the author is able to give his thoughts on many phases of human life and experience, and at the same time shows his respect for the established usages of religion, and his sympathy with the ideal of a country pastor who is in truth the shepherd of his people associating with all of every class within his parish, their helper and adviser, a scholar living a cultured and simple life in intercourse with nature and man and God. The poet fosters the hope that the churches of England may never be overturned by the "blind rage of bigot zeal" and that as the buildings should be preserved to "bestow

Upon the thronged abodes of busy men
(Depraved and ever prone to fill the mind Exclusively with transitory things)
An air and mien of dignified pursuit,
Of sweet civility on rustic wilds," so also that worthy servants of these pure abodes may abound, ministers

Detached from pleasure, to the love of gain
Superior, insusceptible of pride,
And by ambitious longings undisturbed;
Men whose delight is where their duty leads
Or fixes them;
Strenuous champions, in scholastic arts
Thoroughly disciplined.

Such a man he seeks to depict in the Pastor who has spoken with intimate knowledge and sympathy of the living and the dead.

Loss of Manhood in the Towns.

Reference to the knighthood of the past leads the Wanderer, a modern knight-errant of humble commerce, to contrast the experiences of his wandering life with the romantic interest of the Wayfarers of the past. He speaks of the rapid growth of huge towns,

Where not a habitation stood before,
Abodes of men irregularly massed,
O'er which the smoke of unremitting fires
Hangs permanent.

He admires and even exults to see these signs of

An intellectual mastery exercised
O'er the blind elements, but the destruction of human life and happiness,

To gain, the master idol of the realm,
Perpetual sacrifice,

he deplores, and is animated by the hope that the time may come

When, strengthened, yet not dazzled by the might
Of this dominion over nature gained,
Men of all lands shall exercise the same
In due proportion to their country's need;
Learning, though late, that all true glory rests,
All praise, all safety, and all happiness
Upon the moral law.

Lacking this perception homes are broken up by factory work, children are deprived of their childhood holiday, their birthright of fresh air and green fields.

No State can prosper by the degradation of the people, mothers, fathers, children. These inward chains of free-born Britons make of them slaves, "to whom release comes not." The boy is a prisoner, health and joy and liberty of mind destroyed.

The Solitary maintains that the lot of "the whistling plough-boy" is not much better. What liberty of mind has he? What have churches and schools done for him?

The Need of Education.

A pleasant picture of the Pastor's home life and disregard of rank-distinctions in the companionship allowed to his children serves as an interlude to the intensity of feeling displayed; then, after a plain repast and desultory talk, the Wanderer reverts to the theme and declares that every human creature has a right to be exempt from being considered as a mere instrument.

> Our life is turned > Out of her course, wherever man is made
> An offering, or a sacrifice, a tool
> Or implement, a passive thing employed
> As a brute mean, without acknowledgment
> Of common right or interest in the end.

Man was created "to obey the law of life, of hope, of action," and the power to overcome evil qualities in ourselves is stronger in us when we are not crowded by oppressive objects, but have space and nature's companionship. The ignorance and distortion of the peasant lot is deplorable; the rustic Boy, ignorant, and often the slave of want and hunger, is pitiable; but no one glories in that evil, whereas the factory system is extolled as an agency of freedom and national wealth. No real national wealth can result from the degradation of a part of the people to serve the purposes of the rest. The State should acknowledge her obligation to teach the rudiments of knowledge and of moral and religious truth to all from whom she expects obedience and good citizenship. Thus Wordsworth declared himself for education as the birthright of every child. He looked to British Lawgivers to secure to all children the beginnings of culture. This, it must be remembered, was when the battle for a national system of education had still to be fought.

On Loughrigg Fell.

The Pastor's wife suggests to the party a walk to the lake's margin where a boat lies ready under a sheltering tree. The children of the house and their boy companion are with them as they glide across the water to an island where they partake of a picnic meal, and re-embarking cross the lake to Loughrigg Fell it would seem, which they climb and sit admiring the view now deservedly famous, over the lake to the village, the church, and the surrounding mountains. The sun sets in glorious splendour. Then the Pastor gives expression to a prayer for the coming of God's kingdom, drawing encouragement from the advance mankind has already made since the times of the rude worship of idols and cruel sacrifices which had once been celebrated near that spot.

Farewell to the Solitary.

They return over the shadowy lake under a sky from which the splendours have faded, and near the Vicar's door the Solitary bids farewell and promises to share another summer day with them. What renovation had been brought to a mind

> Dejected and habitually disposed
> To seek in degradation of the kind,
> Excuse and solace for her own defects;

and whether aught of tendency for good resulted from further intercourse with uninjured minds, the poet suggests may form the theme of future serious song. The further work suggested was never written, and the story of the Solitary and the Wanderer goes no further; but the thoughts and suggestions intended for expression in the third part of the great trilogy were embodied in great measure in other poems.

"The Excursion" ends with nature as it began with nature, and the companionship of nature is suggested all through. Thus even more artistically than in his positive teaching does Wordsworth declare the positive and very necessary truth that perplexities of thought and of action are best met and pondered and solved under a clear sky, and amid the things that God has made to be man's ordinary surrounding, and not in close studies and gloomy towns and gaunt offices and sunless lodgings. Nature and human nature were meant for each other, and what God has joined man puts asunder at the expense of health and truth and joy and beauty and peace and inspiration.

Priestley Prime.

OUR CITY YOUTHS AND MAIDENS.*

BY THE REV. J. L. HAIGH.

II.

Our "Hours of Thought" must be hours of service—each man to give according to his ability. James Martineau saw that, and so did John Hamilton Thom—and both are truly eloquent when they speak of it, for they were prompted by earnest conviction. They are still the inspiration of the missionary. Martineau says:—

> To reach the springs of inner life where they are sealed up, and keep them clear where they are flowing, the one great agency is the personal power of an earnest and sympathetic mind, living itself in a higher order of ideas and above the danger of being dragged down to the level where they are lost. There lies the true pastoral gift; deep faith in God, deep pity for man, and strength to carry the vision of a divine order into the clash and confusion of the world; and wherever you meet with any good measure of this gift, thank God that the prophets are not dead: arm it freely with your outward help, and confide in it from your inmost heart. Send it—better still take it, as the messenger alike of humanity and God, into the city recesses, where the struggle of life is fiercest, and brightened least by either physical or spiritual light. There is nothing like the living breath of conviction and trust for fanning every latent suspicion and healing compunction that else would die. Tell me not that the weight of ill is too heavy to be lifted; the greater the burthen, the more elastic force is needed to heave it off. Do you say the material conditions of our poor neighbourhoods are too oppressive to give encouragement? Then they are too oppressive to permit desertion and neglect. The more they stifle the spiritual possibilities, the more must they be counterbalanced by persistency of culture and intensity of appeal.

* Part of an Address given at the Summer Session for Sunday-school Teachers at Manchester College, Oxford, on Saturday, July 5.

Both these great prophets gave us such words of inspiration and encouragement; we can only strive to obey them at a great distance. They stood upon the bridge and looked abroad with clear and open vision; we do our little task amid the rumble of machinery—but it is good to feel that we are at one with them in our yearning and our striving. To accomplish our task we must rely upon the elastic force of perfect joyfulness and hope. The grand scheme is the same for both Martineau and the missionary. Some details in the plan of salvation, social and moral, have caught our attention, and to these we turn.

Reach the Young People through their Pleasures and Interests.

The whole of life is good when rightly used: not one passion, desire, wish common to humanity is wrong. It is right that these young people should have social intercourse, it is right they should have pleasure. At present they get these at the street corner and the cheap music-hall. We seek to give them these things with greater abundance and of better quality. It is right that they should "know" religion—the source of the greatest happiness: can we give it to them through their social intercourse and their pleasure? We can do this:—We can help to keep their hearts clean and their imaginations pure. By "hearts" I mean the affectionate side of their natures: by "imagination" the dreamy side of their powers—their meditation, secret wishes, and ambitions.

The Dramatic Sketch.

Now go back and meet that stream of young fellows returning from their work. There they go, full of fun and mischief, with the little white paper rolls in their mouths. Suddenly your name is spoken. Why here are two of your own scholars, and they are not ashamed of you! You stop and have a word or two, and the parting is, "See you again at eight o'clock." What are they going to see you for at eight o'clock: they seem as if they are looking forward to that hour? This is the secret. They are taking part in a good dramatic sketch. Not one of those goody-goody, milk and watery productions—with long impossible speeches—never spoken upon this earth by man, maid, goose or gander; but a rollicking, merry, happy-go-lucky affair, in which everybody has something to say, and the only difficulty is to know when to say it; in short the action is much more necessary than the spoken word:—That's the sort of dramatic sketch for young fellows. Watch them in actual life: they are full of movement. Let them be the same on the platform.

Now, here you know two among this crowd of young fellows, scores of whom will spend their evening at the street corner or in the music-hall. I want to ask you—are you doing any good? And I'll answer for you? You are doing just the right thing for those lads. Say they are now sixteen or seventeen, and you can manage to keep hold of them for four or five years; why then they'll manage to keep hold of themselves. You have given them something to do. I daresay they have their parts in their pockets and have been looking them over during the dinner hour. I have no doubt they are talking over the affair now as they walk home together. I knew a couple of lads working at different trades who arranged to meet and walk home together night after night so that they could rehearse their parts. Our "Plays for Children" are all very good, but how much more important to get the thing that will suit these city youths and maidens if only to keep them off the street.

Bank Holiday Pleasures.

Again: Anyone who knows the lives of the working-class instinctively feels convinced that Bank holidays and Christmas holidays are not unmixed blessings. The wives and mothers of the men and youths will tell you that. Where is the mischief? As a total abstainer, or a prejudiced Radical, you expect me to run to the root of the matter and say—drink. Well, it might not do any harm to say something on that question; but as it is my great temptation, I'll put the cup on one side and look round for other causes. And the one that strikes me most forcibly is this: English working-people, as a class, have never been taught to enjoy themselves in new or original ways. They follow the old ruts, and work them deeper and deeper. 'Arry and 'Arriet and 'Ampstead 'Eath make the only 'appy alliteratives they know for the long summer days, with porter and pantomime for the winter evenings. At least, that is what our genial critic Max O'Rell would say, and I feel bound to agree with him. The working-class simply waste their means, scattering them right and left, like a typical Jack Tar when he steps ashore. They and we allow bright ingenuity to get dull and rusty in its sheath of conventionality. I think we should draw it out and polish it up occasionally. Take a walk on the evening of Boxing Day, and what do you find in all our big cities? Great crowds in the streets marching along behind screeching concertinas, the public-houses gorged with customers, and long lines of people waiting for admission to the music-halls and theatres. To see what? I don't know, simply because a modern English pantomime baffles all description. It's a hotch-potch of everything obtainable, with a determined attempt on the part of the caterer to batter the original fairy-story out of all recognition. Of course he peppers his dish for the palates of the people, and they like it. That is his apology, and it spells business. Working-people pay for it to the tune of three shillings and five shillings per seat at holiday times.

What of our Missions and Schools?

All these things are in full swing—music-hall, theatre, and public-house—and our missions and schools are closed! I don't want them open for religious services, or classes, or rehearsals, or even drills; but for all the young people to take part in the entertainment, and every one feel that he or she has a very important part to play—a part that has cost them a great amount of thought for six weeks or two months; a part that has made them rub up their bit of history and their imagination; a part that has made mother and father gossip and talk more than anything for a long time; a part that has taken five or six shillings of their pocket-money; a part which will make everybody look at them. What is this wonderful thing? It's a fancy-dress, social, Christmas gathering—call it what you like. Why shouldn't the working-class youths and maidens have their own fancy dress ball among their own companions, under proper superintendence? You want to make something predominant—something that will sing out above the noise of the workshop, the ceaseless repetition of street-corner chatter and fireside gossip; a note that will be particular and personal and yet part of a great whole. Here it is. Each can be a distinct character. Think what it means to the poor girl compelled to work in a stuffy warehouse, at that dreadfully dull monotonous task week after week. I mean the whole thing—not only the night itself. It is the cigarette-maker's romance. It makes her forget her sordid surroundings, the chorus then in vogue, and the last tuneful ditty.

Make use of Music.

This leads me to my third suggestion. Generally when we speak of a music class we mean a gathering of people who meet together for the study and practice of music which, while admirable and enjoyable in its way, would be a little too slow for the majority of that class which I have in my mind. We must have another name and another end in view—call it a concert party or a minstrel class—but the end in view is simply to keep these young people together under your guidance and control. That must never be forgotten. Your method must be full of life and quickness, and you must not be too nice or particular as to quality of voice. Each member must be made to work, and work enthusiastically. You may be able to interest a few intellectually by means of a reading circle, or a Shakespeare society; but here you have the opportunity of interesting many by taking them on their own level for a year or two. Have a public concert in view; it does not matter when the concert is to take place, in two months, three months, or six months; so far as you are concerned it does not matter if it never takes place. Don't tell your pupils that. Your object is not the public concert, but to get hold of that young life, and keep it from degenerating into the looseness, the carelessness, and coarseness of the life of those who habitually meet at the street corner. It is the opportunity given the leader or teacher during the hours of practice, the meetings together for a common object; that opportunity is of greater importance in every way than the public entertainment. It is no doubt a good thing to get young people to spend time and trouble in order to give pleasure to their friends and acquaintances. We over-emphasise that sometimes; but the better thing to the teacher himself and to his young friends is the delight in the weekly practices and rehearsals.

What will Elevate?

Some good people look upon experiments of this sort as dangerous in their tendency—or at least not very elevating in their character. Elevating and edifying are comparative terms, and it depends upon where you are to begin with—before you can say a thing is not elevating. Many people think it also undesirable to allow young people to indulge in the recreation of dancing. There are associations in city life connected with the words "music and dancing" which are not of a character to encourage anyone to provide opportunities for these exercises. That no doubt is true, and the same criticism can be uttered about many things. But these recreations in themselves are not evil. They can be thoroughly enjoyed amid proper surroundings and healthy influences, and turned into good—into means of grace, if you like the expression. It is our duty to keep the surroundings and influences as pure as possible—to make the "atmosphere" wholesome. Why do I suggest these things? Simply because the stiffness and formality of the ordinary meetings are done away with, the path is open for more direct personal intercourse, which in its pleasantness and freedom may help to enlarge the horizon and deepen the sympathy—and bring into play the individual force and character of each member. The ordinary conventional gatherings have failed to do that. The meeting does not depend so much upon its label, religious or social, as upon the motive which prompted the meeting, and the tone which leaves the impression of something more than the merely agreeable having been accomplished.

The Songs to Sing.

We all believe in the refining influence of music. There are few people who do not like it. But when you say the people like "music" you are compelled to discriminate. People of the lowest class, musically I mean—young people that gather at the street corners, and love the piercing concertina, these people like clear simple melody such as "Daisy Bell" and "Dolly Gray." There's wretched taste in that—and as I said, a little false sentiment, but there's no great moral wrong. These songs have their day and cease to be. But, better than songs of this ephemeral order, we English people are happy in having a splendid collection of melodies, both ancient and modern, from, say, "Home Sweet Home" up to "The Lost Chord" and "The Better Land"; and the stream is not yet dry while such writers as Weatherly and Molloy and others are to the front. Ballad-makers are still a power in the land that law-makers, moral and political, cannot afford to despise. Here, then, we have this splendid collection of songs, in addition to many quaint, old negro-minstrel melodies—and lads and lasses who ought to be taught to take a delight in singing them. Is it not good for a man or a woman to step in and act as musical intermediary, and introduce the song to a young fellow's heart and voice? If he falls in love with its melody and its message, will his affection work for good or evil? Of course, it must be sweetly melodious, or he will have none of it. He is not in love with the intricacies of subtle harmony and fugue, no matter how dear these may be to the finer ear of the thorough musician, but with the pleasing attractiveness of flowing melody. He is a babe in music, and, like most babes, he can prove a very interesting study.

The Growing Youth.

Catch hold of these young people by means of a dramatic sketch, a Fancy Dress Ball in its season, the recreation of dancing, and your ballad or your Christy Minstrel class. Even with these to help you they will give you some little trouble to hold for a year or two, for they are most ingenious in showing quick turns of temper, unexpected sensitiveness, queer jealousies, and bundles of all sorts of contradictions. The idiosyncrasies of youth are marvellous to the uninitiated. To those who know, there is nothing surprising under the sun that any city hobbledehoy of sixteen or eighteen can do or say. He is growing, and he does not know it. He grows in spasms. He is thoroughly undisciplined, and sulks at nothing. His way of thinking is like the kick of the mule—you never know what point of the compass he will aim for next. But if he is taking part in a sketch, learning a song, or has bought part of his dress for a Christmas social, you have a hold upon him which will keep him for a week or two longer, and then all thought of the imaginary offence will be over and gone. Do anything to keep the lad during these queer spasmodic days of growth—when his legs and arms shoot through his garments at such an astonishing rate, and his ideas run away with him. Stevenson speaks of the "exquisite stupidity of sheep"—a pleasant thing to watch, and he knew something about sheep. But if you can turn the "exquisite stupidity" of your ringleader into the right channel, and make the kick of your mule beat rhythmic music on the path of life, and get several other sheep or mules to follow in due order, then you have accomplished one of the greatest victories of your life. The lads need a little guidance, a little tact, a little sympathetic humour to save them from wasting their lives. Think of the hundreds of wild young harum-scarum undergraduates of this University who have been saved by sensible, friendly human dons and doctors when the lads were seized with the fever of madness, and wanted to throw their lives away. Human life is the same in all ranks. We want to prevent the youngsters from sinking into a state of moral and spiritual lethargy by the time they reach middle age.

A Wasted Life.

Take a concrete example I have had in mind while penning the above words. Here is a man approaching three-score years of age. The early influences for good in that man's life, as far as we can learn, have been absolutely worthless. After a peep in at school he began his struggle for daily bread as a "scaler" in a boiler yard. The tone of his companions was low and sensual; their amusement and recreation of the earth, earthy. Cheap entertainment in music-hall and theatre were not edifying forty years ago; and he had to follow the fashion of his fellows. When he reached young manhood he became a labourer in the yard; and this has been his occupation ever since. Early marriage is the custom among his class, and is scarcely ever prefaced with a love-story or romance. In his world women are not wooed but wed. Romeos are idiots, and are only seen and heard on the stage. His wife gave him children to feed. Holidays, not "holy-days," were marked by the advent and departure of these little ones. Death and club-money are almost synonymous terms among certain dwellers in our huge cities; so that the pathos of the "visitation" is swept away in the excitement of the business arrangements with the insurance society and the undertaker. That excitement over, the old, dull, dead level of existence is reached again. Men must work in order to get the wherewithal for food and drink, particularly the latter. And so the years roll on: his work laborious and monotonous, his home surroundings dirty and unattractive, his only companions workmates who love to swill, to fill, and to call for more, while money lasts or the landlord trusts. Then old age creeps on. Younger and more active men get the preference at the workshops; and the man becomes a parasite. He hangs on everywhere. He haunts the yard-gate, the ghost of what he was; he slouches through the old familiar streets, or sits at home gazing vacantly into the fire. What refined people stigmatise as coarseness has beset him behind and before: coarse thoughts, coarse jokes, coarse amusements, and rough animal living. Think of him, all ye who have been brought up to revel in the luxury of cleanliness, the wholesomeness of country life, and the charm and play of intellect that comes from open intercourse with men of noble views. Some delicate people could not bear to touch this man with their gloves on. We do not wonder at their physical repugnance. From the sweet, clear air of the height of refinement to the dull, stagnant marsh of degradation is a great drop. This man is in a sadder state than the prodigal among the swine: this man has been dead all his life. Think of that significant phrase now: "the body of this death." Blame whom you like. If you are a Socialist you think you will know whom to blame, and that perhaps will yield some sort of satisfaction. But the Sunday-school teacher or Missionary is an individualist; he has neither time nor ability to study columns of statistics and sheets of returns. He asks himself this pertinent, practical question: "Can I with the help of God prevent this waste in the future—this life which is no life?" Crowds! Yes, stand and watch them and muse about their thoughts, lives, and characters; but better still, get hold of one or two while they are young, make their humour brighter, interest them in some simple, innocent thing until the dangerous days are past, and they behold the beauty of a full strong manhood and womanhood for themselves.

UNITARIAN WORKERS' UNION.

ABERYSTWITH SUMMER PARTY.

We are indebted to a member of the "Pink Party" at Caerleon House, Aberystwith, for some notes of another pilgrimage among the Unitarian Churches of South Wales, made on Monday the 18th inst., under the guidance of the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones.

An early morning train took the party to Lampeter, where unfortunately they arrived in rain, but nothing daunted, mounted their waggonettes and drove first to the site of the new Brondeifi Chapel. It was at a cottage about a mile out of Lampeter that the work began here with a Sunday-school, and subsequently regular services. In 1875-6 a chapel was built on the outskirts of the town, but on such foundations that last year it was decided that the building must come down. Towards the £2,000 which the new chapel is expected to cost the congregation has by great effort obtained £900. On the site, where it was judged that there will this time be no mistake about the foundations, the party received a very cordial welcome, and songs and glees were sung by the choir.

Thence they drove to Capel-y-groes, where the first chapel was built in 1802, and on to Allt-y-placa, dating back to 1740, though the original straw-thatched chapel was superseded in 1837 by a more substantial building. In drenching rain, but the best of spirits, the party reached Capel-y-bryn, and next at Cwrtnewydd were hospitably refreshed by Mrs. Thomas Jones. A stiff climb from that village brought them to the crest of a hill from which there was a fine view of the Llandyssul district. There the old Llwynrhydowen Chapel was seen, and the new chapel, built after the eviction of 1876. At Pant-y-defaid the party was warmly welcomed by the Rev. Thomas Thomas, J.P., for forty-seven years minister of the chapel, and by the Rev. T. A. Thomas, the present minister. In the schoolroom a hospitable meal was provided, followed by brief speeches from Miss Tagart, the Revs. T. Thomas, E. C. Jones, and T. A. Thomas, and then some hymns were sung in the chapel, and an address was given by Miss Emily Sharpe. Here, as throughout the journey, the party were deeply impressed by the intense earnestness and devotion, no less than by the overflowing kindness of their Welsh co-religionists. The beauty of the country added greatly to the enjoyment of the visit, and the storms of rain were lighted by the touch of rainbows on the distant hills. Arrived once more at Lampeter the party was entertained to tea by the Rev. R. C. Jones and his family, and amid cheers the homeward train left for Aberystwith.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Gellionen.—The annual tea-meeting of the congregation took place last Saturday under the happiest circumstances, people gathering from near and far for the occasion, so that about 650 in all partook of the entertainment. The Trebanos silver band added to the enjoyment of the afternoon, and it is calculated that as a result there will be a reduction of nearly £30 from the building debt on the church.

Leigh: Lancashire (Appointment).—The Rev. R. Stuart Redfern, of Crewe, has received and accepted a unanimous invitation to the pastorate of the Leigh Church, in succession to the Rev. A. H. Dolphin, and will enter upon his duties on the first Sunday in October.

London: Mansford-street Church and Mission.—It was a sad day at Mansford-street last Sunday. A sacred sorrow fell on all as they met for the services, or the duties of the Sunday-school, with the consciousness that one who was dearly loved by so many would never again be seen in our midst in bodily presence. Touching references to the late Miss E. J. Garrett were made at the morning service and afternoon school by Mr. Alfred Thompson and the Rev. John Ellis. The evening service was specially arranged "In Memoriam," and was conducted by the Rev. Henry Gow, B.A. The church was beautifully decorated with choice flowers, which had been sent as tokens of the love which subsisted between Miss Garrett and numerous friends. Favourite hymns were sung. Mr. Gow spoke out of a full heart and from the experience of a holy friendship. He reminded her friends that Miss Garrett engaged in the good work at Mansford-street, not as a duty but from the joy of service. Her love, and thoughtful care, and generous service, should be an incentive to those who have been influenced by her life to live for pure thoughts and noble deeds as she did. And he appealed to the many friends of hers who filled the church, "for her sake," to love the best things and engage in the service of others in the spirit of Love. All were deeply impressed by Mr. Gow's words, and the prayer goes forth that some consecrated woman may come forward, not to take Miss arrett's place at Mansford-street—that were possible—but to continue her work in a similar it.

THE SOUTH SHORE UNITARIAN CHURCH, BLACKPOOL,

has purchased, at a cost of nearly £600, a plot of freehold land, and they now appeal for help to erect a plain, substantial building to serve for all purposes. It is hoped to be able to do this for £1,500, making a total cost of £2,100. The land, thanks to the generosity of Mrs. John Grundy, of Summerseat; Miss S. Scholes Wrigley, of Windermere (on her own and her late mother's behalf), and Mr. R. T. Heape, of Rochdale, is entirely paid for. The Congregation have themselves promised over £300 towards the erection of the building. They carry on the Services and the Sunday School without any grant, and they feel that the remarkable success of their efforts justifies them in asking friends to help them to carry on their work under more favourable circumstances than at present. Their appeal has the full approval of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, the North and East Lancashire Mission, and the North Lancashire and Westmorland Unitarian Association; and the B. and F. U. A. has promised £25 to the Building Fund.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

SEPTEMBER weather seems to promise, in spite of storms, some late summer glories, and we must hope, both for the sake of the harvest and of those fortunate ones who still have holiday weeks in store, that the month will prove more steadfast in its good intent than either August or July. Meanwhile, our faces are already set towards the winter's work, and we shall presently have announcements to make as to the coming months. May we use this opportunity to remind our many friends, near and distant, that they can render great service to our common cause, not only by loyal support, and doing what they can to extend the circulation and the influence of THE INQUIRER in our churches and beyond their borders, but by using these columns as a medium of exchange, not only in the matter of news, but for counsel in all matters which concern the well-being of our churches and the community at large? Our great aim must always be to prove effectual helpers of a true religious life and encouragers of every effort making towards the establishment of the Kingdom of God. We shall be grateful to all friends who can make contributions to this end, whether it be by words of wisdom and of inspiration for the deeper life, or by information that may extend our outlook upon the field of good work in the world, and bring the quickening of high example to our common store.

THE complete programme of the autumnal meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, to be held at Newcastle-on-Tyne, will be shortly advertised. On Sunday, Oct. 5, the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, President of the Association, is to preach, in the Church of the Divine Unity, the anniversary sermons of the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Association, and in the afternoon a united Sunday-school service is to be held, conducted by Miss Marian Pritchard. The business meeting of the District Association is on the following Monday afternoon, and in the evening a public meeting in the Lovaine Hall, under the presidency of Alderman J. Baxter Ellis, J.P., will be addressed by the President and other representatives of the National Association and other friends. On Tuesday Conferences of the British and Foreign and the Sunday School Association will be held, followed in the evening by a conversazione. Messrs. F. C. Slater and E. H. Coysh, the hon. local secretaries, and their committee, are taking energetic steps to secure for these meetings an abundant success.

THE thirty-fifth annual Trades Union Congress opened on Monday at the Holborn Town Hall, when the members received an official welcome from Sir John MacDougall, Chairman of the London County Council. A letter of welcome signed by the Bishops of London, Rochester, and St. Albans was also read, to the following effect:—

We are, as you will understand, deeply concerned in all that touches the welfare of the vast number of workers in our dioceses. We are frequently engaged in urging upon other classes of the community their responsibilities towards those engaged in labour, and we welcome whatever helps to make public opinion on such matters more conscientious, virile, and independent. But it is constantly present to our minds that there is no more necessary and effective factor in the creation of such opinion than the strong, well-informed, and disciplined interest of the body of the people which form the artisan and labouring classes. We recognise how much has been accomplished in this direction by the societies which you represent. We believe that through these the responsibilities as well as the rights of labour may find expression of the least invidious and most wholesome sort. We heartily wish well, under the blessing and providence of Almighty God, to a Congress which we hope may have further good effects of this kind.

The address of the President, Mr. W. C. Steadman, representative of the London Bargebuilders, and ex-M.P. for Stepney, was given on Tuesday. Looking back upon the past year, he said that from the Parliamentary point of view it had not been a bright one, no single measure of benefit to the working classes had been passed, and, on the contrary, the Education Bill was a decidedly reactionary measure which violated every principle of justice. One authority for all grades of education was the ideal to work for; but the one authority in the Bill was an imposture. The corn-tax also came in for severe condemnation, and the urgency of the housing question was insisted on.

THE REV. W. J. SPRIGGS-SMITH, Vicar of Terrington St. John, in an open letter to his parishioners, has issued a vigorous protest against the Education Bill. He is convinced, he says, that the Bill is fraught with evil to the State, its citizens and the cause of Christ, and he proceeds:—

I have long since come to the conclusion that the more the simple truths of the Bible are taught, without sectarian deductions from them, in our "Day-schools" to children, the better it will be for their future welfare. The clergy, not the parents, decide the character of the religious instruction to be given, which is not the same in all our "Church schools"; for it may be High, Low, Broad, Ritual-Romish, or otherwise, as the clergyman may happen to be inclined. Hence a serious question arises. Are we justified, as a nation, in burdening the minds of our children with our unhappy divisions? Certainly not. To persist in so doing, which appears to me to be the main object of this Bill, is an injustice to the children, an injury to the nation's future, and a betrayal by the Government of the electorate, which has given no mandate for such a Bill; indeed we should, one and all, unite to resist it, ere it is too late to prevent the pending educational disaster.

The Pilot has come to the conclusion that the Bill, if passed, will injure the Church, and urges delay, "a little time in which Churchmen may ask themselves whether the boon they have sought and accepted is not in reality a curse disguised as a blessing."

IN the revised edition of the "Essex Hall Hymnal," repeating a mistake of the first edition and of George Dawson's Hymns (1853) the four verses of a hymn by James Freeman Clarke, beginning—are attributed to Margaret Fuller. It is unfortunate that the mistake was not noted before the new edition was printed, but fate is sometimes unaccountably unkind to the most careful editors. The authorship is correctly given in Mr. Page Hopps's Leicester and Croydon collections and in the Berwick Hymnal; and in Julian's "Dictionary of Hymnology" Dr. Freeman Clarke's own account of the hymn is quoted, to the effect that it was "written in Kentucky about 1833, and printed in the Dial soon after." 1840-44 was the date of the Dial, of which Margaret Fuller was the first editor; hence, possibly, the origin of the mistake, which we would beg readers who have the opportunity to correct in both editions of the Essex Hall Hymnal.

WE recorded in July, with warm congratulations and good wishes, the celebration by the Rev. Ernest Fontanès, of Paris, of his ministerial jubilee, but did not then note that our venerable friend, on completing that long period of service, had judged that the time was come for his retirement from the active ministry. His jubilee M. Fontanès celebrated on the first Sunday in July, at Havre, where the greater part of his active work had been done, but then he had already preached his farewell sermon in Paris, to the congregation of Liberal Protestants, to whom he has ministered with so much acceptance for the past fourteen years.

ON the last Sunday afternoon in June a meeting of the Liberal Protestants of Paris was held at the instance of MM. Albert Réville and Ph. Jalabert, in the hall of the Geographical Society, in the Boulevard Saint Germain, when it was unanimously agreed to present an address to M. Fontanès on the occasion of his retirement, and to secure the publication at least of his farewell sermon, if not of a volume of sermons, as a permanent record of his ministry in Paris. M. Fontanès must have been deeply touched by the expressions of sorrow at his retirement, and the testimonies to the value of his work. Of this Professor Bonet-Maury and M. Réville both spoke with much feeling. The friends of M. Fontanès are glad to think that although he has now retired from active service the personal influence of his ministry, which is so precious to them, is not at an end, and that they may hope in the coming years often to hear his voice again.

DR. JOSEPH ANGUS, who passed away at Hampstead on Thursday week, at the age of eighty-six, was a member of the New Testament Revision Committee, and served on the first London School Board. For nearly ten years in early life he was secretary of the Baptist Missionary Society, but in 1849 became principal of the Stepney College, subsequently, until his retirement at an advanced age, of its successor, the Regent's Park College. In 1865 he served as president of the Baptist Union.

A CORRESPONDENT has pointed out to us that the view of Bassenthwaite and Derwentwater, which forms the frontispiece of Mr. Collingwood's guide to "The Lake Counties," noticed last week, is not from Watendlath, but from the Ashness bridge, on the way up to Watendlath from Barrow House. Earlier in the notice, read also Carnforth and Cartmel.

THE address of Dr. C. H. Toy for the coming year, the Christian Register announces, will be, care of Brown, Shipley and Co., London, England.

Le Protestant, of Paris, notes with pleasure that a German translation of M. Jean Réville's volume of sermons, "Paroles d'un Libre-Croyant," published in 1898, and noticed at the time in these columns, is about to appear in Berlin. The translation is the work of a young Silesian pastor, the Rev. Hermann Buck.

A CONTRAST.

IT has sometimes been alleged against Unitarians that they are the only denomination who make doctrine the basis of union. We have always denied it because differences of opinion are allowed freely to exist amongst us, and we have no court before which a minister may be tried for any opinion he expresses. Neither the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, nor the Triennial Conference, nor any Provincial Assembly has any right to ask a minister who is a member what his doctrinal views are.

For a denomination founded upon a doctrinal basis we have only to go to the Wesleyan Methodist, which has lately afforded us an example of how such a system works. We are all more or less familiar with the case of Dr. Agar Beet, and how narrowly he escaped being deposed from his position of Theological Tutor on account of his alleged divergence from the standard doctrines of Methodism. He was ultimately re-elected, but his re-election can scarcely be said to be an evidence of any liberal spirit in Methodism. He was re-elected upon condition that in future he kept silence upon opinions which were not approved by the Conference. No one even alleged that these opinions were heretical or would not be freely allowed in other Churches. Dr. Beet's advocate, Mr. Hugh Price Hughes, declared that Dr. Beet did not hold views which may be said to be popular with Anglicans, Congregationalists, and Baptists; if he had done so Mr. Hughes would not have defended him. Mr. Hughes said that Dr. Beet was not a Universalist, like Dr. Cox or Dean Farrar; nor an advocate of conditional immortality like Dr. Dale or Dr. Edward White; "he does believe in eternal punishment." It was necessary to say this, and Mr. Hughes was justified in saying it, in order to save Dr. Beet from condemnation. But it serves to emphasise the fact that no liberty of opinion, or rather of speech, is allowed in the Wesleyan body. Mr. Watkinson affirmed that this is a fundamental principle with them.

Hitherto we have enjoyed doctrinal unanimity. If anyone comes into the Methodist Church he knows what he will hear. I have heard brethren say, "We want in Methodism something of the same catholicity as obtains in the Anglican Church," and so on. Now you can have that in the Anglican Church without peril, because the bond of their unity is the State and the endowments, and you can have large catholicity where you are held together by financial and political bonds. But the only thing that holds us together, and has bound us together from the beginning, is our firm loyalty to evangelical doctrines. If you depart from them, where are we?

Which was as much as to say to the Wesleyan ministers, "If you want to exercise freedom of opinion you must go elsewhere; you will not be allowed to do it here."

Mr. Watkinson was right in implying that considerable latitude is allowed in the Church of England, but we should be surprised if the clergy would admit that their unity is not one of faith, but only of finance and politics.

A striking contrast to Dr. Beet's case is to be found in the "Life and Letters of Lewis Carroll" (Mr. C. L. Dodgson), the author of "Alice in Wonderland," by his nephew, Mr. Collingwood. Mr. Collingwood, speaking of his uncle as a preacher, says:—

One sermon which he preached in the University Church, on Eternal Punishment, is not likely to be soon forgotten by those who heard it. I, unfortunately, was not of that number, but I can imagine how his clear-cut features would light up as he dwelt lovingly upon the mercy of that Being whose charity far exceeds the measure of man's mind. It is hardly necessary to say that he himself did not believe in eternal punishment or any other scholastic doctrine that contravenes the love of God.—("Life and Letters," pp. 76-77.)

This speaks volumes for Mr. Dodgson's humanity, whether it was consistent with the Book of Common Prayer or not. But Mr. Collingwood's "it is hardly necessary to say that he himself did not believe in eternal punishment" shows the large amount of liberty of opinion that is now allowed in the Church of England upon this doctrine. Indeed, the "it is hardly necessary to say" seems to imply that it would have been a matter of surprise if he had held what used to be considered the orthodox doctrine; which shows that, in spite of its formularies, the Church of England has made considerable progress. Evidently the Methodists are behind the times. But they are consistent, and, having doctrinal standards, they require their ministers to keep strictly to them. As to the Church of England, we should like to know whether the doctrine of eternal punishment, which is abandoned at the Universities, is still taught in the National schools, where the "children of the poor" are educated in accordance with "the principles of the Church of England."

WALTER LLOYD.

THE Tablet has not been slow to point the moral of the case of Dr. Agar Beet and the Wesleyan Conference as it appears to Roman Catholics. In an article on "The Freedom of the 'Free Churches,'" in last week's Tablet, the following passage occurs, drawing the dogmatist's inevitable conclusion in such a case.

We do not wonder, therefore, that the Wesleyan Conference has seen fit to leave the platitudes about religious freedom to irresponsible orators and writers, and has set itself to safeguard its standards; and that Dr. Agar Beet, whose honesty is above question, has on his part seen fit to accept its two conditions, and that the Dissenting Press has nothing but applause and satisfaction at the result of the whole decision.

At the same time we are tempted to wonder what would have been the attitude of the members of the Wesleyan Conference, and what would have been the comments of the great London dailies who represent Dissent, if the whole case had happened in the Catholic Church, and if the Congregations of the Inquisition or Index had had occasion to call to order some liberal Catholic professor, say at Vienna or Strassburg or Würzburg, and had caused him, under pain of deprivation of his chair, to cease from teaching the conclusions of which he was sincerely convinced, and required him not even to write upon the subject without leave from the Roman authorities.

That seems to us a just conclusion, but it is not a fact that the Dissenting Press had "nothing but applause and satisfaction at the result." The British Weekly was anything but satisfied, and if the Christian World appeared to be so, it was only through the acceptance of a compromise, judged to be desirable.

THE KESWICK CONVENTION.

ITS BODY, SOUL, AND SPIRIT.

(II.) ITS SOUL.

WHAT are the intellectual presuppositions which underlie and determine the form of the Institution as sketched in the preceding article? In other words, what is Keswick Theology?

Multitudes find their way year after year to Keswick from every part of the earth who, for some reason or other, do not understand the secrets of the blessed life, but ardently long to learn them. To minister to these is the first and chief purpose of the Convention.

We have seen that the purposes of the Convention are many and varied. To examine and report upon all would necessitate a bulky volume. Within the limits of these brief articles we shall be content to inquire how far the Convention does justice to that single purpose which in the words quoted from its recognised organ, The Life of Faith, is to be accounted "first and chief."

The ideal proposed is the very highest. To reveal "the secrets of the blessed life" has been the aim and claim of the greatest religious teachers everywhere and always.

A Christian is one who believes that the most successful of such teachers was Jesus, surnamed of Nazareth and the Christ. At all events, "Keswick Teaching" is identified with this hypothesis, and we may in all fairness use it as a criterion of that teaching. Whatever a man's teaching may mean, it can only be of value for his hearers for what it means to themselves. Thirteen schools of interpretation have not succeeded in exhausting the alternative aspects of Immanuel Kant; nor have a much larger number arrived at a harmonious presentment of the significance of Jesus. We do not propose to make another attempt here; but in few words (and apart from all questions of documents, authenticity, and whatever else is covered by the phrase "higher criticism") let us summarise the leading ideas of the teaching of Jesus. This will make our own position clear so far as thus defined, and the issues of the controversy with other interpretations will not be in doubt.

The Teaching of Jesus.

We are familiar with the phrase, and at the least we imagine ourselves familiar with the belief that "God is love." But the world was not always familiar with either. There was a time when men thought of God in terms of power only, with most direful apprehensious of ignorance as to the malignant possibilities of a power that could evoke no sentiment but of wonder and of dread. Such a belief was adducible from contemplation of external nature. But reflection upon other facts of life led to a readjusted theology which made infinite wisdom not less than infinite power a necessary part of an adequate notion of Godhead. Power and Wisdom are attributes which must overawe the human intellect, so conscious of its weakness and its folly. Small wonder, then, if the dominant note in man's attitude towards his God was at this time, according to circumstance and temperament, one of slavish self-abasement, arrogant defiance, fear, hatred, or suppliance. This was the prevalent condition when Jesus was born "in Bethlehem of Judæa in the days of Herod the King."* The world has come to date from that moment a complete change in its outlook. For Jesus grew up to teach it that God is not only Power and Wisdom, but also Love. He made possible a different attitude on man's part towards God; how different can only be appreciated by an attempt to realise the black chaotic darkness of a future predetermined by a fate inexorable, almighty, omniscient —and heartless.

This is how Jesus revealed the Father. Others had argued to the intellect of God from what they found given in the intellect of man; e.g., "He that planted the ear, shall He not hear?" Jesus argued to the character of God from what he found given in the character of man; of which fact there is, perhaps, no stronger or more familiar instance than the parable of the prodigal son. An imperium in imperio—a kingdom of heaven on earth — of righteousness and peace and joy; the forgiveness of sins; and an optimistic outlook upon the future—such are the salient features of the teaching of Jesus. Of himself he always spoke as of one who had authority to promulgate such teaching, and who had no other object in life but the doing of it.

Finally he gave his life "a ransom for many." There is no such thing as a Doctrine of the Atonement common to all, or universal in any of, the Churches; and the subject is too vast to discuss here. But whatever else the death of Jesus may or may not have been, it has always been potent to reconcile men to God. It is the supreme instance in human history of the triumph of idealism of which men never think but that they question—

> Derives it not from what we have
> The likest God within the soul?

That haggard, silent and blood-soiled figure hanging solitary on the hill-top in the gathering dusk is still drawing "all men unto him."

The Keswick Interpretation of the Cross.

The thousands at Keswick are only at Keswick so that they may the better realise Calvary. They would understand better the meaning and value of that life and death which even as imperfectly apprehended by them mean so much to them or suggest possibilities as yet vague. Here is a body of teachers gathered together for the professed purpose of explaining the meaning of Jesus and his teaching.

They claim to represent a "Church" founded by Jesus himself for the perpetuation of his own life's work and the actualisation of his own ideals. These inquirers then take their places in one of these crowded tents. The chairman stands up and announces "Hymn 498."

The great congregation rises to its feet and sings.

> It is not thy tears of repentance and prayers,
> But the Blood that atones for the soul;
> On Him, then, who shed it thou mayest at once
> Thy weight of iniquities roll.

Such is the transition from the teaching of Jesus to the teaching of Keswick!

The Gospel of Jesus is the assurance of the Love of God as evidenced by the life and death of himself.

The Gospel of Keswick is salvation from Hell by believing that the death of Jesus had a vicarious significance.

A Precarious Possession.

At the best this Keswick Gospel is a precarious possession. It stands upon a rickety foundation of hypotheses, any one of which by falling away must topple the whole edifice.

Theories of inspiration, interpretation, prophecy, dates, and authorships are essential. Hence Keswick shivers at the Higher Criticism; shivers and denounces, but does not listen. One prominent speaker held it safe to assume that his audience required no proof of the inspiration of the Bible. Another, equally popular, announced that Gen. iii. 15 is a verse "sufficient alone to accredit the Old Testament as inspired of God." When this passes for argument there is no reply but an astonished silence; and we had abundance of such "arguments" at Keswick. Instance the following theses:—

That the use of the word Elohim in Genesis denotes the Trinity.

That the Holy Ghost took the form of a dove because a dove has no gall.

That the "four dimensions" (sic) of Eph. iii. 18 have an inspired significance in respect of number and order of statement.

That Unitarians cannot go to Heaven because the Apocalypse shows the divinity of Christ to be an axiom there.

That the Psalms contain 3,000 promises which God is pledged to make good to claimants.

It is not easy to see what bearing these propositions have upon "The Secrets of the Blessed Life"; but we should err in conveying the impression that we heard nothing at Keswick more suggestive of Christian influences. Yet our last word on Keswick theology must be a confession of disappointment. Nor is this due to idiosyncrasies of individual speakers. Extravagances of utterance are not peculiar to any one School. Such publications as the "Cyclopedia Biblica" may serve to remind us, if reminder be needful, that we are living ourselves in glass houses and may well be careful how we throw stones at our neighbours. But in God's name let there be no talk of stone-throwing. If we criticise at all it is but in love and a spirit of meekness as those who are too jealous for truth to concern themselves for a controversial victory. We gladly recognise that theologies of all forms will serve to the embodiment of vital and vitalising truths; but our quarrel with Keswick theology is that it is inadequate to the truths it is put to represent.

It is a garment too small for the wearer. He feels himself half-naked, and he has at least the grace to be ashamed.

The Seekers' Unrest.

What is this unrest that drives men and women to Keswick? It is a complex thing; but not the smallest of its factors is the irreconcilable necessities of heart and head. They come to Keswick—some in confidence, some in hope, some almost in despair—that they may (in their own phrase) "wait upon God." They want Peace. They would see Jesus. And his Disciples in authority there forbid them access. They must stay away till they become certain that Moses wrote Genesis, and that Paul never made mistakes; they must accept a whole unproved—unprovable, often disproved—agglomeration of theological postulates, and then, they are told, they may come back and learn what are "the secrets of the Blessed Life."

In other words the Man Christ Jesus by whom we all have access through one spirit unto the Father becomes at Keswick the Sphinx Christ Jesus, who bars all access to the Father with conditions about solving inscrutable conundrums.

He is still the Door of the Fold: yet a door that opens not to simple knocking; but only to the private latch-key of a "School." We had not expected scholarly and erudite discourses: even less had we desired them. But it was an absence, not a travesty, of the academic attitude we had anticipated. This is why we were disappointed at Keswick. But we found much to encourage there also; and of these things it will be our pleasanter duty to give some account next week.

LITERATURE.

THE MEDICI.*

THE editor of the series of Biographical Studies entitled "The World's Epoch Makers," himself contributes this volume on the Medici, and seeks to vindicate their right to be regarded, through their connection with the Renaissance in Italy, as epoch-makers. He traces the continuity of the purpose which was handed down from the astute banker Giovanni de Medici, founder of the fortunes of the house, to his son Cosimo, who combined statesmanship and scholarship with finance, and from him, in turn, to Piero and Lorenzo de Medici, and to Lorenzo's third son Giovanni, who became Leo X., the greatest of the Humanist Popes.

Unlike some writers on the Medicean times, Mr. Smeaton is no apologist for those Florentine patrons of the "New Learning." He admits their political tyranny, their opportunism, their craftiness, the crimes of which they were sometimes guilty, and their cruel and unjust treatment of enemies; but he sees in them, also, an enthusiasm in the cause of culture and a generous patronage of scholars, and recognises that they were the encouragers of a popular movement towards the intellectual and artistic awakening which made Florence the "eye of Italy," as Athens in old times had been the "eye of Greece."

In an introductory chapter the theory is controverted which traces the awakening of the Renaissance spirit in Italy to that period in the fifteenth century when, on the fall of Constantinople, learned Greeks were driven thence to seek a new home in the Italian cities and specially in Florence. It is pointed out that this event was an accident only in the historic development of the Renaissance, though it gave a great impetus to the progress and diffusion of culture, and data are given to prove that some sixty years before the downfall of the Byzantine capital the prosecution of Hellenic studies had begun in Tuscany and distinguished Humanists had flourished there. An interesting passage to this effect reminds us also that the classic spirit had shown itself in the genius of the Tuscans in much earlier times:—

In the Tuscan genius there was something predisposing it to pursue everything that savoured of freedom, to strike out new paths in politics, literature, science and art, and to revel in life, light and colour. Long before the dates usually assigned for the birth of the Renaissance spirit, Tuscany in general and Florence in particular were the home of all that was greatest and best in letters and art. Dante, Petrarch, Boccaccio in literature; Cimabue, Giotto, Buffalmacco in painting; Niccolo Pisano in sculpture; Andrea Pisano and Ghiberti in bronze work; Orcagna in the inspiration he gave to strict methods of design, had all prepared the soil for the Renaissance seed. Even early in the Middle Ages the Tuscans were aiming at a revival or Renaissance of Architecture. Arnolfo del Cambio, both in his designs for public or municipal buildings and for ecclesiastical structures, aimed at a union of Grecian simplicity with Gothic minuteness of detail. He is only a type of many who, inspired by the classic spirit long before the Revival of Letters, sought to impress it upon their work. We mention these facts to show that the Renaissance, in its literary aspect, was not the earliest form of the great inspiration; but that the classic spirit, which had reached its highest expression in the Hellenic sculpture of Phidias and Praxiteles, after lingering in remote regions and amid forgotten forms of art, was gradually reawakened to an intelligent expression of the language of high imaginings, by the brush of Cimabue and Giotto, and the chisel of Niccolo Pisano. The intense susceptibility of the Florentines was the predisposing cause of their early pre-eminence in every branch of Renaissance culture.

Passing from the résumé which forms the first chapter, we enter upon a consideration of the motives and methods of the Medici, of their adoption of the popular side in the conflicts between nobles and trade ("Grandi" and "Arti"), and, when by wealth alone distinction in the Republic could be attained, of their devotion to commerce. "I am too old an oak to have my branches bent in new directions," said Giovanni, the famous banker, who looked askance on the Revival of Letters which, to his descendants, bore the aspect of a future world-wide influence; and it was reserved for them to advance the Renaissance by the wealth he bequeathed to them and the power which this wealth enabled them to gain.

It is, therefore, as the instruments by which Providence prospered the growth of the Renaissance seed already sown in Tuscany that we are to view the Medici family in the light of epoch-makers, and in the third chapter Mr. Smeaton tells the history of Cosimo de Medici, who has been called "Pater patriæ" and the "Florentine foster-father of the Renaissance." Far from sharing in the mediæval sympathies of his father, Giovanni de Medici, Cosimo seems to have recognised the fact that the Church was opposed to the "New Learning," and this saying is recorded of him in youth: "If St. Peter is to keep the keys of the road to the tree of knowledge as well as those of the gates of Heaven and Hell, from past experience nine-tenths of us would prefer to go to Beelzebub at the beginning in place of having to do so at the end." Thus, we are reminded, he recognised the growing demand for lay culture, and furthered the establishment of High schools in Florence "whereby the people were enabled to become students of the coveted 'New Learning' along with those whose wealth placed the means in their own hands."

The story of Cosimo's chequered life, part of which, as we know, was spent in exile, is well told, and full justice is done to all his services to Florence. Mention is made of the large library he formed while printing was yet unknown, of the exquisite treasures he unearthed and gathered together from far and near for popular enjoyment; of the Platonic Academy he established, of which the celebrated Marsiglio Ficino, still better known in Lorenzo's time, was the first President.

In a word, Florence during Cosimo's life was the birth-place of that spirit of intellectual and religious liberty as well as the battle-ground where were fought the early engagements of that mighty war between ecclesiastical authority and freedom of conscience. From her Mercato Vecchio, or Market Square, those germs of spiritual freedom spread to Germany, Switzerland, France and England which in time produced the Reformation.

Yet the story of Cosimo's mean jealousy of contemporary Florentine nobles, who were already enthusiasts in the Renaissance movement, and the rivalry which formed one strong motive for his support of the Humanists, is also clearly told, and casts a disappointing shadow on the enthusiasm for learning, the genuine encouragement of scholarship and the breadth of mind which led him to recognise in the Humanist movement a world-wide influence.

Short biographical sketches are given of the distinguished scholars who were members of the Medicean circle in the days of Cosimo, and these add much to the interest of this section of the book. Only a few pages are devoted to the history of Piero's work, which was little more than a preparation for the greater glory of his son's epoch, and in the fifth chapter we enter upon the age of Lorenzo the Magnificent, an uncrowned king, but in reality the holder of the balance of power in Italy, and the head of the Renaissance movement while he lived. His history is probably more familiar to general readers than that of Cosimo; but though possessing special picturesqueness and interest from its connection with Savonarola and Michael Angelo, and a Court life enriched by such men as Poliziano, Ficino, and, best of all, Pico della Mirandola, this chapter does not seem to equal in interest that which is concerned with Cosimo, possibly owing to the fact that the latter, though less famous in history, was the originator of the work carried out and supplemented by Lorenzo. A special feature in this fifth chapter which should be acceptable to students is the account so clearly given of Lorenzo's great and manifold services to the Renaissance movement, on which, however, there is no space to enlarge here. For the same reason the interesting history of Pope Leo X. and his attitude towards the New Learning can only have a passing allusion. "As the magnet attracteth iron, so doth Pope Leo the Humanists," was said of him when it was seen how men of Letters flocked to the Papal Court, drawn there in part by the fame of the Chairs he founded and endowed so richly, and by his establishment of a Greek printing press in the city.

The volume, which possesses a good index, concludes with a few pages on the age of Clement VII., but the interest of his Pontificate, as regards the Renaissance movement, ends with the sack of Rome in 1527, after which event "learning had forever taken her flight across the Alps, and Rome henceforth was to be regarded not as the centre of European culture, but merely as the seat of the Head of the Roman Hierarchy and as the spiritual metropolis of one of the sects of the world's religions."

Enough has, perhaps, been said to suggest how valuable this clear and concise history of the Renaissance in Italy is likely to prove to readers who have little leisure for elaborate study. To young people especially who have already been attracted by the story of our own Oxford Reformers and all that England, through them, owed to the possibilities for Greek culture in Florence, it should prove of special interest.

FRANCES E. COOKE.

MR. PAUL ON MATTHEW ARNOLD.*

MR. PAUL'S critique of Matthew Arnold has itself already met with some trenchant criticism, and I think justly so. I am sure that he could have produced a very much better volume if his mood had been a little more genial and a little less pedantic. And from Mr. Paul we expect geniality, and do not look for pedantry. Indeed, it is difficult to think of anyone who could have given us a finer appreciation of Arnold than Mr. Paul at his best would have produced. An accomplished Oxford man, with wit and breadth not dissimilar to those of the brilliant critic himself, with a gentle satire all his own, but again akin to that of the subject of his book, with wide knowledge of classical and English poetry, who more likely to give us a life-like and sympathetic sketch of one whom he is so well fitted to appreciate and to understand?

But Mr. Paul, like too many of his contemporaries, gives a narrow interpretation to the duties of a critic. Criticism does not mean petty fault-finding, and even though the faults dwelt on were conceded to be actual, too heavy an insistence on them would produce a distorted picture. Criticism includes just, generous, and sympathetic appreciation. But Mr. Paul never seems to feel that he is writing about a very great man of letters, one who, whatever his faults and limitations, wrote prose and poetry stamped with rare original genius and greatly moved the mind and heart of his generation. He never seems to let himself go. He must point out that such and such a line scans defectively, that such and such a verse is prosaic; and one gets no sense of the rare richness and volume of the total effect of Matthew Arnold as a poet. I do not envy the man who can pronounce fastidious judgments on the metre of "Rugby Chapel," a metre which seems to me the almost "inevitable" vehicle of its sentiment, or who shows no sign of the deep emotion with which that exquisite utterance of filial piety must fill every responsive bosom.

Mr. Paul castigates Matthew Arnold severely for his repetitions. The incessant reiteration of a poignant term or phrase he deems beneath the level of dignified literature. It is quite true that such repetition, in the hands of a second-rate writer, would strike one as offensive if not drivelling, and drivelling if not offensive. But we must judge the strength of literature by its effects. "Philistine," "barbarian," "the secret of Jesus," "the method of Jesus," "conduct three-fourths of life," "sweet reasonableness," "sweetness and light," "a stream of tendency," "a power not ourselves that makes for righteousness"—these and other words and combinations of words Arnold works, as we all know, with an insistent iteration. But what has been the effect? Why, that every one of these expressions has stamped itself on the mind of every educated Englishman with extraordinary force and vividness; and that the general attitude of him who coined them to the social and religious problems of his day is distinct and unforgettable; and that they work with unexhausted vitality still in the intellectual atmosphere of our time.

It is a little difficult to say exactly for whom Mr. Paul is writing. Is it for those who know their Matthew Arnold well and have all the literary culture of their time well in hand? If so, there is a good deal of information given which is somewhat superfluous, and it was hardly necessary to call attention to the fact that "Morality" "begins at once with a fine stanza," quoting it in full. Or is it for the tyro that Mr. Paul writes, inviting him to the study of a writer with whom he is presumably unacquainted? If so, it is a little unfair to tell him that "Shairp's lines about Matthew Arnold are too hackneyed for quotation," to refer without explanation to "the prophecy which Dryden delivered to Swift," and to give the great Virgilian hexameters "Felix qui potuit," &c., followed immediately by four lines of Arnold, totally unconnected therewith, which, to him who has no Latin, will certainly appear to be given as "a paraphrase" of the lines above them. (P. 33.)

Of "Literature and Dogma," Mr. Paul writes:—

> With this book he severed himself from orthodox Christianity, and even from Unitarianism as commonly understood. He had, indeed, a curious dislike of Unitarians, whom he called Socinians, which he may have inherited from his father. Yet his own creed, if creed it can be called, would have horrified Dr. Arnold far more than theirs. For he rejected not merely miracles, but the personality of God. (P. 133.)

I do not think that it is quite accurate to say that Matthew Arnold "rejected" the personality of God. He rejected the conception of God as a magnified man; and he insisted that the prophets of Israel never considered the problem of the Divine personality from a metaphysical point of view. But I would rather say that he set aside the discussion of the personality of God as irrelevant and incapable of profitable handling than that he "rejected" it. His position was Agnostic, not Atheistic. As a matter of fact, of course, the prophets of Israel did regard God as a person, whether under the name of Yahweh or of Elohim; but they did not consider what the metaphysical contents of the idea were, and were quite free from any tendency to speculate on the internal economy of the Divine nature.

On the whole Mr. Paul's Essay seems immeasurably superior to Professor Saintsbury's in Blackwood's sister series, "Modern English Writers." If one is not altogether satisfied with it, that is mainly due to the bright anticipations which Mr. Paul's name upon the title-page elicited.

THE TRUE SPIRIT OF A CHURCH.

MAY 25 was a day memorable in the history of the community of Springfield, Mass. Fifty years ago on that day the town was incorporated, and on the anniversary in the present year an historical sermon was preached in the Church of the Unity by the present minister, the Rev. Bradley Gilman, in which we find some passages which we are glad to reproduce here.

Springfield had its origin in 1636, as the "Agawam Settlement" on the Connecticut, soon taking its present name from the old home in England of the leader of the settlers. The first Church, of the Congregational order, was speedily organised, and its first meeting-house was built in 1646. A fourth building, in direct succession, was in course of erection in 1819, when a secession from the parent society took place, and a "Third Congregational Society" was formed in Springfield, now known as the Church of the Unity.

In the following passages of his sermon Mr. Gilman tells of the character of this Third Church, and of its first minister. To this it is that we desire especially to call attention:—

"This separation from the parent society originated not in any pique or prejudice, but in profound religious convictions. The then pastor of the First Church, Dr. Samuel Osgood, was a vigorous, consistent expounder of that harsh Calvinism which had ruled the lives of the Puritans, but now was relaxing and crumbling throughout New England under the gentle, softening influence of the broader and more loving interpretation of Christianity which was taught by William Ellery Channing.

"It is well for us to remember that our Church of the Unity originated, not in any worldly rivalry, but in courageous conviction. Such a spirit, however, admirable as it is, often crystallises into harsh lines and sharp angles; it frequently develops a severity and rigidity of theological expression which is repellant toward persons outside its borders, and injurious toward the finer spiritual elements within. Fortunate it was, therefore, for this church, that its first minister, the Rev. William B. O. Peabody, was a man who combined the firm fibre of the theologian with the sympathetic receptive attitude of the poet. This is the spiritual blend which has usually characterised the greatest religious leaders of all times. And I not only believe that this church owes much to its first minister, Dr. Peabody, but I believe that it might not have survived some of the trying experiences which have come to it, had it not been upheld by the earnest religious spirit with which it was infused, during that first pastorate of twenty-seven years. Therefore I feel that, much as our society owes to the several earnest men who have been its ministers, it owes by far the most to Dr. William Peabody.

"In order that the younger members of this congregation may better understand the wise blending of head and heart which characterised Dr. Peabody's ministry, I will read from an address given by him at the end of twenty-three years of his pastorate. He said: 'As soon as I took charge of the pulpit, a question rose up before me. Should I consider it my duty to explain and extend the liberal opinion, or should I devote myself to the personal improvement of the members of my society, trusting that the truth with respect to doctrines would make its own way in the public mind? In pursuing the former course, I should have struck the keynote, of the general feeling; zeal of this kind excites a ready sympathy, and the want of it is regarded as tameness. Such a course would have added more to our numbers than any other; and many plausible reasons might have been given to show that it was the right one. But I could not persuade myself that this was the way of duty. I knew that as fast and as far as party passions are excited, devotion and charity are apt to forsake the breast; I 'therefore determined,' if it is not presumption in me to use the words, 'I therefore determined to know nothing among you, save Jesus Christ and him crucified.' Since men were sent into the world, not to put on the livery of a party, but to lay the foundations of character, in preparation for immortal life, I would always spend the best of my strength to impress this solemn and indispensable duty upon all whom my voice could reach.'"

Dr. Peabody died in 1847, and was succeeded by the Rev. G. F. Simmons, who was one of those faithful men who in "the martyr age" had to resign their pulpits for preaching against slavery. The roll of subsequent ministers, our readers will remember, includes the Rev. John Cuckson, afterwards of Arlington-street Church, Boston, and now of the First Church, Plymouth, Mass.

The conclusion of Mr. Gilman's sermon may be also added here:—

"In closing, I point out to you that an occasion like the present one, an anniversary like that which our city now celebrates, offers to every citizen an opening out of his dull, sordid round of commonplace cares, into a larger field with wider outlook. Let it teach us, friends, as we to-day and to-morrow 'consider the days of old, and the years of ancient times,' let it teach us that the year 1902 is not an isolated year, and that its events and conditions cannot be wholly separated from the events and conditions of the years gone before. Our lives are links in the chain of cause and effect, stretching back to that day, fifty years ago, which we now commemorate, and still back to those anxious wilderness days of the Agawam Plantation. As we think on these things, a new dignity crowns our citizenship, and a fresh loyalty to church and city animates our hearts. And if our sense of historic obligation blossoms, as it should, into religious aspiration, we may well repeat the prayer of the poet:

'Anew we pledge ourselves to Thee,
To follow, where Thy truth shall lead;
That truth, alone, can make us free;
Who goes with God, is safe indeed.'"

IN PRAISE OF WHEELS.

WHAT is the creature that goes on four legs in the morning, on two legs in the day, and on three legs in the evening? asked the Sphinx. And Œdipus found the solution in man, who first crawls on all fours, then walks on his two legs, and then hobbles with the aid of his stick. But if the Sphinx had lived to-day, she would not have spoken of legs, but wheels. The great invention of wheels had taken place long before the time of the Sphinx, for we know that when Œdipus, who solved the riddle, had his fatal encounter with his father Laius, the latter was driving a chariot. But wheels had not practically superseded legs; they were as yet "under agents" in the human drama. Now we have changed all that, and the riddle should run: What is the creature that goes on four wheels in the morning, on two wheels in the day, and on three wheels in the evening?

Man begins his peregrinations on the four wheels of his perambulator. The significance of this triumph of civilisation is not fully realised, because those who chiefly benefit by it are for various reasons not amongst the classes who talk and who therefore impress their views of the relative significance of things upon the talking and writing world. But here and there we may come upon one who observes and feels and forms estimates direct from the facts. Such a one, looking back over eighty years and the changes they had brought, declared without hesitation that the perambulator was the greatest invention of her day. This was not only because of its benefits to the baby and to the nurse or mother, but also and chiefly for what it does for the ex-baby. Those who can remember the days before its advent can recall to the ear and eye the weary little ex-baby, dragged along all askew by the poor mother who was carrying the baby, and uttering an incessant wail with a special note and character of its own, now never heard save by accident. For now the ex-baby serenely occupies his own end of the perambulator and gazes or grins at his successor—the sharer instead of the usurper of his tranquil enjoyment. Fifty years ago wherever the sons and daughters of men congregated, the air was as full of the wail of the ex-baby as country lanes are of the song of birds. Now it is so seldom heard that it startles the ear and recalls a long-vanished world to those (fewer every year) who once lived in it. The invention of the perambulator, then, wherever it has spread, has practically eliminated a note from the gamut of woe. Can as much be said of the penny post, of the halfpenny Press, of steam transit or of telegraphy? Nay, to go further back, can as much be said of the invention of printing, or of the mariner's compass? Chloroform has removed occasional suffering which captivates the imagination by its intensity and its horror; but what are the sufferings removed by chloroform in their volume and vital significance compared to the suffering relieved by the perambulator?

So now humanity begins life upon four wheels, greatly to its delectation; and hardly has the ex-baby bidden adieu to the perambulator than he mounts the bicycle to go on two wheels for all the working portion of his life. Now, if the four wheels have diminished suffering, the two wheels have increased delight beyond the range of the inventions, whether of our own or of previous centuries, which we are chiefly wont to glorify. A French writer some time ago claimed for the bicycle that it was the greatest invention since the discovery of fire, because it entered more closely and intimately into the life of man than any other discovery, transforming him from one of the relatively slow-going to one of the relatively fast-going beasts of the earth. To the Londoner the bicycle means the possibility of getting into the real country, and to the dweller in the country it means the possibility of keeping in touch with friends within a radius of some twenty miles without interruption of the ordinary occupations of the day. To both it has meant the discovery of the beauties of English scenery, a rediscovery of the land in which we live as food for the eye and the imagination just at the period when we are told it is rapidly losing its significance as a producer of food for the body. Man shall not live by bread alone; and the recovered life of the road may well be taken into consideration as an off-set against fields going out of cultivation. The bicycle is a great moralising agent too; for contact with nature and the breathing of fresh air cleanse the soul; and, moreover, cycling has taught vast numbers of persons to understand the purely illusory character of the sense of manhood and efficiency derived from the imbibing of spirituous liquors. This subjective illusion succumbs to the hard fact that you can mount a hill on hot water without the whiskey that you have to get off to if you have indulged in the stimulant.

As a social force it is difficult to exaggerate the effect of the bicycle in the emancipation of women. But until recently it has, perhaps, done little towards extending the companionship of the sexes. Whether as man and wife (actual, prospective, or hypothetical), or as brother and sister, mother and son, father and daughter, man and woman often find their comradeship limited by uneven powers of endurance. The attempt to ignore this inequality may result in a hurtful strain, and the recognition of it may exclude a large part of life from the most perfect form of comradeship. Any invention which should reclaim portions of this excluded area would make an appreciable difference to the sum of human happiness. Till recently the wheel has done little or nothing in this direction. There is no true feeling of partnership suggested by the man and woman on a single bicycle. The affectation of the two being so completely one as to require only two wheels between them is overdone, and does not take us in. But now there has come the trail-chair. It accords with the great Sphinx principle of two wheels each in the day of life, for it gives four wheels to two. It equalises on an indefinitely elastic system the inequality of physical powers, for hills and counter-winds may be treated in an indefinite number of ways, indefinitely varying the pressure upon the trailer and the trailee; so that with a little practice the two may learn to keep themselves on a perfect parity of freshness or fatigue. It is the old story of the fox's brush come true. The princess takes her seat on the bend of the wicker tail, and "away they go over hill

But the theme is becoming too great for our powers, and we must hasten to a close. The time comes at last when, in spite of our having so long and so stoutly maintained that a bicycle is really safer than a tricycle, we have to relinquish our two wheels in favour of three, and to join the ranks of the white-haired old men who, with modest dignity, trudge along level places on their tricycles, or the old ladies who take their three wheels attached to a bath-chair. Then, when we have ceased to go at all, there comes the epilogue; the end unites with the beginning; we return to four wheels for the one last journey, and then we never need wheels any more. P. H. THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

It will be just ten years, early to-morrow morning, since John Greenleaf Whittier, the American Quaker poet, passed peacefully away. He was an old man at the time of his death, nearly eighty-five, and he had gained the love and honour of a great many friends, in this country as well as in America, and, indeed, in all parts of the world. He is not one of the great poets of the world, but we delight in many of his verses, and find a great deal of help in them, because of their simplicity and the beautiful spirit that is in them, and also because of the ring of true manliness in what he writes as a lover of truth and freedom, and an earnest champion of the great cause of anti-slavery. The story of his life and of what he was in himself is really finer than any of his poems, and we must be always thankful to have known such a man.

I hope during the next few weeks to take some of the finest and most beautiful of Whittier's poems, and to ask you to read and think about them. I expect a good many of you already know "The story of John Greenleaf Whittier," written by Miss F. E Cooke, whom all of you know who read this column. Her little book is published by the Sunday School Association and can be had for a shilling. Get it, and read it, if you can; and if you have it already, read it again! There is something about Whittier, too, in "Twelve Hymns and their Writers," another of the little books published by the Association.

Among Whittier's poems there is one which is specially interesting, because in it he gives us a picture of his old home, of his father and mother, and the other members of the family, when he lived as a boy in the old farmhouse at Haverhill. "Snow-Bound: A Winter Idyl," is the name of the poem, which was published in 1865. When it was written, only one brother was left to Whittier; father, mother and sisters were all dead, so that he looks back with very tender feelings on the old scenes. He himself was nearly fifty-eight years old, and he had already fought through the battle of his life, sacrificing much and bearing hardship and neglect with a quiet, resolute spirit, in the great struggle to give freedom to the slaves. That victory was won, and now that he was growing old he at last gained by this poem popularity and success as a poet.

He first pictures the cold winter's day in the country, when everything was covered over with deep snow, and then in these lines tells how they dug out a path from the house to the stable:—

A prompt, decisive man, no breath
Our father wasted: "Boys, a path!"
Well pleased (for when did farmer boy
Count such a summons less than joy?),
Our buskins on our feet we drew;
With mittened hands, and caps drawn low,
To guard our necks and ears from snow,
We cut the solid whiteness through.
And, where the drift was deepest, made
A tunnel walled and overlaid
With dazzling crystal: we had read
Of rare Aladdin's wondrous cave,
And to our own his name we gave,
With many a wish the luck were ours
To test his lamp's supernal powers.
We reached the barn with merry din,
And roused the prisoned brutes within.
The old horse thrust his long head out,
And grave with wonder gazed about;
The cock his lusty greeting said,
And forth his speckled harem led;
The oxen lashed their tails, and hooked,
And mild reproach of hunger looked;
The hornéd patriarch of the sheep,
Like Egypt's Amun roused from sleep,
Shook his sage head with gesture mute,
And emphasised with stamp of foot.

It was solitary country in which they lived, and everything was very quiet in the snow; even the voice of the merry little brook, buried in the snow, could no longer be heard. And so when evening came they got in plenty of wood, and gathered round the fire, snugly sheltered from the stormy north wind,

And ever, when a louder blast
Shook beam and rafter as it passed,
The merrier up its roaring draught
The great throat of the chimney laughed.

So, looking back across the years, Whittier sees his loved ones gathered round the fire, his mother busy with her knitting or the spinning-wheel, telling stories of the old days, an uncle "innocent of books," but "rich in lore of fields and brooks,"

Next, the dear aunt, whose smile of cheer
And voice in dreams I see and hear, one who had "found peace in love's unselfishness," and two sisters, the elder

A full, rich nature, free to trust,
Truthful, and almost sternly just,
Impulsive, earnest, prompt to act,
And make her generous thought a fact,
Keeping in many a light disguise
The secret of self-sacrifice.

And the younger, who, when Whittier wrote, had only been taken from him in the year before;

Upon the motley-braided mat
Our youngest and our dearest sat,
Lifting her large, sweet, asking eyes,
Now bathed within the fadeless green
And holy peace of Paradise.

With them the old schoolmaster had a place by the fire, to which he was always welcome, and sometimes there were other guests.

At last the great logs on the fire were burning low, and the clock pointing to nine told them it was bedtime. Their uncle knocked the ashes out of his pipe, and carefully covered over the embers of the fire,

And while, with care, our mother laid
The work aside, her steps she stayed
One moment, seeking to express
Her grateful sense of happiness
For food and shelter, warmth and health,
And love's contentment more than wealth,
With simple wishes (not the weak,
Vain prayers which no fulfilment seek,
But such as warm the generous heart,
O'er-prompt to do with Heaven its part)
That none might lack, that bitter night,
For bread and clothing, warmth and light.

Then follows a picture of the morning, and a call from the wise old doctor, telling their mother of a neighbour who needed her help; and after a week of such quiet days, shut off from the great world, the post came in, and through the newspaper they learnt something of what was going on beyond their own little circle.

It is a very simple picture, but with many quaint and beautiful touches, and at the end of the poem there are some lines which show that Whittier knew how grateful many readers would be for such a recalling of the old days, which would remind them also of their own old homes and childhood.

For himself the following lines, which come earlier in the poem, show how deeply he felt it, and with what calm faith he thought of those who had passed before him through the "valley of the shadow," beyond which he saw the clear shining of the heavenly day.

O Time and Change!—with hair as gray
As was my sire's that winter day,
How strange it seems, with so much gone
Of life and love, to still live on!
Ah, brother! only I and thou
Are left of all that circle now,—
The dear home faces whereupon
That fitful firelight paled and shone.
Henceforward, listen as we will,
The voices of that hearth are still;
Look where we may, the wide earth o'er,
Those lighted faces smile no more.
We tread the paths their feet have worn,
We sit beneath their orchard-trees,
We hear, like them, the hum of bees
And rustle of the bladed corn:
We turn the pages that they read,
Their written words we linger o'er,
But in the sun they cast no shade,
No voice is heard, no sign is made,
No step is on the conscious floor!

Yet Love will dream, and Faith will trust (Since He who knows our need is just),
That somehow, somewhere, meet we must.
Alas for him who never sees
The stars shine through his cypress-trees!
Who, hopeless, lays his dead away,
Nor looks to see the breaking day
Across the mournful marbles play!
Who hath not learned, in hours of faith,
The truth to flesh and sense unknown,
That Life is ever lord of Death,
And Love can never lose its own!

ASSURED KNOWLEDGE OF GOD.

SIR HENRY THOMPSON'S striking essay on "The Unknown God"? appeared originally in the March number of the Fortnightly Review, and attracted naturally a very widespread attention. That a distinguished surgeon, thoroughly familiar with the progress of scientific knowledge, at the close of a long career, should make a pronouncement on the fundamental questions of religion, was in itself sufficient to ensure for it an eager scrutiny; and if the essay has not furnished any fresh argument on its high theme, or any specially brilliant exposition, it has proved to have other qualities which give it serious significance, and that attractive power which is in every sincere personal confession. It is, therefore, with good reason that the essay has been reissued as a booklet,* which may readily be passed from hand to hand, and thus afford many opportunities for the earnest consideration of the great questions with which it deals.

Sir HENRY THOMPSON, who speaks out of the rich experience of his more than eighty years, himself tells us of the origin of his essay. More than twenty years ago, he began to collect the material on which it is based, and to make notes intended simply for his own use. Troubled by the numerous and conflicting claims of the various Christian sects, he determined to seek truth for himself. Amid the religious Babel he could not believe that any supernatural revelation had been vouchsafed to man, and at that time, apparently, he had little expectation of reaching any assurance of religious conviction, for he gladly confesses that his present conclusion is contrary to that which he entertained during the first part of his inquiry. He was at that time depressed by realising the slow progress of the race, and the miseries and hardships which man has had to endure from the earliest ages; only afterwards a happier view of life took possession of him, and made his long inquiry a veritable "Pilgrim's Progress." In 1884, when he had already been occupied for some years on the subject, he copied into his notebook a sentence of HERBERT SPENCER'S, then first published, which now stands as motto at the beginning of the essay :—

Amid the mysteries which become the more mysterious the more they are thought about, there will remain the absolute certainty that he (the Astronomer) is ever in presence of an Infinite and Eternal Energy from which all things proceed.

The aim of Sir HENRY THOMPSON'S inquiry was to make a careful induction from the known facts of the Universe, including not only external nature, but human nature and the long history of man, and thus to see what more could be said of the "Infinite and Eternal Energy, from which all things proceed"; and his conclusion is an "unshakable confidence" in that Source of all, not only as Power, but as Wisdom and Beneficence, pervading and ruling the Universe. Thus the Infinite and Eternal, whom we call GOD, is far from being unknown, and we are brought by the reasoned conviction of a thoughtful and enlightened man to an assured foundation for religious faith.

He declares, indeed, that there has been no supernatural revelation and man's slow progress through the ages has been by his own "unaided efforts"; but this has been amid the acknowledged unity of nature, dependent on the one source of Infinite and Eternal Energy—that is to say, it has been with God always, and in the Universe as He has ordered it; and such a statement is no more than an acknowledgment that by the process and education of natural experience the evolution of the race is best effected. The thought of the slow process, and the miseries and hardships involved, had at first a depressing effect upon the inquirer's mind, but finally he was convinced that any supernatural interference, so far from being a help, would have hindered the true development of man, and the fact of his having had to fight his own way through has fitted him in the best possible way for his place in this work-a-day world. One section of the essay touches briefly on the question of pain and death, following the line of thought so powerfully worked out in Dr. MARTINEAU'S "Study of Religion," with the conclusion that these also have their fitting place in the beneficent order.

"Natural Religion," in Sir HENRY THOMPSON'S view, is destined ultimately to take the place of all those forms of faith based upon a supposed supernatural revelation; indeed, he expects that at no very distant date the religious part of the community will be divided into two distinct camps or classes, "those who enjoy complete liberty of thought and action, and practise the manly virtues which are associated therewith," and on the other hand the devotees of the old Papal Church, the one consistent enemy of all freedom and the upholder of the ancient system in its completest form. Finally, this also will pass away, and there will remain for the world only "Natural Religion."

Now, with this position we find ourselves in complete agreement, if only "natural" and "revealed" are properly defined, and the clear implications of religion, which is the outcome of natural experience in this Universe, in which we cannot go where GOD is not, are allowed their full weight. We, too, hold that there has been no "supernatural revelation," according to the old conception of revelation, but nevertheless that the natural growth of the spiritual life, marvellous in every living soul, most marvellous in the supreme teachers of our race, has made clear to us the divine relations in which we stand and gives an assured knowledge of GOD.

This Natural Religion, as has been already stated, has its foundation in perfect trust in the Power, Wisdom, and Beneficence of the Infinite and Eternal energy from which the whole universe proceeds. For the man who is thus religious, it is further stated, "adoration of the grandeur and of the beneficence which pervade the universe is the only sentiment suitable for public or for private religious service." He is glad and thankful to have his place in the universe as it is, and, living in perfect trust, is unanxious about any possible future there may be for him. His only prayer must be, "Thy will, not mine, be done."

Earlier in the essay, Sir HENRY THOMPSON appears to accept a definition of HUXLEY'S, "Religion ought to mean simply reverence and love for the Ethical ideal, and the desire to realise that ideal in life"; but it is to be remembered that this ethical ideal, slowly arrived at by the growing experience of the race, must have its origin also in the Infinite and Eternal source of all, is in fact of GOD, revealing to us the Divine purpose in human life; and if we are allowed adoration of the Wisdom and Beneficence of the Eternal, its deepest root surely is in the conviction that in our loyalty to Righteousness we are at one with GOD.

And we must claim a wider range for prayer and religious service than is allowed in this essay, as being both natural and helpful in the truest sense.

Communion with the Eternal cannot be forbidden by the most rigid conception of natural law. Our kinship is not with the external things, but with the One, Beneficent and Wise, who is Source of all. "Thy Will be done" must of course be the spirit of all true prayer, and we may recognise the folly of asking for any interference with the Divine order of the world; but to ask for fresh strength, in that hidden fellowship of our deeper life, to lay every relation and every need of our spiritual life bare in that holy Presence, to seek for a "closer walk with GOD," a truer realising of His constant nearness, and our rest in Him, our joy in that communion—all this, and much more, we hold to be clearly and inevitably a part of our "Natural Religion." By such communion and prayer the true life of man is nourished and uplifted, and by the practical remembrance of these things our worship is enriched.

On this same basis we claim also a deeper interest in the life beyond what is called death, finding among the elements of our natural faith, that conviction of the abiding reality of personal spiritual life, without which we can have no knowledge either of GOD or of the Universe, but with which, both for ourselves and those whom we love, we are delivered from the fear of Death.

And when the matter is further considered, we find all that we value so much in our Christian faith and fellowship taking its place no less inevitably in the great order of this Natural Religion, by "demonstration of the Spirit," the truly human life of JESUS, and all that it has meant and means for our common humanity, holding the first place in the evolution of what is best and of most abiding worth in Man. This also is given us by the Beneficence of the Eternal.

Sir HENRY THOMPSON has laid, as we believe, a true foundation in this essay for an assured knowledge of GOD, but all the riches of that knowledge, as indeed he himself confesses, the essay does not unfold.

MISS R. DAVENPORT-HILL.

BORN AUG. 4, 1825, DIED AUG. 5, 1902.

DURING the holiday season this year death has removed from our midst several honoured and devoted men and women whose obituary notices have appeared in the columns of THE INQUIRER. A brief note on Miss Rosamund Davenport-Hill was published at the time of her death, but some fuller appreciation of her life and work was needed; and my apology for offering to supply it is that I was closely associated with her in public work during the latter half of her long period of service on the London School Board, where she laboured for the community with such industry and faithfulness.

The eldest daughter of Mathew Davenport-Hill, the famous Recorder of Birmingham, Miss Hill inherited from him a spirit of wisdom and goodness, of strength and tenderness, of independent thought and benevolent action—qualities which, though modestly held, were conspicuous in her every word and deed. Business-like in all her ways, she performed her public duties with a promptitude and punctuality equal to any city merchant intent on making his fortune. This characteristic, also, she attributed to her father. Her mother's delicate health seems to have cast upon her household responsibilities which in later years fitted her for discharging the duties connected with the Domestic Economy classes in London.

When Miss Hill was about twenty-six years of age, she left London and went to reside in Bristol, where she became acquainted with Miss Mary Carpenter. She was soon imbued with the desire to be of service to others, and for several years she taught in the Ragged School, afterwards an industrial school, in that city. The knowledge and experience thus gained were a great help to her when, later in life, she undertook the superintendence of similar work in London.

Her father died in 1872. Along with her sister Florence she spent some time in foreign travel. Once more settling down in the metropolis, she was elected in 1879 one of the representatives of the City of London on the School Board. She was returned at each subsequent triennial election until her retirement, owing to failing eyesight and ill-health, in 1897. The City during the last twenty years has not been remarkable for its support of what are known as Liberal principles; but to its credit it never once failed to cast enough votes to secure Miss Davenport-Hill's return. In 1894, when Mr. Athelstane Riley, having for the moment captured Mr. J. R. Diggle, made his appeal on behalf of what he was pleased to call "Christian" teachers and teaching, the City of London placed Miss Hill at the top of the poll with thousands of votes to spare; her clerical opponents, though they included a Duke, crept in far below her; and yet it was an open secret that she was a Unitarian. Her election committee included many of the most honoured and respected citizens of London. She had won their confidence by the simple honesty and integrity of her character; they felt that here was a woman thoroughly worthy of their support.

Once a member of the London School Board, she soon took her place as one of its most assiduous and reliable workers. For nine years she did not miss a single meeting of the Board. On committees she followed the details of a large and complicated administration with unceasing vigilance. During the years we worked together, the Liberal or Progressive section of the Board was in a minority; and it was only by regular and prolonged attendance at Board and Committee meetings that the larger and freer policy to which Miss Hill was attached could be helped forward. In the early part of 1894, when the agitation over the imposition of the now dead and buried Trinitarian Circular to the Teachers was at its height, and an all-night sitting of the Board was threatened, she was one of the first to offer to remain at the Embankment offices the whole night rather than allow theological tests to be imposed upon the teachers. On her retirement from the Board, it was a great joy to her to find that the forces of reaction had been checked, and the friends of freedom and progress placed in a majority.

Miss Davenport-Hill took a keen interest in every department of the Board's work, but domestic subjects (including cookery, laundry, and needlework) and industrial schools occupied her chief thought and care. Although she seldom made speeches at the Board, on committees she often offered brief and pertinent observations, criticisms, and suggestions full of insight, and backed by personally acquired knowledge. Even those who were opposed to her views could not withhold their admiration for the unselfish zeal which she so constantly displayed. Her sympathies lay with the older type of Liberalism. She did not feel attracted by some of the Socialistic experiments of a small section of the Board, for she feared they would tend to weaken parental responsibility, and in the end increase the very evils which it was the purpose of a wise education to remove. She invariably put the interests and welfare of the children in the first place, and those teachers who exerted an uplifting and wholesome influence in the schools found in Miss Hill a warm and steadfast friend. Out of the ten thousand teachers employed by the London School Board, occasionally—though only very occasionally—a black sheep was discovered in the flock, and Miss Davenport-Hill always contended that sympathy with the teacher who had gone astray must take a secondary place—the first consideration must be justice to the child.

The depth of her care and love for children were most strikingly shown in her industrial school work. The school for boys at Brentwood, named after her on her retirement, was for many years under her special charge. To have witnessed, as I have done, the expression of real joy which lit up the faces of those wayward lads as she visited the classrooms, or spoke to them in her strong womanly way from the platform on prize-giving day, was a testimony to the power and worth of her influence which moved me very much indeed.

Eighteen years of strenuous service on behalf of London's little citizens, with no thought of fame, with the simple desire to do good, and to live a life of helpfulness inspired by love and tempered by wisdom—this was what she cared for. The picture of her strong, shrewd, kindly face, sitting in the council chamber quietly listening to speeches and watching the proceedings, her fingers busily plying the knitting-needles, is one which lingers in my memory. Only on rare occasions did she feel moved to speak in public, but once or twice I have seen her roused to indignation by some dodge or trick of the Clerical party, and then she would utter a few sharp, scornful words which revealed the fire burning in a pure and noble soul.

Miss Davenport-Hill gave largely of her means that she might have the opportunity of serving others; what is more, she gave herself, all that she was, all that she had of knowledge, experience, goodness, that others might live happier, purer, braver lives. Her philanthropic work, it seems to me, places her in the first rank of the women workers of the Victorian era. Of the charming hospitality which she extended to those who visited her home in London or in Oxford, I need not speak. It was a privilege which those who have enjoyed it will rejoice to have had. Of her devout and earnest religious faith it is not for me to say anything. She was always ready to render generous help to our Unitarian work in different parts of the country. A religious community which was capable of rearing and holding a spirit so true and noble as hers ought to have in it power for much further good in the present time, and in generations yet to come.

THE NATIVES OF THE TRANSVAAL.

Sir,—The large number of persons who, whatever their views on the rights and wrongs of the late war in the Transvaal, sincerely cherished the conviction that British rule would inaugurate a better state of relations between white men and natives will receive a grievous shock when they read the proclamation declaring natives within the territory of the Transvaal subject to a capitation tax of £2 for every adult male, and £2 for "each wife over one"—a phrase the wording of which appears to be a grotesque attempt to give a kind of air of respectability or Christian morality to the ordinance.

Those who feared throughout that in this matter British rule would mean the rule of the mining magnates see their apprehensions confirmed and the hopes which some acts of firmness and independence on Mr. Chamberlain's part had raised once more disappearing. Taxation of the natives is a measure which has long been advocated by the representatives of the mining industry, not for any financial reasons, but avowedly in order to compel the independent Kaffirs living within the Transvaal on their own resources to surrender their independence and work in the mines for wages.

Henceforth any Kaffir who wishes to be independent must pay £2 a year, and if he wishes to have an establishment after the fashion of his nation, he must pay indefinitely more. If he were capable of paying this tax as an independent man the action of the authorities, however oppressive, would fail to accomplish the avowed purpose of those who have advocated it.

What then does the new ordinance amount to? Simply a system of enforced labour. The Government is going to compel the Kaffir to work for them without payment; and the mining interest reckons on this necessity bringing him under their control and enabling them to secure his further toil on terms which they regard as satisfactory to themselves.

Anyone who has made even an elementary study of industrial life must be aware that the most effective condition of free bargaining on the part of the labourer is that he should have some independent alternative to fall back upon. Even the possession of a tiny allotment strengthens the position of the agricultural labourer. This tax on the native is avowedly advocated by the mining interest for the very reason that it will deprive him of an independent alternative.

We are now quite accustomed to being called on to revise our most elementary ideas of justice, and there may be plenty of persons who will argue that compulsory service to the State exacted in such a form as to deprive the Kaffir of his independence over against the employers of labour is quite defensible, but in any case it is essential that the British public should thoroughly understand the nature of the ordinance in question, and leaders of religious opinion, like Mr. Price Hughes and Mr. Llewellyn Davies, who have constantly insisted on the beneficent nature of the British rule should surely have some word of guidance for their followers.

HIGHLANDERS AND THE FREE CHURCH.

Sir,—In his excellent article on "Ecclesiasticism and Politics in Scotland," Mr. Robert Gunn Davis makes it appear that the Highlanders now fatuously opposing the union of the Churches had as fathers men who laid down their lives for religious freedom. When? Where? Covenanting Lowlanders did so, but my Highland ancestors were employed to curb and crush them. True, Highlanders have "evolved," and to-day we stand shoulder to shoulder with our Lowland brethren on behalf of civil and religious liberty. But it was Lowland blood that bought us the freedom. It would be a double error to suppose that Presbyterian Highlanders generally sympathise with the anti-unionists, and that there is any relationship between the attitude of these Highland malcontents and the grand Covenanters of two and a-half centuries ago. The Covenanters were heroes; these Highland anti-unionists are mere obstructives, grimly opposed to a wider brotherhood and any theology other than that of John Calvin. But, as Mr. Davis lucidly shows,—

Far back, through creeks and inlets making,
Comes silent, flooding in, the main.

"PASSAGES FROM THE LIFE OF AN EDUCATIONAL FREELANCE."

Sir,—The translation of Dr. Ewald Haufe's book, "Aus dem Leben eines freien Pædagogen," by Mr. William H. Herford, has received a fair amount of attention from the reviewers, but has not, I think, been generally judged from the right point of view. The translator's "Foreword" should have prevented any reader from supposing that he published the book in England with the idea that it would rank with the works of Pestalozzi and Froebel as a guide to the theory and practice of education. It must be granted that the later passages of the book are somewhat vague, and reiterate the declaration that education must be natural and founded on nature, without increasing the impression on the reader to any extent which justifies so many repetitions. But it is not a matter of no account that an earnest and sincere man came independently to the same principle which was set forth by the great educationalists named above, although he be less precise and useful in his demonstration. The main interest of the book, however, is distinct from its value as a work on education, in which category it may be set far below another work translated by Mr. Herford, the merits of which have been widely recognised by teachers. As the honest story of the efforts of a sincere man to live according to principle amid many difficulties, the work holds a place with few others. The books in which we receive a simple and direct account of the events which a man of ability and character deems worthy of record in his own life, and his struggles after an ideal dimly felt and seen, but to reach which he will separate himself from all other things which appear desirable, are not too many. In adding one to the number of those accessible in our own language Mr. Herford has rendered a real service; there is interest in the references to theory and practice in education and its subserviency in Germany and Italy to State and ecclesiastical purposes; but the value of the author's record of endeavour to follow truth in his own consciousness through the vicissitudes of the teaching profession to which he felt his life must be devoted is far greater. The Manchester Guardian suggested that the story of Mr. Herford's own experiences would be more valuable as a help to teachers. The suggestion is a good one; but such a book would not take the place of that which he has translated for us, whose value is in the revelation of a life rather than a system of education.

OUR CHURCHES—OPEN OR SHUT?

Sir,—Being in Edinburgh on Sunday evening, I went to see St. Mark's Chapel (such is the name of the Unitarian church there), and found a newly-grained, varnished, and fastened door and gate, but the notice-board painted out, and no signs of times of service or any other notice. It may be that this is another closure, but I think it would be well that the door of an extinct institution (if such) should not be newly painted, and if not, that some sign of life should be apparent.

LOYALTY TO TRUTH.

Sir,—When I arrive at the conviction that there is One God, the Father, I am disloyal to truth if I do not confess my Unitarian faith. If I find that a number of other people are also Unitarians, we are simply loyal to truth when we unite to enunciate and publish our convictions on matters pertaining to religion. If I and my friends hear of a struggling congregation that worships One God, the Father, our loyalty to truth prompts us to help these worshippers to build a church and maintain a minister.

In these few words we trace the development of the function discharged by that union of individual subscribers who constitute what is called "The British and Foreign Unitarian Association." In its lengthened history, as far as I know, that society has never advised any preacher to abstain from uttering all the truth he knows; certainly it has never cautioned one of our professors against the danger of publishing the latest results of his studies. It would surely be disloyal for the subscribers to the B. and F.U.A. to deny the name that so accurately describes the theology they hold, and it would be misleading to the public to adopt a title with vague connotations. No church is under compulsion to accept donations from a Unitarian fund—such acceptance is entirely a voluntary act; while in many cases, I believe, grants have been made to churches that have deliberately declined to adopt the Unitarian name. The generous spirit in which the B. and F.U.A. has discharged these ecclesiastical functions quickens our antagonism to any attempt to reduce the scope of its work to that of a religious tract society. In regard to the case of Dr. Beet, what I deplore is that, under ecclesiastical pressure, he should consent to withhold the latest results of his scholarly inquiries into one of the most solemn issues of Christian doctrine. His acceptance of such a condition of the tenure of his chair can only be described as a shameful compromise.

FRANK WALTERS.

THE WRITINGS OF H. W. DRESSER.

I.

THE spiritual forces at work among the people of the United States just now will repay much careful attention. The material and commercial activities of that vigorous commonwealth are in no danger of being ignored; they assert themselves with sufficiently startling emphasis at times, and the people of older civilisations are often greatly disturbed by the vast schemes and speculations of American masters of industry and lords of the mighty dollar. But we must not think of that nation as wholly given up to idolatry, with its altar to the well-known god whose name is Mammon. Philosophy, Ethics and Religion are, perhaps, not less prosperous and effective there than trade and "Trusts" and the evolution of the millionaire. The life of the spirit has its pioneers, as well as the realm of commerce and finance. The ideal is not lost amid the din and tumult of a war for wealth which ceases not nor ever knows a time of truce.

The writer about whom I am asked to say something in the pages of THE INQUIRER is not one of the least worthy exponents of large and liberal religious thought in that huge country. The name of Horatio Dresser will be unknown to many in England, but it may be well worth knowing nevertheless. A few words from the preface of one of his books shall serve to introduce him to any to whom he may be a stranger:—

> The author claims no originality for this essay. Where so many have gleaned before there is little opportunity for strict originality of thought; and he would indeed be short-sighted, who should not take full advantage of the best thoughts of the past. Yet the emphasis of personal experience lends fresh value to the age-long truth of truths, and perhaps there is nothing so much needed in this age of doubt as a full and frank expression of individual conviction. Indeed, it is the highest privilege of our human brotherhood to convey to another some measure of that priceless wisdom which has taught one the secret of a peaceful and happy life.
> Life is wonderfully simple. One efficient energy or spirit permeates all that exists. A few universal laws characterise this energy in all phases of its infinitely varied manifestation. To feel this spirit as a living reality within, to understand these simple laws and adapt life to wise obedience to them—this it is to possess the greatest peace, happiness, and power of doing good.—"The Perfect Whole," pp. v., vi.

This attitude of blended modesty and assured intellectual confidence is one from which Mr. Dresser rarely falls away. His indebtedness to the great masters in philosophy is frankly acknowledged. Yet it is obvious that he speaks out of a rich and varied spiritual experience, and his message, when neither original nor profound, is always fresh and full of the interest and charm which pertain to sincerity and clearness of insight.

A wise sweet tolerance pervades his writing, and yet, withal, a strength and strenuousness of personal conviction and a clearness of presentment which make it an almost unfailing pleasure to read him. He writes as one who has found a sure basis for his own philosophic faith, and who is standing very firmly there, and who knows how to tell what he sees from thence; yet also as one who does not think all others fools that see not as he sees, and who is ever seeking clearer vision for himself, and, if that may be, a surer, loftier standing-ground from which to gaze.

His writings are not without their defects. He has a gift of fluency which sometimes proves fatal to the art of writing well, and which here and there betrays him into repetitions that make some of his chapters a little wearisome. There is also a tendency to make light of certain problems of actual life in the world, which the man of affairs must needs face and reckon with, and which the happy and serene philosopher ought not to ignore. Dresser is always reverent in his treatment of science, and he evidently knows something about it. Evolution is freely and gladly accepted, and the large conceptions of life and the world, which evolution sustains, have clearly helped him much in shaping the ethical and religious philosophy he now seeks to interpret. But the politician and the economic reformer do not, I think, always receive full justice at his hands. The social questions that press for solution in the sphere of practical life he does not seem to comprehend in all their seriousness.

Mr. Dresser is intent on showing that the problem of happiness and spiritual power is, for each one of us, a problem of mind. To find an inward centre of repose—to build from within our own heaven of peace and moral strength—this, he tells us, as so many have told us before, is the great matter; and he helps us much to prosper nobly there. But he does not see that the outward conditions of life for many are such, that the voices which call to inwardness cannot be heard, and the energies of peaceful strength, which doubtless exist in every human soul, cannot assert themselves to produce that mental poise wherein is the secret of wisdom and abiding joy. Hence the appeal of the social reformer—the demand for far-reaching changes in the present system, whereby the external conditions of life shall be more equal and just for all human beings—is thrust too easily aside. He forgets, or does not fully sympathise with, the thousands of men and women whose birth and training and surroundings are so untoward that his profound and beautiful philosophy cannot possibly reach them. And since his object is to make that philosophy practical, and to bring it to the hearts of men as a real deliverance from the worry and weariness of life, this seeming indifference to the social and economic problems must, I think, be counted a grave defect in the philosopher himself. In one passage, truly, the human claim is stated with much force—if only one could feel that its practical implications, for social and industrial life to-day, were anywise clear to the writer.

> Each man is, by virtue of his existence, a part of the eternal Whole, and possesses rights of which no one may justly deprive him. Any system of philosophy which separates him from his native environment . . . . any legislation, any social custom, any political or religious doctrine which deprives him of his rights, is illogical and unethical. Man belongs to the world, to the universe, to God. So much of the world belongs to man as is essential to his freedom, his welfare and education. So much of the universe is his as he can contemplate and understand. So much of God as he needs to help him on the way, while in no measure depriving him of that strength and character which experience alone can give, is his by right of birth. The finite inheres in the infinite; man dwells in God; and when society shall recognise this ethical and spiritual relation to the great All, there will be a wonderful change in human conduct and thought.—"The Perfect Whole," p. 105.

The application of that idea to the present condition of things in our great commercial centres would mean economic revolution. So much of the world "as is essential to their freedom, welfare and education" is denied to the vast majority of toiling men and women to-day. Failing to see this, Mr. Dresser fails to bring his philosophic idealism so close to the actual needs and conditions of life as he thinks or desires. But let this suffice for negative criticism. I turn to the happier side of my task.

Of the four or five considerable books which Mr. Dresser has published, the two with which I am best acquainted are "The Power of Silence, an Interpretation of Life in relation to Health and Happiness"; and "The Perfect Whole, an Essay on the Conduct and Meaning of Life." The former was published in England in 1898, the latter in 1899. Speaking generally of these, I should say that they contain three excellencies which make them worthy of attention:—

(1.) The writer has a gift of refined spiritual insight, whereby the life of the soul in its relation to the great order of things is discerned and apprehended with much wisdom.

(2.) A grasp of the spiritual problem on its intellectual side which enables him to deal with some of the deeper questions of religion and philosophy in a very clear and effective manner.

(3.) An emotional and personal apprehension of these things which imparts a glow and fervour to all that he writes, and gives it a genuine practical interest and significance to the serious reader.

I will not say that he has either of these qualities in its highest degree, so as to make him a great original force in literature. But he has them all in very considerable degree; and this is probably somewhat rare. To be able to see, with much clearness and depth of insight, into the life of the spirit; to be able to think out some of the graver problems which emerge for the intellect in relation to that life; and then to feel strongly concerning the issues, for human conduct and happiness, which thus arise—this is an equipment not too commonly possessed by those who speak or write for us at the present time. Dresser has this equipment; and it is this that should give to his message an assured claim upon the interest and the regard of many.

His fundamental position, in relation to all the problems of thought and conduct, stated briefly, is the Unity of the World, and the Immanence of God. The conception of Unity is derived from the immediate consciousness of the soul, in its deepest moments, that the world is one, a cosmos, not a jumble of happenings —that the universe is a universe, its manifold forms and manifestations constituting an ordered whole. And this inner consciousness finds its intellectual confirmation in the witness of science to the law of gravitation in space and the law of evolution in time. The Immanence of God is the religious conception of Law, of Reason, of Spirit as pervading all forms of activity in nature and in human life—the one creative and sustaining energy which ever hides and ever reveals itself in the mighty and mysterious order of the world.

Faith in this one living Reality that is within and behind all Appearance is the inspiration of Mr. Dresser's thoughtful message to our modern world. His own faith is singularly strong, calm and enlightened. Insight, thought and feeling have combined to make the Divine Immanence a source of extraordinary strength and hope to him. Through all our human struggles and failings and triumphs, this "one Reality makes its presence known. It speaks to the heart and comforts the soul. It bestows its help so far as we are receptive, and guides where we cannot help ourselves. Out from the realms within it ever rises to give life and health, peace and happiness to man, to lift the universe to harmony with its unending love."

How, from this fundamental position, our author reaches out to the questions pertaining to men's knowledge and joy and duty here upon the earth, another article shall endeavour to show. Let this one conclude with his own words concerning the book which is probably his best—the one which derives its title from the two lines of Emerson, quoted on its title-page:—

Beauty through my senses stole;
I yielded myself to the Perfect Whole.

Its threefold purpose and its individual confessions of faith are alike subservient to the central idea for which it stands—the unity of all that exists in an ultimate spiritual reality. In ways we know not, and in moments when we least expect it, the spirit makes its presence known in the soul. If the reader discovers these traces of a living reality amid the finite approximations and aspects of truth, the book will have served its purpose as a stepping-stone to the higher life. W. J. JUPP.

WORDSWORTH.

III.

GOD IN NATURE.

GOD is the Creator of the world. He not only was, but is its creator. It is not a machine set going by the divine Maker and then left to wind itself down; but it is alive with His life, renewing its youth and reproducing the old wonders, and at the same time developing new manifestations of creative energy. God is in it, and beyond it. The creation expresses Him but does not confine Him: He transcends it: it is but a little of Him. But how much that little is to us!

Nature, the continual creation of God, is the source of man's life: she gives him his body; she supplies it with nourishment. By his own power he makes excursions into the region of abstractions, combines in new compounds the elements nature provides: divides and separates what she gives mingled and organised. Nature provides all the materials with which man works; and nearly all man's ideas are found expressed in nature: some he has learned of her, others are the result of his independent thought and invention yet are found already existent from old time in the method of nature. This is not strange seeing that nature and man are the manifestation of the one Eternal Being, and may therefore well be akin in their activity.

The Companionship of Nature.

Man needs the companionship of nature: she is his mother and his friend: she has food for soul as well as body: and when man has used up or impaired his vitality by deeds that are possible to his free will, but are outside her possibilities, he finds new life flow into him as he returns to her. They belong to each other: they need each other.

Her blessing and her gift of inspiration and peace do not come to the analytic and sceptic mood. She requires that those who come to her should come with love and reverence; otherwise she cannot be known in herself. Those who examine in part and divide and classify and compare will get something, but not in that way will they get to her heart. For the deepest enjoyment and the greatest blessing, man must give himself passively to receive what nature has to give, not making specific demands. Many joys, much knowledge, great enrichment, come from the careful study of detail, and the more exact the study the greater the benefit—this is the active, observing mood, and enlarges the human mind. Inspiration, peace that passes all understanding, calmness, steadfastness, communion with the source of life, the presence of God; these belong to the passive, receptive mood. Probably every increase of real knowledge of detail held in the background of the mind adds some little to our breadth of divine receptiveness when we give ourselves to nature's influence, and increases the flow of spiritual gifts; but it is the feeling of the great divine whole of nature that is religion and connects us intimately and emotionally with God.

Wordsworth's Intimacy with Nature.

Wordsworth was the poet of God in nature. Few men of modern times have had less of city life than he; yet during his sojourn of less than a year in London his inspired poetry was of country reminiscence, or of London as part of the country; and a brief stay in the small town of Goslar in Saxony caused him, on getting outside the city walls, to give expression to the poetic sigh of relief and expansion recorded in the opening verses of the "Prelude." Little as he had had of town life, such passages as one finds in the lines written near Tintern Abbey show how foreign it was to his genius. The beautiful country forms have often been his solace, he says, in lonely rooms, and 'mid the din

Of towns and cities.

The interpretation of nature is truly marvellous in this the first of his poems which was expressive of his genius. By that time he had passed through much of human experience, ever associated intimately with nature. Nature had been the background and setting of his childish and boyish tasks and games and contests; more and more the need for this surrounding came into consciousness, until he knew it as part of himself, without which he could live only a stunted life. Then the day came when it was made clear to him that this fellowship of nature had given him his mission in life, that through it had come his calling from God.

His Growing Love and Insight.

In schoolboy days nature began to make upon him ethical impressions; but religious feeling grew upon him in her constant companionship chiefly as love, and before he learned her lesson of duty, persistence, and steadfastness, with depth of conviction, he had to pass through the struggle of a waning faith in man and a temporary loss of the deepest depths of nature's solace.

In that spontaneous manifestation of Wordsworth's genius and faith composed in a few hours between Tintern and Bristol in his early manhood, he links all his deepest human emotions with nature, whom he already recognised as

The anchor of my purest thoughts, the nurse,
The guide, the guardian of my heart, and soul
Of all my moral being.

Worship of God in Nature.

Wordsworth's religion is nature worship, the worship of God in nature, not excluding the human part of the creation, but emphatically including it as the higher and greater part. Conscience, the light of man's conduct, he learned, was the voice of God, and human love a higher manifestation than the love of nature, both being God's presence. Nature's inspiration and nature love were his first vivid experience of God, but the love of nature led to the love of man as a higher phase of God's presence, a fuller manifestation of Him, not to be maintained in health and purity apart from that which had guided him to it.

His religion was nature worship: worship of God's manifestation in nature and in the human soul: nature as she is, man as he may be and is called to be and must be. The ecclesiastical formulation of beliefs, and the established organisation of worship which he, no doubt, honestly accepted, did not inspire him: he fitted his beliefs into the required holes and left them there, their presence in the scholastic chambers of his mind being denoted by an occasional phrase, sincere but prosaic, and the unpoetic verses of his later years. His lively experiences and prophetic insight, expressed in the words of a seer, who makes others see, dwell upon God's direct dealings with the human soul and expression of Himself in the universe. This revelation of God is in forms which are open to the comprehension of His children without mediator, but to which the seer may be mediator until the disciple's eyes are opened; when, seeing for himself, he is bound not to follow any other guidance in place of his own vision, or rather God's visibility, in him and in the world.

Something more than Pantheism.

Wordsworth's vision and expression of himself in all his glorious raptures about nature and emotion under her influence are never naturally interpreted in terms of the restricted pantheism which believes that God is in nature and nowhere else. Humanity is not reduced to the position of a mere detail of the Kosmos. The growth in the poet's mind to a perception of man's significance and to a state of sympathy and love towards humanity is known by him to be a rise to an altogether greater fellowship, a higher life, a fuller knowledge of God, and a far mightier insight into His love.

Before this development Wordsworth's feelings, being deficient in the sense of humanity, dwelt almost exclusively in the emotions of the outside natural world mingled with his own personal life. But they never shut out the possibility of other divine expression. Nor does he deny or exclude the possibility of other revelations than those he expresses. In these ways God has appeared to him; it is his duty, his privilege, his joy, to show forth the life that is in him, telling what he knows, depicting what he has seen. All around is the infinitude of God: Wordsworth does not explore it all, nor suppose he has done so. But in the service which is his own, he praises God with glowing lips and gives a lasting religious joy, peace beyond understanding, and shows that God is in nature as in man, reconciling the world unto himself.

This World our present Home.

While, however, there is no occasion to deny the infinite possibilities of God outside of our capacity of receiving or perceiving His manifestations, while we are conscious that there must be infinite tracts of being beyond our ken; the world is our home at present, and by it we are conditioned in our earthly life. We feel sure that the rays of sunlight which reach us are but a minute fraction of the amount of light radiating from the sun in every direction through space; we do not now suppose that the sun's activity is all used up in providing the one world on which we live with light and heat, although we have added greatly to the knowledge we possess of the extent and significance of our indebtedness to the sun. Compared with the whole force of light and warmth flowing from the sun our portion is insignificant, but in itself it is marvellously great, and gives us not only life but knowledge of the sun whence it comes.

God is nature; how much He is besides we are not able to declare or define. Our highest wisdom is in learning to know Him as fully as we can by those means which are possible to us here and now, mastering the lessons that belong to our humanity while we are men and women, and accepting gratefully the delightful interests and emotions that are natural to our present condition.

Our True Knowledge of God.

Through these we gain true knowledge of God, not so much the knowledge which can be classified in scientific detail, though every advance in true science, even in the material phase of things, is increased knowledge of the Creator, if it does not lead away from the consciousness of the whole to narrow the mind's attention to a part. When we see the infinite in the minutest part of creation that we look at or study, then only do we see truly that which is under our immediate notice. We cannot really know anything if we do not see it in its connection with the rest of creation and the central life of creation. The consciousness of the eternities before and after time, of space between and beyond the stars, of the vital whole of nature of which our immediate labour or study is confined to a little part, is necessary for the comprehension of even the smallest part of creation in its minutest detail, and when standing on our little plot of ground which it is our duty to till and tend, we gaze around on the mighty mountains and the flowing rivers, the surging sea and the clouds and sky and stars and enter through these into communion with God, we are the better able to feel him near us in the plant we are tending or the lesson we are learning in our own home. The perception of the whole is needed for the true understanding and use of the part.

Cleansing and Healing Power of Nature.

The petty cares of life, the unworthy struggles, jealousies, quarrels; wants that have grown up in idleness and luxury; excited feelings and loss of self-control; the passions and listlessness and distrust that are begotten in crowded assemblies of fashionable people or in the stuffy rooms of extravagant ease;—these and many more of the evils that pampered and misused human flesh is heir to, these and many more of the pains and sorrows of the human mind bowed down by laziness and selfishness and narrowness, would be most effectively treated by daily doses of fresh air and sunshine and the vigorous fellowship of nature! Something like half our diseases are resultant from the unnatural divorce between our bodies and nature on whom we depend for our existence; the other half are due to our divorce from God. Here, however, is a distinction without much difference. We need to live according to God's whole law so far as we can know it; and the law applies to all of us, body and mind and soul; and every separation from Him and His law is unhealthy and unnatural.

Go to the Fountain Head.

The gas and candle light, the coal and oil that give us light and heat, are preserved sunshine. Valuable as they are, it is always better to get to the source of power and cheerfulness and light and warmth when we can. Good books and works of art and music are something more than preserved inspiration of nature; they have in them the spirit of a God-made man as well as what he saw and felt of nature; but excellent as they are, it is better, far better, when we can, to go to the fountain head to learn where the poet learned, the love and truth of God in nature, and the communion direct with the living God in spirit and in truth.

God is the healer of all disease and sorrow and strife. If we cannot get into His very presence we may draw near to Him in His inspired prophets, and of these is Wordsworth. He leads us to the joyful and uplifting emotion and the peaceful steadfastness he found in nature, where God is; and when we find that solace and joy and strength for ourselves where he found it, he does not cease to be delightful: we love to retrace the lines that have expressed or interpreted our own feelings: and which of us amid the cares and activities of modern life, its cities and crowds and din and smoke and dirt, does not need again and again the refreshment of fellowship with one who would not allow these things which trouble us to turn him from the purpose of his life, but lived with God in nature?

PRIESTLEY PRIME.

THE GREAT GOOD PLACE.

BY HELEN CAMPBELL, IN THE Christian Register.

"What civilisation needs most at present is an annex—a place into which one may retire and consider how to take what is going to happen next."

"But is that strictly necessary?"

"Anything is strictly necessary that enables escape from a society in which we perpetually face two extremes—either all talking at once at the pitch of their voices, as they are doing here this minute, and at all the other teas now going on, to say nothing of the lunches from which they came to the tea, or else a roomful of dejected people listening compulsorily to a paper on the Lord knows what. Between the two I have been as a shuttlecock—a willing one, I admit, since I wanted to see what it all stood for; but I can't keep it up a day longer. Is there a house left in the city that knows the meaning of old-fashioned hospitality?—'Come home and take pot-luck,' 'Drop in whenever you can. Always a place for you.' That was the way it was in your father's house; and I can see your mother this minute, with the look of welcome I haven't seen on a face in all this crowd of entertainers. That's the difference. Your mother didn't 'entertain,' she talked, bless the wise, witty tongue of her; and we all talked, and couldn't help it. Do you call this kind of thing talk? It sounds like a Banshee wail over the death of conversation."

The two men, both white-headed, stood together at the upper end of the long room in which the last hour of a tea for the latest distinguished author of the latest popular novel was in full tide; and now the energetic speaker laughed gently as he looked.

"He's as miserable as the rest of us. What are we here for, anyway? Why don't we go home?"

His voice was low, but peculiarly clear; and a woman who had been watching them silently, but with laughing eyes, drew nearer and put out her hand.

"Of course, you don't remember me, Judge Everett; but I have sat at that table, too, and heard you as well as our townsman here. I wish we could all do it again."

The exceedingly well-preserved and very handsome old gentleman's keen eyes considered her for an instant, then lighted with pleasure.

"Betty Atherton, as I am a sinner! But, if you are the Betty you used to be, what are you doing in this jam?"

"Seeking whatever good thing it may have for me. You can't say I haven't found it?"

The old gentleman bowed low, but she went on: "I want to go home, though, as seriously as you do. Now, if you would go home with me—but I suppose Dr. Prentice here has you ten deep in state dinners, and our quiet old house hasn't a chance."

"Do you mean it?"

Mrs. Atherton laughed, a delightful laugh, at which the old gentleman rubbed his hands.

"It's worth all I've lived through to hear you again," he said; "but to-night I am spoken for."

"Then to-morrow."

"Do you mean that you've really got another day that is yours enough to do what you like with?"

"I try to arrange life on that plan," Mrs. Atherton answered. And, though she smiled, her face was serious. "I can't afford not to. Our home means more to us than anything else, though I was driven out of it for a time by what I supposed the necessities of the case. I have changed my mind. What I want to do begins there, and can work out from it, though for a good while I supposed circumference meant more than centre. Now and then I come to a thing of this sort to see if the system is improving with age, and return to my own corner more content than ever."

A door opposite that by which they stood opened silently, as if by invisible hands; and the old gentleman as he looked across yielded to a sudden temptation. Dr. Prentice had moved away, and now stood deep in talk with a brother physician; and, as Judge Everett beckoned, Mrs. Atherton followed, and sat down on the great leather sofa, in what was evidently the den of the master of the house.

"Very rude, I know; inexcusably so, my dear," he said. "But I want a little talk with you now as well as to-morrow, and this is the only comfortable way to get it. I am spoiled, you see. I live my own life up there in the Berkshires—a selfish one, you might say; for it seems to be steadily happy at the core, but it takes in a good many people, after all—so many that I am too busy as well as too contented to come to town more than once in a decade or so. But it's getting worse and worse. The hostess to-day has no time for any individual. She has to take the mass. This thing doesn't mean that any human being here is going home with more real knowledge of any other human being. It's a modern method of killing out knowledge. What are you here for, my lady?"

"Because the hostess and I are old friends, and it happens to be my son-in-law who is the lion of the day."

"Ha!" the old gentleman said. "Then, if he's anything of yours, he must know better."

"He does, I assure you. He knows it is purely temporary, but at present he is installed and cannot escape. But we have our own opinion of it all. To-day it is a novelist who is on the top wave. The next one will bring another candidate, litterateur, artist, or what not, to take his place. It is all most extraordinary to watch. He is simply staggering under the load of outer necessities the position appears to have developed, and he is not alone. For the favourite of the hour, him or her, is an ever-rising, ebbless tide of things — journals, periodicals, huddled mounds of books, from friends, from publishers, from enemies, each with its note of demand, each a bit in the awful mosaic of modern life. To cope with them and other adjuncts would mean not alone all one's personal time, but a trained secretary's as well. And even then, at utmost pressure of despatch, breathing time cannot be made. It is the modern whip of the Furies disguised as social success, but whip no less."

"Hasn't anybody found it out?" the old gentleman said.

"Among these successful ones, you mean? Just one, and I must tell you about it. Not one you would think, perhaps, for it is Henry James; and he is, it seems, tired out to a degree that has made him begin to think. So he made a sketch of it; and he called it 'The Great Good Place,' balm in every word, you see."

The old gentleman nodded.

"Short words. No sniff in them," he said. "Go on."

"There is peace in them. What he goes on to demand is a retreat from hosts and hostesses alike—a still sweet place set in a garden, a cloister, as it were, large, light, fair to see, full of all that makes for rest. and all invisibly administered. For each and all, into whose study or work-place the whole round world seemed to have squeezed itself, a retreat as certain as that of any old monastery, yet freedom its corner-stone. Refectory, high and clean, with delicate, plain fare, and soundless, simple service; library of arched amplitude, 'unconfined and brave and gay'; bedrooms, the soul of peace, the nest of sleep; and for the whole exquisite spot entire detachment from all that had troubled; the sense of 'a great silver bowl from which he could ladle up the melted hours.' In such a spot, he thinks, one could find the soul again, and return with it at last, if return must be, to that outer world of huddled things. We need it. We die for lack of retreat that in the sketch is dream, and dream only. But it must not be dream. You know that, and so do I."

The old gentleman, still silent, nodded slowly.

"And that is the last reason that has come to me," Mrs. Atherton went on, "for faith that this or its equivalent may arrive. There are builders of many strange things which we count as homes. Why may not this strangest of all, a home with room for the soul, some day rise fair in a green and silent place, a refuge till a time when, it may be, all homes will be refuges, and a tired world has found out not alone the meaning of work, but the meaning of repose? And, if that good day comes, we shall no longer find fault with our hostesses, or flee from their methods, since they, too, will have learned how to be part of the peace."

The door opened as she ended; and Dr. Prentice stood there, smiling, as he caught the last word.

"Peace," he said. "A good word, but the modern type of face owns everything but that. You must look under a Quaker bonnet to find it, and even they are passing. Come, Everett. The carriage is here; and, unhappily, I have an appointment, and must run."

"To-morrow, then. We will talk it all out to-morrow," the old gentleman said, smiling back as he went. But even to-morrow failed to reconcile him to further dealings with society; and he has gone into permanent retreat in the hills, his own home a very fair exponent of the quality of which the weary author dreamed.

It is pleasant to hear the accounts given by those who have stayed at the Sunday School Holiday Home at Great Hucklow. To many of the children the experience of a country holiday is quite exceptional. When the party is from one of the Manchester missions or other poor district, the teachers and helpers have a week of hard work, and exuberant animal spirits among girls as well as boys are on some occasions with difficulty kept within due bounds. It is said that pillow-fights are not unknown, and that the children do not always restrict their conversation at meal times to those who are seated at the same table. One hears of self-devoted work and care on the part of the elders who are in charge of parties, and of days of weariness after their week at Great Hucklow. But the amount of good health and happiness resulting to the hundred children a week who are accommodated at the home should amply repay them and give great satisfaction to all who have helped in this most successful undertaking. Each school manages its own finances, and about 10s. a week each meets all necessary expenses, including travelling.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Bedfield.—The congregation and Sunday-school continue in a satisfactory condition. Miss Tagart conducted a recent Sunday evening service. The Sunday-school anniversary services were conducted by Mr. S. J. Hutley, of Ipswich, the evening service being held in a field at Monk Soham, and the subject, "Unitarianism: a Gospel for the People."

Colne (Appointment). — The Rev. Robert McGee, until recently minister of the Lower Darwen Congregational Church, whose commendation to our churches by the Advisory Committee of the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire we have already published, has accepted a unanimous invitation to the pastorate of the Stanley-street Unitarian Church. He conducted last Sunday's services, preaching with much acceptance in the afternoon on "The Need and Value of Piety at Home," and in the evening on "The Helpfulness of Worship." There were good congregations, the former minister, the Rev. T. Leyland, being present on both occasions. Mr. McGee will enter on his new charge on the first Sunday in November.

Framlingham.—Last Sunday evening a sermon was preached in the Old Meeting House by Mr. James A. Aldis, M.A., late Head Master of Queen Mary's School, Walsall. The subject was—"The Religious Bearings of the Government Education Bill: From a Churchman's Point of View." The preacher denounced the Bill in a most uncompromising manner, and urged that payment of rate should be refused, in case the Bill became law. A reference to the late J. B. Grant—who suffered loss and imprisonment for refusing to pay Church rates—was the more appropriate owing to the fact that Mr. Grant resided near Framlingham, and with his family regularly attended the Old Meeting House.

Gateshead.—Preaching last Sunday evening in Unity Church, the Rev. Arthur Harvie took as his subject "Partridge-shooting," and denounced the "sport" as neither reasonable nor manly. The partridge was a bird with qualities which made it specially attractive and deserving of sympathetic consideration. Its conduct in presence of danger to its young was simply marvellous. The well-known stratagem by which the hen partridge, pretending to be wounded, lured animals and men from its brood while risking its own life was one of the most remarkable features exhibited in the sub-human creation. A mother partridge had been found frozen to death with her brood under her wing, she having refused to save her life at the cost of theirs. These innocent birds, birds that could teach many of their slaughterers much-needed lessons, would be sacrificed by thousands of England's "best" from to-morrow onwards. Such sport should be hateful to them.

London: Forest Gate.—Resuming his ministrations after holidays, on Sunday, the Rev. H. W. Perris used Coleridge's "Rime of the Ancient Mariner" as a parable to enforce a high ideal of the sacredness of all life where the human claim did not unmistakably override the animal one. The teachings of the gentle Buddha in the East, the fables and allegories of many lands and cults, the line of pitiful souls, of which St. Francis was the mediæval and Pierre Loti the modern type, were referred to; Darwin and Maeterlinck being also quoted in illustration of the newer sense of the oneness of the vital principle, climbing ever upward, and challenging our reverent study. An indignant reference was made to the wholesale slaughter of horses and mules in South Africa, and to the late military rides. "Verily," said the preacher, "our societies for the prevention of cruelty are witnesses against us, as a nation; yet, how slight a fringe of the realm of heedlessly inflicted pain do they touch! And we call ourselves disciples of Him who said, 'Not a sparrow falls to the ground without your Father.' Cowper said he would not call him friend 'who needlessly set foot upon a worm.' 'How many of the things we do would shock a being who might be watching us as we watch the bees?' asks the Flemish writer. Well, if we believe we are so watched, and hope to be pitied in our extremity, we shall abjure all cruelty, and revere the Spirit of Life in all its manifold disguises, low and high."

Rochdale.—In the September number of the Monthly Messenger, the congregational calendar and record, which has just completed its seventeenth year of issue, occurs the following note:—"The plan of supplying the pulpit by lay-preachers during the minister's absence on holidays has proved a great success. The services have been very helpful, and have been much appreciated. Our best thanks are due to the members and friends who have so kindly undertaken the duties. From what we can gather of the general opinion it is a system likely to prevail in future years, and the financial benefit to the church is no small item. We hope that more of our own members may be seen in the pulpit next year." The new windows, to replace the old east windows and two smaller ones in the south aisle, executed from drawings of the late Sir E. Burne Jones, will be completed, it is hoped, during the present month, so as to be unveiled on Oct. 5, the date of the Autumn Festival.

York.—The congregation of St. Saviourgate Chapel have to lament the loss of their treasurer, Mr. William Johnson, an old and trusted member. His steadfast support through the troubles which culminated in the Chancery case of 1899 was of the utmost value, though perhaps not sufficiently appreciated, and his unwearied devotion to chapel affairs continued to the day of his death. He was cremated at Hull on Wednesday, the 27th ult., the service being conducted by the Rev. Henry Rawlings, M.A. Representatives of the committee and of the chapel trusts attended to show their respect.

THE SOUTH SHORE UNITARIAN CHURCH, BLACKPOOL,

has purchased, at a cost of nearly £600, a plot of freehold land, and they now appeal for help to erect a plain, substantial building to serve for all purposes. It is hoped to be able to do this for £1,500, making a total cost of £2,100. The land, thanks to the generosity of Mrs. John Grundy, of Summerseat; Miss S. Scholes Wrigley, of Windermere (on her own and her late mother's behalf), and Mr. R. T. Heape, of Rochdale, is entirely paid for. The Congregation have themselves promised over £300 towards the erection of the building. They carry on the Services and the Sunday School without any grant, and they feel that the remarkable success of their efforts justifies them in asking friends to help them to carry on their work under more favourable circumstances than at present. Their appeal has the full approval of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, the North and East Lancashire Mission, and the North Lancashire and Westmorland Unitarian Association; and the B. and F. U. A. has promised £25 to the Building Fund.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

IN our efforts to strengthen THE INQUIRER, and add to its general interest, we are fortunate in being able to count upon the generous co-operation of several writers of distinction in their own subjects. During the coming months we are promised some special articles on literary subjects by the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke, while Mrs. Bernard Bosanquet will write on questions of Social Economics, and Dr. J. H. Poynting, Professor of Physics in the Birmingham University, on scientific subjects.

MRS. BOSANQUET'S first article will appear next week, on "How much can the State do?" with reference in part to the Times articles on Municipal Socialism. Mrs. Bosanquet, who first became known as a writer on economic subjects as Miss Helen Dendy, we need hardly remind our readers is a daughter of the late Rev. John Dendy. In 1895 her translation of Sigwart's great work on "Logic" was published as two volumes of Muirhead's "Library of Philosophy," and in the same year she contributed seven papers to a volume on "Aspects of the Social Problem," edited by Mr. Bernard Bosanquet. Miss Dendy, as a worker for the Charity Organisation Society in East London, had gained valuable experience which enabled her to write with insight and sympathy on such subjects as "The Industrial Residuum," "Old Pensioners," "The Position of Women in Industry," "The Meaning and Methods of True Charity." In the following year Mrs. Bosanquet published a book entitled "Rich and Poor," of the greatest value for workers among the poor. The first part, which was descriptive, had sections on "The Parish and its Institutions," "The Family Income and Expenditure," "Women of the East," "The Sunny Side"; the second part contained very helpful "Suggestions for Workers." "Rich and Poor" reached a second edition in 1898, when Mrs. Bosanquet also published another volume, "The Standard of Life and other Studies."

THE Provincial Assembly of London and the South Eastern Counties is to hold its fourteenth annual meeting at Hastings on Tuesday, Sept. 30th, when the Rev. Dr. G. Dawes Hicks, of Islington, will be the preacher. In making this announcement the Essex Church Calendar and Seed Sower adds an historical note, which begins: "Our Cause at Hastings only dates back forty-two years." Is it any use protesting against this dreadful piece of denominational slang? Our Church at Hastings, or the effort to establish it, may not date back further than 1860, but surely our Cause is older than any single effort to serve it—the cause of truth and genuine religion.

THE British Association is holding its seventy-second annual meeting in Belfast, where it met last in 1874, and heard Professor Tyndall's famous presidential address, which was followed by Dr. Martineau's address in Manchester New College on "Religion as Affected by Modern Materialism." The President this year is Professor Dewar, the distinguished chemist, who succeeded Tyndall at the Royal Institution. The President's address was given on Wednesday evening in the Grosvenor Hall. Professor Dewar, after a loyal reference to the King, spoke of the late Prince Consort's wise advocacy from that chair of the claims of science for public recognition. If they had listened to those words the nation, he said, would be now in a very different position.

We should not now be painfully groping in the dark after a system of national education. We should not be wasting money, and time more valuable than money, in building imitations of foreign educational superstructures before having put in solid foundations. We should not be hurriedly and distractedly casting about for a system of tactics after confrontation with the disciplined and co-ordinated forces of industry and science led and directed by the rulers of powerful States. Forty-three years ago we should have started fair had the Prince Consort's views prevailed. As it is, we have lost ground which it will tax even this nation's splendid reserves of individual initiative to recover.

The President then pleaded strongly for the adequate endowment of education and research, and devoted the substantive part of his address to an account of his own special subject, the Liquefaction of Gases.

AT the forthcoming autumn meeting of the Congregational Union at Glasgow, the following resolution on the Education Bill is to be submitted by the Committee:—

That this Assembly protests most strongly against the Education Bill now before Parliament, inasmuch as (1) it sacrifices educational efficiency to sectarian and priestly ends; (2) in the summary abolition of those School Boards of England and Wales which have powerfully promoted the education of the people, whilst they have enlarged religious liberty for parents, teachers and scholars, the Bill has seriously impaired the control of the people over, and their interest in, schools supported by public funds; (3) it has not only been introduced without mandate from the constituencies, but is being forced through Parliament in the face of direct indications that the opinion of the country is opposed to its main provisions; (4) it violates the principle of civil and religious liberty (a) by placing the entire support of denominational schools on public funds, without providing for public control in all respects of such schools, and (b) by confining the appointment of teachers in denominational schools to members of such denominations.

This Assembly, therefore, calls upon His Majesty's Government to withdraw the Bill, or forthwith to appeal to the country upon it. It urges all friends of education and of civil and religious liberty (a) to organise themselves more thoroughly to secure the abandonment of the measure or an appeal to the people; and (b) if the Act is forced upon the nation to use all honourable means to make it unworkable.

THE vigorous letters on the Education Bill which Dr. Clifford has been contributing to the Daily News will shortly be issued by the National Reform Union as a pamphlet, with the title, "The Education Question—What is at Stake?" In Wednesday's Daily News, Dr. Clifford defined the issues raised by the Government Bill, and showed how radical the conflict, involving the whole conception of religion and religious education, as well as the relation of the State to the Churches. And he adds:

It does not appear to me to be more than the truth to say that, on these matters, the English Church has been, and is, at war, not with the Free Churches merely, but with the mass of the English people outside all Churches, and with the Colonies of our great Empire, and also with the advancing life of the world.

THE Preston Guild Merchant held last week with much pomp and ceremony is an interesting survival. Many of the formalities observed had important meaning in past ages. Preston received its charter about the year 1180, granting it, among other liberties, the right to have a Guild Merchant. Since 1328 this privilege has been exercised only at intervals of twenty years. Accordingly, when the time came round this year, Preston celebrated its unique custom with brilliance of decoration and flower show and concert, bands, banners, and illuminations. The processions were remarkable, especially the Trades Procession on the Wednesday. The pageant and rejoicing, associated at Preston with labour and skilled artisanship throughout the week, show that the sense of exhilaration and the enthusiasm of crowds do not necessarily require a military centre for their manifestation, and that men can still, as of yore, glory in their common daily service of life. The strength of England must always largely depend on her sober and steady hard-working citizens, and the Guild Merchant may well have influenced the vast numbers who crowded the streets and spaces of Preston to increased respect for these true builders of the nation's welfare.

WHY can Belgian traders undersell English makers, not only in the cheaper, but also in the better qualities of guns? This question, which is part of a large question applying to other countries besides Belgium and other articles besides guns, has been asked by the National Society of Sporting and Military Gun-workers, who have sent over a deputation from Birmingham to Liege to inquire into the matter. After visiting about fifty factories in and near Liege, the delegates answer that in Belgium beginners receive a better training, that manufacturers are mostly themselves practical workmen with a care for their workpeople and machinery made intimate by constant association with them, and that while wages are not much different from English wages considering the cost of living, the workman is usually half a peasant, and cultivates a large strip of land attached to his house, better housing and food, and health resulting therefrom, being an important factor in his general efficiency. It is worthy of more than passing thought that a party of men whose occupation is manufacture, and who went over to Belgium to report on trade problems, come to the conclusion that "the agricultural system in Belgium is one of the chief reasons for the success achieved by the people in commercial competition." From all sides, and for the sake of prosperity of every kind, not only commercial success, we are receiving intimations that we must have better land laws, and that, as a nation, we must get back to the land and cultivate it.

THE tradesmen of St. Helens are engaged in a struggle against the Co-operative Society of that town. They aim at a very severe kind of "persuasion" of those whom they employ and all whom they can influence, the kind of persuasion associated with the word "boycott." This method is always objectionable. It is, moreover, a foolish struggle. If the co-operators do not do their own trading with themselves at their own stores, it is clear that the present tendency of retail trade is none the less towards huge establishments, which, if not co-operative, are the property of wealthy individuals, or of companies. The small trader in many branches of business is having a hard time of it. It will not, however, better his position if he succeeds in destroying the co-operative stores, only to be swallowed up by the wealthy trader or limited company. In our large towns the question is rather between co-operative stores and great stores which are not co-operative. The small tradesman is at a disadvantage, excepting where special skill or knowledge count for a good deal, and so a competent man can still hold his own.

IN Professor Virchow, of Berlin, whose death, in his eighty-first year, occurred on Friday week, Germany has lost not only her greatest living man of science, but a politician, a reformer, and public benefactor of the first rank. Born at Schifelheim, not far from Stettin, in North Germany, Oct. 13, 1821, Rudolf Virchow studied medicine in the University of Berlin, and in 1847 began to lecture there on pathology. An outbreak of typhus in Silesia first brought him into public notice, for he not only made a study of the fever from the scientist's point of view, but presented a report to the authorities strongly condemning the conditions of poverty, filth, and overcrowding which were at the root of the evil. Thus early he entered on his career as a reformer, unpopular with the authorities, but fearless and radical to the end. This first campaign in 1848 led to his removal from Berlin, and he became Professor of Pathology at Würburg, but when in 1856 he published his great work on "Cellular Pathology," a work which at once established his reputation as the first authority on his subject, and of which it has been said that it for the first time "gave the art of medicine a scientific basis," his claims could not be resisted, and he was recalled to Berlin, which remained his home to the end.

THE Times obituary notice speaks of Virchow in the following terms:—

> This singular man attempted many things and was mediocre in none, and so far from having any morbid strain about him, he devoted a very long life to arduous and incessant labour, in which complete sanity of judgment was, perhaps, the most conspicuous feature. Darwin, Pasteur, Helmholtz were pure men of science who eschewed the turmoil of public life; he stands by their side as a great pioneer in the most obscure of all the sciences, but he also led a political party for years and crossed swords on equal terms with one of the greatest statesmen of the century, and at the same time he accomplished more practical reform than any other individual of his time. Yet he remained free from the taint of ambition and self-seeking. Perfectly simple and modest, he coveted no honours, nor could any decorations have added to the lustre of his name. He respected himself and others, but most he respected truth and justice.

On his return to Berlin in 1856, Virchow entered the Municipal Council of that city, and took his place at once not only as an expert adviser, but as a hardworking practical administrator and reformer. To him was due the sanitary regeneration of Berlin. His constant labours in research and as a famous teacher did not hinder him from dealing in the most thorough manner with such matters as the water-supply of the city, drainage and hospitals. In 1862 he became a member of the Prussian Chamber, and was quickly recognised as leader of the Radical party, and in 1880 he also entered the Reichstag. Years ago he made a motion on the subject of disarmament, much ridiculed at the time, but to be remembered now with honour in view of the later appeal of the Tsar of Russia. Anthropology and archæology were also subjects which attracted the keen interest of his wonderfully versatile mind. In spite of his radicalism, even Imperial favour at last acknowledged him, and joined on his eightieth birthday in the honour and acclamations of the whole scientific world.

THE Whitsuntide hymn-papers, issued now for many years by the Manchester District Sunday School Association, have become deservedly popular for the number and variety of really good children's hymns they contain, with tunes which it is a pleasure for the little ones to sing. In the same series, the Association has just issued a second number of "Hymns and Choral Songs for Harvest Festivals," which may be commended to congregations preparing for Harvest Thanksgiving Services. The number contains eighteen hymns, with tunes to all but the first four; and we would call special attention to an admirable tune Cremyll, specially written for Chadwick and Gannett's harvest hymn,

> Now sing we a song for the harvest, for which it has hitherto been difficult to find good music. Of the other tunes the best are already well known, including that to "We plough the fields and scatter." The Rev. W. G. Tarrant contributes a welcome hymn, of which the first two verses are as follows:

> "Go work in My vineyard, My garden and field,
> And bring Me the fruits and the flowers they yield."
> The voice of the Master the labourers heard,
> And into His harvest they went at His word.
> The fathers beloved, the reapers of yore,
> Have brought home their sheaves, and their labour is o'er;
> But lo! as He calleth the weary to sleep,
> New harvests arise and new harvesters reap.

There is also another thanksgiving hymn of Mr. Gannett's, of which, however, the text is marked as "altered":—

> Alleluia to our King!
> Hearts bow down, and voices sing
> Praises to the glorious One,
> All His year of wonder done.
> Praise Him for His budding green
> April's resurrection scene;
> Praise Him for His shining hours
> Filling all the land with flowers.
> Praise Him for His summer rain,
> Feeding, day and night, the grain;
> Praise Him for His tiny seed,
> Holding all His world shall need.
> Praise Him for His garden root,
> Meadow grass, and orchard fruit;
> Praise for hills and valleys broad,
> Each the table of the Lord.
> Praise Him, too, for snowy rest,
> Falling soft on Nature's breast;
> Praise for happy dreams of birth
> Brooding in the quiet earth.
> For His year of wonder done
> Praise to the All-Glorious One!
> Hearts bow down, and voices sing
> Alleluia to our King!

THE KESWICK CONVENTION.

ITS BODY, SOUL, AND SPIRIT.

(III.) ITS SPIRIT.

THE religious conceptions of people are somewhat on this wise related to logic. Some have not attained to logic at all; some are in bondage to it; others have, so to speak, gone right through and come out at the other end. These know that life is too large to be ring-fenced with definitions. In estimating the theology of any particular "school" we are bound to determine to which of these groups it belongs.

This in respect of "Keswick Teaching" is not a question that can long hang in doubt. At a Keswick Convention no appeal is allowed to logic. Here it is "Thus saith the Lord"—and cadit quæstio.

To ask "Hath God said?" is to incur the reminder that this is a point first mooted by the Old Serpent and never subsequently except at his suggestion. To press for the credentials of the Old Serpent brings us back again to another "Thus saith the Lord." This is a process locally known as "hard-knocks" and "home-thrusts." Clearly it is not by logical analysis that we shall reach the leading ideas of Keswick theology. As well attempt to get at the core of an onion by stripping off its follicles. The body of the thing in either case disappears in the process of looking for it.

Does this mean that the theology is of no value? Certainly not. It means that the analytic method is at fault. You would not expect to explain electricity by dissecting a piece of telegraph wire. Nor is it anything at all to the purpose to show that every proposition of a confession of faith is a logical absurdity, unless we are prepared to assert that the keys of the Kingdom of Heaven have been transferred from Peter to John Stuart Mill.

But, as we have seen already, it is not to Peter nor to Mill that this function is assigned in the "Keswick Teaching"; but to a certain intellectual attitude on the part of the candidate for admission.

Now this intellectual attitude, whatever we may think of it in other respects, would not be regarded as either necessary or desirable except in relation to a certain definite conception of human life and destiny.

What then is this conception? In putting this question we begin to unravel the mystery of the meaning of a Keswick Convention. The Convention takes place to give emphasis to the belief of 6,000 persons (and so many more as in one way or another are identified with them in thought or word or deed on the occasion of it) in God, and the soul, and immortality. This is a witness it bears in the face of that practical atheism which is doing much more than the moribund and theoretical materialism of our day to "dishonour the name of Christ by itself professing it."

The God they worship at Keswick, estimated by a stranger from the accounts of his Nature to be heard at the Tent Meetings, may seem a poor enough sort of a divinity. When we hear about the booby-traps He sets to catch poor little Higher-Critics; the subtle antidotes for Evolution concealed in innocent-looking verses of the Psalms, and the tricksy way whereby an opportune miracle was dulled to human comprehension till the hour and the man were revealed at Keswick to explain it—when we hear these things and much else like them, we hesitate to write of godhead with a capital G.

But when the whole congregation falls down on its knees, and from 3,000 hearts and mouths goes forth, as from one heart, one mouth, the cry to "Our Father"; or the silent moments of waiting supervene with bowed head and heart uplifted in desire, there is here a witness to belief in GOD which platform oratory can neither constitute nor destroy.

For these are no casual church-goers who are here, as they might be supposed at St. Paul's or the City Temple, from many motives of no religious significance. These people are come from all corners of the earth that they may find God. Their mere presence here is a fact of religious importance. They believe in God. Exactly what importance their belief may have as evidence that there is a God to believe in we are not here concerned to discuss. For demonstration of God good logic or bad are equally futile, and man's belief in His existence and character must be founded in something else. To believe in God is, ultimately, to believe that life is worth living. Even with those to whom the word God has become little else but a figure of speech, it remains a figure indicative of a universe expressive of, and incentive to, a purposeful energy.

And what a joy and refreshment it is to associate with people who are not always asking of life, whether the game is worth the candle!

For they believe also in the human soul, that there is a "higher life," and that to be immortal means a right to live by motives not limited to aims within the compass of the present life. Hence a main part of the business of the Convention is to inculcate and pray for holiness. The nature and work of the Holy Spirit is much dwelt upon in the addresses; and yet not nearly so much as would be the case if from sheer force of habit speakers were not led off into "evangelistic" lines of "argument." At least one address, and that not the least noteworthy, would appear to have been a "Mission address" with little change but of a few words and phrases.

Still, the inculcation of holiness is a chief aim of the gathering, whether or no it is easy to learn much of what is meant by the word from the addresses. Nor need we shrink from Keswick presentations of holiness when we find Jacob, and David, and other Old Testament sinners held up as examples of it. For the Jacob and David and the rest, are not they of historical conjecture, but the lay-figures of the Sunday-school manuals and mediæval pulpits, which still serve well enough to be dressed up in garments of righteousness that the righteousness may be seen and desired, however much opinion be divided on the structure of the old lay-figures.

A more real difficulty is that where there is so much talk of "pentecostal grace" and "gifts of the Spirit" and "divine power," what one sees, it may be at the moment is a very foolish old man talking incoherences with much sound and fury. The claims are so shockingly disproportionate to the appearances. But is not this just such a criticism as was made of Paul on Mars Hill? And yet of all that has made for good in history how much of the best has been due to St. Paul!

And in spite of "the foolishness of the thing preached" it may still please God to "save them that believe."* We shrewdly suspect that to a higher intelligence all pulpit wisdom of all schools would present the quality of being "much of a muchness." The real answer to objections of this kind is surely that, not in those who think they have attained, but in those who still brace themselves for pressing toward the mark, must we look for evidence of the most conspicuous working of God's Spirit. And this "divine discontent" is a very prominent feature of Keswick.

An old charge against the ordinary "evangelicalism" is that it results in self-complacency. The attitude towards life of a man who knows himself "saved" is apt to be that of one at the recent Coronation contemplating the weary crowds with the consciousness that he had a ticket for admission to the Abbey in his pocket. It is not an attitude that is necessitated by "Evangelicalism"; and by so much is the "Evangelicalism" of Keswick the nobler and the grander in that it has freed itself from it. Not self-complacency but self-humiliation is the more characteristic of a Convention. Not the least remarkable of the platform utterances were the appeals to beware of spiritual pride. The need for such appeals may be a very real and pressing need—in the words of the Indian proverb "an ass does not become a tiger by making a pilgrimage to Benares"—but in that it is recognised and met the fault of it is not chargeable upon the Convention system.

As to the effects of a Convention upon the life and character of its members we must, in homely phrase, find the proof of the pudding in the eating.

There is no lack of testimony to refreshment of spirit, invigoration of effort, stimulus of faith and hope and charity; nay even of new thoughts of God, new hopes of Heaven resulting to those who are present. Psychological analysis might call these effects by different names and assign them to different causes in many instances from those alleged. But does that so greatly matter? Take this testimony from a writer in The Life of Faith of Aug. 13: "I am returning with body strengthened, soul invigorated, faith increased, and joy abounding."

Such a sentence might equally have been penned by one returning from a holiday in the Alps or on the ocean. It might signalise no more than a toning up of the system by pleasant intercourse with kindred spirits, abundance of pure fresh air, and fine scenery. Then is the attribution to "religious causes" pure delusion? We trow not. For scenery, friendship, pure air, sunshine, exercise—if there be anything in nature good and helpful towards a greater efficiency and a worthier outlook for the work of life, have not such things all of them their religious significance?

And if a Keswick Convention shall serve to focus upon one week's experience the best of the good influences of man and nature, is it not the influence of God that it focuses, and may not men realise God's presence here as they seldom do and often cannot otherwhere? Not that God is more present at Keswick than elsewhere; but that everything conduces to impress men with the faith of His presence. Some will go so far as to call this faith a "consciousness." And who will gainsay it?

If men have found God in the thunderstorm and the sunset, how much more in a fellowship of noble souls?

This is the religious significance of Keswick.

Now of all that is valuable to religious life in a Keswick Convention, what is there that is not common to Christian effort everywhere? Belief in God, in the worth and destiny of the soul, and in duty; these are of Essex Hall no less than of Exeter Hall. In the language in which we express these beliefs, in the evidence we adduce for them, they and we differ greatly. Yet Christ is not divided. We neither desire to monopolise his name; nor will we be denied our right to be called by it. We believe with Peter that in every nation he that feareth God and worketh righteousness is accepted with Him; and, though not yet in outward and visible unity, in an actual harmony, not less true because unconscious, working from the same motives, seeking to actualise the same ideals, these of the Keswick Convention; and we of the Heretic Communions to whom they deny their fellowship, their Pulpits, and their Heaven are, and shall one day be found to be, ALL ONE IN CHRIST JESUS.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

IN this month's Nineteenth Century and After will be found Bishop Welldon's Sermon to the Colonial Troops at the special service held for them in Westminster Abbey on Sunday, August 17th. It was an address remarkable for its directness and simplicity and the genuine feeling which evidently prompted it. The passage of deepest significance was that in which the Bishop answered the question he had asked—"Will the Empire last?"

The Empire depends for its conservation upon the principles for which it stands as a guarantee before the eyes of civilised humanity—upon justice and liberty and progress, upon the rights of every individual, upon the sense of public duty, upon true and pure religion. It depends, too, upon the character of its citizens. There can be no great empire of small-minded men and women; there can be no noble empire of an ignoble people. But if character be, as it is, the strength of empire, then are we all divinely called to play a part in an imperial drama. We cannot all be rich or clever or distinguished; we cannot all achieve high triumphs; but there is no one of us—not the humblest or the poorest—who may not lay the offering of his personal self-restraint and self-devotion upon the altar of his country's honour. In this sense we are all the guardians of empire. Only, believe me, character is a thing not easily won; nor can it be easily preserved. It demands all the moral and spiritual resources which God in His mercy vouchsafes to humankind. But it is the one indispensable quality of an imperial people; and I speak from the very depth of my soul when I say to you, in this holy place, you will never maintain empire without character, you will never maintain character without religion, you will never maintain religion without Christ.

In the same number, à propos of the coming Tercentenary of the Bodleian Library, there is an interesting article by Mr. E. A. Savage, telling of the origin of the library and Thomas Bodley's generosity and its subsequent enrichment. Mr. A. W. Gattie writes with laborious cleverness, but not very sensibly, on "Reasonableness and the Education Bill." Earl Nelson's article on "Hymns, Ancient and Modern," is interesting from his connection with Church hymnals. Sir Wemyss Reid in his chronicle of "Last Month" gives a glowing account of the Coronation.

The Contemporary opens with an elaborate article on "Lessons of the South African War," translated and reproduced from the Revue des Deux Mondes. It is attributed without contradiction to General Négrier, and its moral, pointing to the essential worth of personal character, is deserving of serious attention. Professor James Orr, at the conclusion of his article on Dr. Fairbairn's "Philosophy of Christianity," states the issue between modern culture and the old conception of Christianity very fairly. He himself and Dr. Fairbairn hold that there is good ground for their belief in Christ as a transcendent Divine Person, the Eternal Son of God, but the currents of thought among scholars, critics, and liberal theologians, Professor Orr frankly admits, are against that view. Thus he says of Dr. Fairbairn's position:—

Many will accept almost to the letter his delineation of Christianity in the concluding sections of his work who will deny that the miraculous interpretation of the Person of Christ—the Incarnation proper—is essential to it. Mr. T. H. Green, e.g.—were he living—or the Master of Balliol would not assent to his view of the essence of Christianity; as little would it find favour with writers like the late A. Sabatier, or with Professor Harnack and his enthusiastic following in and out of the Church. The pre-eminent value of Principal Fairbairn's book, in fact, is, in our opinion, just this, that it brings us face to face with the ultimate alternative as to what the true essence of Christianity is. On the one hand, a Universal Father-God, whose presence fills the world and all human spirits; Jesus, the soul of the race in whom the consciousness of the Father, and the corresponding spirit of filial love, first came to full realisation; the spirit of divine sonship learned from Jesus as the essence of religion and salvation—here, in sum, is the Christianity of the "modern" spirit. All else is dressing, disguise, Aberglaube, religious symbolism, inheritance of effete dogmatisms. Will this suffice for Christianity? Or is the Apostolic confession still to be held fast that Christ is Lord: the Incarnate, the Living, the Exalted, the Redeemer and Saviour, the Head of all things for His Church and for the world? It is this question the Church of the immediate future will have to face, and meet with a very distinct answer, "Yes" or "No."

A third article on "Immortality," by Emma Marie Caillard, dealing with the subject from the philosophical standpoint, answers in the affirmative the great question as to our life beyond the power of death. The ground taken is indicated in the following sentence:—"Individuality, though manifested in, is not a consequence of the Temporal Order, but belongs to the Eternal; and a being who is, to the extent that man is, consciously individual, capable of an ethical relationship to God and to his fellows, could not lapse from that consciousness without some part of the Eternal Meaning lapsing with him."

A brief article on "The Nonconformists and the Education Bill" clearly defines the issues, and rightly declares that in spite of present threatening obstacles there must now be an advance in the national system of education in this country, bringing all elementary schools under genuine popular control.

In the Monthly Review the illustrated article is a third instalment of Mr. Arthur Morrison's account of the "Painters of Japan," but the most notable article is perhaps Mr. Rudyard Kipling's picturesque and amusing parable "Below the Mill-dam," on the theme of "The Old Country must Wake up."

The Rev. A. H. Galton's article in the Fortnightly, on "The Incompatibles: A Revolt from Rome by English Romanist Clergy," has been received with a good deal of incredulity and with open derision by the Tablet. Mr. Galton, who was at one time a priest of the Roman Church, and is now domestic chaplain to the Bishop of Ripon, declares that there are at least 150 secular priests who have combined to protest against the tyranny of Rome, and propose to have a bishop of their own, "a subsidiary or strangers' bishop," and so separate themselves from the rule of the Roman Curia and its worldly policy. The position of these protesters is thus stated:—

Rome and England are plainly Incompatibles; and the cause of these Reformers is no less plainly the cause of all those among the English Roman Catholic laity who value their country and its free institutions, as well as the true interests of their religion. Mr. O'Donnell's striking book on Irish Education should bring home to every English Roman Catholic the evils which prevail in the present administration of his Church. Cavour's formula, "A Free Church in a Free State," is theoretically sound when both Church and State are really free. No Church, however, can be free which submits itself and its affairs to the domination of the Papal Monarchy; and no Church can be vigorous or healthy when the laity are dominated by the clergy, when the clergy are practically considered to be the Church. Before the Reformation, the Papal authority in England was regulated and limited by the Royal supremacy. In France, up to the revolution, the Papal authority was no less restricted by the real and active jurisdiction of the Crown. Since these protective barriers were swept away, the exercise of the Papal authority has been almost unchecked, to the incalculable loss and damage of the laity. The centralised and infallible Papacy is a cause of danger and disturbance in every modern State. All its wealth and all its energies are devoted to temporal ambitions. Its instruments and its masters are the Religious Orders, led and inspired by the Jesuits. The laity have come to be regarded as little more than blind contributors, who are not even consulted about the expenditure of their contributions. The Infallible Pope has devoured the Episcopate, and made future councils superfluous. The Religious Orders are tapping the finances and sapping the vigour of the parochial clergy. These abuses explain the present effort among the secular clergy; and the cause of these clergy is assuredly the cause of the laity, as well as of everything that can give any ground for hope in the future health and freedom of the Roman Catholic Church.

Whether anything tangible comes of this alleged effort or not, there can be little doubt that the feeling here expressed does exist, and is probably much more widespread than the Roman authorities are willing to admit.

A STUDY IN HUMAN NATURE.*

I.

THE Gifford Lectures are an institution founded in the four Scottish Universities by Lord Gifford, a Lord of Session, or Scottish Judge. By the terms of the foundation, a course of twenty lectures is to be given every two years in each University, the subject being "Natural Theology," which the lecturers may treat just as they please. Notwithstanding the remarkable freedom allowed—which does great credit to the founder's breadth of view—the lecturers have, as a rule, followed a few well-worn tracks. There were one or two brilliant exceptions; thus, Professor Pfleiderer, in his course at Edinburgh a few years ago, stated some radical critical conclusions regarding the New Testament—conclusions more "radical" than sound, in our opinion; but he stated them in plain language, and did not veil them judiciously in philosophical generalities, as some other lecturers had already done; and in consequence his lectures made a great sensation, and had to be solemnly "replied" to by the three leading guardians of "Free Church" orthodoxy. And again, Professor Ward, of Cambridge, in his course at Aberdeen in 1897 and 1898, undertook a thorough examination of those scientific results on which it is supposed that agnostic and materialist conclusions can be based; and the result was a work of permanent value. But these are exceptions. An able writer, speaking of books on the science and philosophy of religion in general, has said:—

> A great deal of work, much of it, unfortunately, mere guess-work, has been done on the problem of the so-called "origin of religion" [as if the religious experience could not have had very different beginnings with different races and in different circumstances] and of the order of the stages in its development; much has also been done in the way of religions-philosophie, i.e., in the attempt to read into the theological dogmas of various Churches the doctrines of various philosophical systems, or, vice versa, to read the dogmas of the Churches into the doctrines of the philosophers. But amid all this energetic application to religious problems, the true problem which is the prius of all religious philosophising, the problem of giving an impartial description of the religious experience itself as it is immediately experienced by civilised Western men, has been almost entirely neglected. . . . It is of course impossible to find the religious experience flourishing in absolute independence of the speculative beliefs which have moulded our language about such matters and given its direction to our earliest education; but by abstracting as far as possible from the utterances of professed theologians with a passion for systematisation — by attending primarily not to avowed expositions of "religious truths" but to the immediate expressions of devotional feeling—and by carefully comparing the expression given to such feelings by saints and prophets with that of eminent heretics and unorthodox mystics, we may at least make some approximation to an account of the religious experience in which all essential features and no others shall be represented.

Direct Study of Religious Experience.

Professor James' lectures constitute an entirely new departure, on the lines here indicated. It is a method of treatment with which Unitarians are not familiar. To some extent it must needs be distasteful to them; not because they are devoid of deep spiritual feeling, but because they shrink from expressing such feeling. This, however, is nothing more than a personal characteristic on a large scale; it does not alter the fact that the roots of religion lie in experiences of the inner life which are far more widely diffused than we usually imagine. To study these, in all their varieties, to any good purpose, requires indeed gifts which we do not all possess; for many of the types of experience to be dealt with are utterly foreign to our own mental temperament and our ordinary spiritual outlook. To do justice to them, we need a true intellectual catholicity united with a many-sided sympathy and psychological insight, and these are gifts which the author of the volume before us is admitted to possess in a high degree. The chief value of his book consists in the two distinctive characteristics, that it treats of religion as a fact of experience, and shows the immense variety of forms which this experience may take. In this respect it reminds us of a recent book which treats of Theism or Belief in God on its intellectual side, and which shows, in a historical survey, that this great problem may be approached from many different points of view, and along many different lines of thought. The present writer ventured to observe, when noticing that work, that this obvious fact is too often overlooked.* Every one of the paths has a justification for its existence. It is true that we find our thoughts on the great subject of Belief in God running most easily and naturally on some one line, which we work for all that it is worth, and we do well. But the result is sometimes a mental "ossification" which makes it impossible for us to see how the same result can be intelligently reached by any other path than our own.

Wide-spread Interest in the Book.

It is, we think, very satisfactory to see the interest which Mr. James' volume has aroused in the Press. His arguments have been expounded clearly and justly in most of the leading London and provincial newspapers. His main conclusion has been welcomed in some quarters where we should hardly have expected it: as in the Spectator and the Christian World. The British Weekly has given a lengthy criticism of the book which is instructive as regards a phase of "orthodox" thought: to this we may have to refer again. If the Press reflects the mind of the public, it seems to us that the mind of the public is in a healthy state with regard to the fundamentals of religious belief. It has certainly not taken what Mr. James calls the sectarian scientist's attitude, choosing to assume that the world of sensations and scientific laws and objects is all. People are in an expectant attitude, ready to welcome new light; in the meantime they hold by the old anchors, although they are conscious that many of them need to be pulled up and forged over again.

The Author's Method and Conclusions.

We have, perhaps, let these general reflections run on for too long. We must now indicate more precisely the course of Mr. James' argument and the chief conclusions that he suggests. As we have already implied, he acts on the true and important principle that a large acquaintance with actual facts often makes us wiser than the possession of abstract formulæ, however deep. He has "loaded the lectures with concrete examples," deliberately chosen from the more intense forms of religious experience. He describes types of strong enthusiastic religiousness and its characteristic modes of expression: "The Religion of Healthy-mindedness," "The Sick Soul," "Conversion," "Saintliness," "Mysticism." The most strongly marked or "extreme" varieties, if justly interpreted, always furnish the profounder information. The difficulty in dealing with the ordinary person's experience is that so much of what he believes is due only to the fact that he has been taught to believe it; so much of his religion is a matter of habit and tradition, rather than of belief based on his own personal experience. "Those in whom a fierce faith has triumphed over the fear of death; those in whom the multitude see a pattern for imitation, those, that is, who have been the founders of new forms of faith rather than mere followers, those in whom sincerity is an ecstasy, the prophets, the visionaries"—in such we may study most deeply the workings of the religious impulse. Some readers, Mr. James admits, may be repelled by the subject when it is taken up in this way, and may think that in the earlier lectures at least he is offering a caricature, and that "such convulsions of piety are not sane." If so, he asks them to have patience to read to the end, where he "combines the religious impulse with other principles of common sense which serve as correctives of exaggeration," leaving the reader to draw as moderate conclusions as he will. What religion meant to thinkers like Augustine in ancient and Hegel in modern times, to mystics like Boehme and to religious geniuses like Bunyan, to literary and scientific men, to Catholic and Protestant saints, martyrs, faith-healers, is shown by human documents selected from widely different ages, races, and creeds; and a serious effort is made to extract some common element from all these varieties.

Religion not mere Physical Re-action.

Mr. James disposes effectively of the "medical materialist" assumption that religious experience—especially in its more extreme forms—is only the mental effect of more or less disordered bodily states. All mental changes without exception are accompanied by changes in nerve and brain; and neurotic and other physical disorders are no more and no less an "explanation" of religion than of atheism. The criteria for estimating the worth and meaning of these experiences of which we speak are not physiological—they are rational and ethical:—

> Immediate luminousness, in short, philosophical reasonableness and moral helpfulness are the only available criteria. Saint Teresa might have had the nervous system of the placidest cow, and it would not now save her theology, if the trial of the theology by these other tests should show it to be contemptible. And conversely, if her theology can stand these other tests, it will make no difference how hysterical or nervously off her balance Saint Teresa

The Religious State.

A general description of the religious state, applicable to all varieties, is given by Mr. James as the definition which is most suitable for his purpose. The religious experience is that in which the reality of a primal and all-enveloping Power is brought home to us, and in which we respond to it with an enthusiasm which renders easy the dependence and self-surrender which are in any case necessary. This is not mere resignation, but an actual welcome of an existing higher Power—the primal reality which Spencer, in metaphysical language, describes as "the infinite and eternal energy from which all things proceed." With respect to Mr. James' definition—which, of course, is only given as being most suited to his immediate purpose—we have only to remark that it makes religion essentially an experience together with an emotional or practical response to it. The intellectual aspect of religion is left out of account. But no rational being could have such an experience without giving to it an intellectual as well as a practical response; and the intellectual response consists in the formation of ideas, beliefs, and convictions respecting himself, the world, and the "all-enveloping reality." This "theological" or "institutional" branch of religion Mr. James leaves alone as far as possible. But he cannot altogether ignore it. Doctrine—not mere thought about religion, but religious thought, the thought which expresses spiritual facts—cannot be dispensed with. In case after case adduced by Mr. James, the personal belief (or rather experience) has the theological belief for its necessary expression. And as we shall see, his chief theoretical result is a theological conclusion of the first importance. It is possible to regard the personal or experiential side alone for purposes of study; but the doctrinal side cannot be waived as unessential.

Inference from World-wide Religious Experience.

Mr. James holds that the experience of multitudes of men and women whose lives have been seriously influenced by communion with the Unseen are facts which require explanation just as much as any observed facts in the visible world. Such an experience is too unmistakable and widespread to be treated as illusory; "by it men live"; and the added energy and enthusiasm which it brings into life constitute an evidence in its favour which is final. Arguing, then, from the "human documents" which he quotes in such abundance and variety, Mr. James finds "a certain uniform deliverance in which religions all appear to meet." This point is the centre of interest and the fundamental issue of his discussions. What is the common "nucleus" to which religions bear testimony unanimously? Having taken as clear a view as possible of this question, we may be able to meet the next one—To what extent can we regard their testimony as true? The common element in religious experience consists of an uneasiness and its solution; the first, reduced to its simplest terms, being a sense that there is something wrong about us as we naturally stand, and the second, a sense that we are saved from the wrongness by making a proper connection with a higher power:—

The individual, so far as he suffers from his wrongness and criticises it, is to that extent consciously beyond it, and in at least possible touch with something higher, if anything higher exist. Along with the wrong part there is thus a better part of him, even though it may be but the most helpless germ. With which part he should identify his real being is by no means obvious at this stage; but when stage two (the stage of solution or salvation) arrives,* the man identifies his real being with the germinal higher part of himself, and does so in the following way:—He becomes conscious that this higher part is conterminous and continuous with a MORE of the same quality, which is operative in the universe outside of him, and which he can keep in working touch with, and in a fashion get on board of and save himself when all his lower being has gone to pieces in the wreck.

Sub-conscious Personality.

What are we to make of the doctrine that there are forces, seemingly outside the conscious individual, that bring redemption to his life—when we remember the scientific doctrine that every event (in the mental as in the material world) must be accounted for by its connection with other events which precede it? To answer this question, to find a "mediating term" between religion and science, Mr. James lays great stress on the significant psychological doctrine of "subliminal" or "subconscious" personality:—

I cannot but think that the most important step forward that has occurred in psychology since I have been a student of that science is the discovery, first made in 1886, that, in certain subjects at least, there is not only the consciousness of the ordinary field, with its usual centre and margin, but an addition thereto in the shape of a set of memories, thoughts, and feelings which are extra-marginal and outside the primary consciousness altogether, but yet must be classed as conscious facts of some sort, able to reveal their presence by unmistakable signs. I call this the most important step forward, because, unlike the other advances which psychology has made, this discovery has revealed to us an entirely unsuspected peculiarity in the constitution of human nature. . . . Let me then propose, as an hypothesis, that whatever it may be on its farther side, the "more" with which in religious experience we feel ourselves connected is on its hither side the subconscious continuation of our conscious life. Starting thus with a recognised psychological fact as our basis, we seem to preserve a contact with "science" which the ordinary theologian lacks. At the same time the theologian's contention that the religious man is moved by an external power is vindicated, for it is one of the peculiarities of invasions from the subconscious region to suggest an external control. . . . Here the over-beliefs begin; here mysticism and the conversion rapture and Vedantism and transcendental idealism bring in their monistic interpretations, and tell us that the finite self rejoins the absolute self, for it was always one with God and identical with the soul of the world. Here the prophets of all the different religions come with their visions, voices, raptures, and other openings, supposed by each to authenticate his own peculiar faith.

Leaving the "over-beliefs" out of account for the moment, Mr. James claims to have established as the common root of all religions the fact that the conscious person is continuous with a wider self through which saving experiences come; in this there is found a positive content of religious experience which is "literally and objectively true as far as it goes." It will go far. For if the "more" with which we feel ourselves connected is on its "hither side" the extension of a subconscious self, it is on its "farther side" the Power on which all worlds depend. This is the over-belief which Mr. James affirms to be "an article of almost everyone's religion," and which he is willing to accept for his own.

We hope, in a further notice, to return to this brilliant and suggestive book, and to bring some parts of it under more detailed and critical consideration.

S. H. MELLONE.

* Mr. James observes that "for some men it arrives suddenly, for others gradually, whilst others again practically enjoy it all their life."

SHORT NOTICES.

Stepping Stones, a little book of sixty pages, issued in the white cover made familiar by Henry Drummond's "Greatest Thing in the World," contains brief but helpful chapters, the thoughts of which are "chosen from Men, Books, Memory and Experience" by Margaret A. Robinson. Work, Gifts, Social Reform, Character, are some of the subjects dealt with, and there are two chapters addressed specially to Girls. Speaking of "Work for Others," Miss Robinson gives a touching account of a young man who for years had been confined to his bed, and of the difference it made to him when, some five years ago, a friend who was a constant visitor gave him one of Vere Foster's drawing books, and so brought him a new interest and occupation, until he became quite skilful with his pencil, and was able to earn something by the decoration of menu and correspondence cards. The following is a good instance of Miss Robinson's counsel: "The sick and sorry souls of the indolent rich need the lessons which they may learn from the patient industrious poor, fully as much as the poor need to have their lives brightened and the burden of the too heavy toil lifted. A querulous soul will receive many a silent reproof if the wholesome discipline of seeking out and striving to learn how to help the less fortunate is submitted to." (Cornish Brothers, 37, New-street, Birmingham. 1s.)

Jane Eyre, with an introduction by W. Robertson Nicoll, is the first volume of a substantial library edition of Charlotte Brontë's works, to which a special interest attaches, because it contains also a hitherto unpublished fragment of another story, "The Moores." There are only two chapters and the opening of a third, printed from the pencil MS. received from Mr. Nicholls, Charlotte Brontë's husband. The fragment is, of course, very tantalising. Dr. Nicoll speaks of it as probably the last thing that Charlotte Brontë wrote. Without evidence, we should have been inclined to say that it was less mature in style than the complete works, which we happily possess. Dr. Nicoll is whole-hearted in his admiration for "Jane Eyre," and his introduction is full of interest. In a reference to William Caldwell Roscoe we note that the name of that discerning critic is mistakenly inverted. (Hodder and Stoughton. 6s.)

EDINBURGH.

SIR,—My attention has been drawn to a letter in your issue of 6th inst. from Mr. Armytage Bakewell, expressing his disappointment at not finding St. Mark's Chapel open on the previous Sunday evening. Had he consulted the "Church notices" in the Scotsman before going he would have seen that the chapel was closed during the month of August. We trust he may find his way back and attend the morning service any other month of the year.

THE NATIVES OF THE TRANSVAAL.

SIR,—Many of us are ready to welcome Mr. Wicksteed's counsel towards the formation of sound public opinion respecting reconstruction in South Africa, but before we can follow his leadership we want fact and argument dealing with the special circumstances existing there.

At present, the aim of a young male Kaffir is to earn enough money to buy three or four wives, and after that to live in idleness, subsisting on their labour. This is not a state of things that any of us desire to perpetuate, certainly not in the interests of the Kaffirs themselves. Moreover, it is a state of things which we are largely responsible for introducing. Previous to our interference the Kaffirs had an occupation in which they were pretty constantly engaged—namely, warfare with one another. Constant struggle of this kind has resulted in the "natural selection" of a very fine race, physically, and the equally natural opinion that war and idleness are the honourable occupations for men, while women do the work. War being stopped, what remains is work for the women and demoralising idleness for the men.

Now, I suppose there is a law of civilisation in accordance with which habits of industry have replaced habits of warfare among the nations of Europe. Certainly, this has not come about without pressure, often of a very merciless character, having been brought to bear upon our own European ancestors. The question for South Africa is how, in the most humane manner, sufficient pressure can be brought to bear to induce the Kaffir to work himself instead of leaving all work to his wives.

It is by no means self-evident that an annual tax of £2 on each adult male, with an additional £2 for every wife above one, is oppressive, or more than a fair amount to levy on those who wish to live under the protection of our government. Polygamy may have been well suited to the state of warfare when a large proportion of the younger males succeeded in killing one another. We must surely wish to discourage it now when we look to see the ordinary numerical equality between the sexes. That this taxation will tend to supply labour for the mines is no reason for condemning it, only for taking care that the conditions of labour in the mines are themselves humane, and this we have endeavoured to secure by appointing a first-rate man as native labour commissioner. The measure may benefit the mine-owners, but certainly not them exclusively. Their profits will be heavily taxed for the benefit of the whole country, and with the hope that something may ultimately be secured from the gold-mines to pay part of the expenses of the late war.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

"The Branded Hand."

LAST week I told you something about "Snow-bound," that poem of Whittier's in which he described his old home. When he wrote it he was close upon sixty years old, and it was thirty years since he had lived in that dear old farm-house. Those years he had given up to the great struggle to win freedom for the slaves. He was an Abolitionist, one of that brave company of men and women who felt that it was a shameful thing that there should be slaves in their free country, and were determined at any cost to set them free.

Whittier, as a young man, had been eager to make a name for himself in the world of letters and of politics, but his friend, Lloyd Garrison, called him to throw in his lot with the Abolitionists, and he did it with his whole heart and soul. It meant unpopularity and poverty and danger, perhaps even death—for some were killed in that long and bitter struggle, even before the war began—but Whitter was not afraid, he knew his duty lay that way, and he was ready to sacrifice everything to do it.

He became the poet of the Abolitionists. He did much other work for the good cause, but the greatest help he gave was through his poems. They are full of a fiery indignation at the great wrong, and pity for the slaves, there is bitter reproach of those who professed to be Christians, and yet defended the evil of slavery, and honour and admiration for those faithful men and women who took the side of the wronged and oppressed and were ready to suffer for their sake.

The poem called "The Branded Hand" is one of these. Captain Jonathan Walker, a New England captain, sailing from a port in Florida, had dared to take some slaves, who had escaped from their masters, on board his ship, and he hoped to land them in the British West Indies, where all the slaves had already been set free, and where they also would be safe and free. But while they were still at sea a Government ship overtook them, and Captain Walker was seized and taken back a prisoner. After a long imprisonment in Florida, he was sentenced to a heavy fine, and before he was set free his right hand was branded with the two letters "S. S." which meant "Slave-stealer."

They might think he was disgraced, but the shame was really theirs, and this is how Whittier greeted him, when he came back to the North:—

Welcome home again, brave seaman! with thy thoughtful brow and gray,
And the old heroic spirit of our earlier, better day;
With that front of calm endurance, on whose steady nerve in vain
Pressed the iron of the prison, smote the fiery shafts of pain!
Is the tyrant's brand upon thee? Did the brutal cravens aim
To make God's truth thy falsehood, His holiest work thy shame?

There you see what Whittier felt about it. The Captain had been true to God, he had done his duty as a brave man, in trying to set free the slaves, and no imprisonment or punishment could turn that truth into falsehood, or make what he had done really shameful. To help the helpless is the holiest work that we can do for God and our fellow-men.

Why, that brand is highest honour! than its traces never yet
Upon old armorial hatchments was a prouder blazon set;
And thy unborn generations, as they tread our rocky strand,
Shall tell with pride the story of their father's branded hand!

Noble families are proud of their coats of arms, but this mark of suffering and indignity on a brave man's hand, Whittier says, is something for which they have much more reason to be proud. And then he goes on to compare the Captain with one of the old Templars, the knights who fought in the Holy Land at at the time of the Crusades. They were honoured for the scars they brought back from that warfare, but the Captain's had been a nobler warfare. The crusaders fought for the empty sepulchre, where Jesus was thought to have been buried; but a man was something much more sacred than an empty grave, and it was far better and nobler to suffer as the Captain did, in trying to help the poor slaves—"One of the least of these my brethren," as Jesus might have said.

In thy lone and long night-watches, sky above and wave below,
Thou didst learn a higher wisdom than the babbling schoolmen know;
God's stars and silence taught thee, as His angels only can,
That the one sole sacred thing beneath the cope of Heaven is Man!

This example of a brave man who had suffered for the cause of freedom Whittier rightly felt would rouse others to fresh loyalty and enthusiasm, and sterner indignation against the great wrong. Like a flag, carried before an army going into battle, they might think of that right hand, held up for all to see, to help them to remember what they were fighting for.

Then lift that manly right hand, bold ploughman of the wave!
Its branded palm shall prophesy, "Salvation to the slave!"
Hold up its fire-wrought language, that whoso reads may feel
His heart swell strong within him, his sinews change to steel.

Hold it up before our sunshine, up against our Northern air;
Ho! men of Massachusetts, for the love of God, look there!
Take it henceforth for your standard, like the Bruce's heart of yore,
In the dark strife closing round ye, let that hand be seen before!

And the masters of the slave-land shall tremble at that sign,
When it points its finger Southward along the Puritan line:
Can the craft of State avail them? Can a Christless church withstand,
In the van of Freedom's onset, the coming of that hand?

RELIGION NATURAL AND REVEALED.

SPEAKING last week of Sir HENRY THOMPSON'S essay on "The Unknown God"? we declared our agreement with the position he maintains, that "Natural Religion" is what will remain to man after the old conception of a special supernatural revelation has entirely passed away; only we insisted that the relation between "natural" and "revealed" in this connection must be properly defined, so as to bring out all the fulness of Divine truth that has been made clear to us through the natural unfolding of the spiritual life.

We can no longer look for proofs of any truth of the life with GOD in the fact that it is written in a book miraculously proved to be of Divine authority, or that it was spoken by a teacher with authority similarly attested. Great teachers have indeed authority which we reverently and thankfully acknowledge, and JESUS before all others speaks to us with authority of the inward life with GOD, but it is not an authority of his own, accepted simply on his word without answering response in us; the authority with which he speaks, and others in like manner in their own degree, is that of the Inward Witness, the living Spirit of truth, ever present with us, as with him and them. Not because the teacher says it, but because we know for ourselves that what he says is true—that is the firm basis of our conviction as to the great facts of the religious life.

So the true knowledge of GOD is unfolded to the world. The growing mind of man, the deeper experience of moral and spiritual facts, have brought new conviction and clearer light, and the completer sharing of such experience with others must still further extend and confirm that knowledge. This, we now clearly see, is the method of Divine revelation, all in the natural order of human experience, but penetrated through and through with that which is spiritual, which can be proved by no external attestation but carries in itself the attestation that it is indeed of GOD.

We stand now at the end of a long history, and look out upon an illimitable future. In the past we see what has been the history of different races of mankind, what teachers have arisen in many lands, what various types of character have been developed, what ideals have been cherished. Why is it that for us the great record of the Hebrew prophets, the treasures of Hebrew devotion have the strongest attraction, and in JESUS we recognise the teacher who, before all others, has for us the "words of life"? Not because their record comes to us through any channel of unique and supernatural revelation, still less because an infallible Church bids us at our peril attend to them, but simply because the response of our own hearts goes out to them and the Spirit within bears witness to their truth. In all the past ages of the world we see that the true Light by which we live shines most clearly in them, they help us most to understand ourselves and the world in which we live, and bring us strength and courage to live out our own life in the happy confidence that it is with GOD. Others also are our teachers, we are not shut out by our own special kinship from a wider fellowship, but here we see the line along which the revelation has been most complete, and where, when we contemplate the past, we are nearest to GOD. If anyone tells us that without a supernatural revelation we can have no certainty of this, we simply reply that the sun is in our heavens, and we know in whom we trust: if this is not "supernatural revelation" it is yet an unfolding of the light and truth of GOD. Assured conviction is not to be gained by attempting to set up again those old ecclesiastical props, but by completer fidelity to present duty, entering more deeply into the true life now. When we do the will of our FATHER we know the truth; only through the Christ-like spirit can we enter into the grace and truth of JESUS.

Our Natural Religion, in which divinest truth is revealed to us, is in the freedom of the Spirit, with no limit to the measure of the light that may be given, or to the quietness and gladness of our rest in the Eternal. It is not of our own strength or wisdom, but of utter surrender to the living GOD. Thus we may see the measure of our duty as we enter into the fellowship of our Free Churches. There must be life in them, the natural life of a true manhood, through which alone there can be in them more and more of revealed religion. We come as seekers and receivers of the light, pledged only to the one great confession of GOD. As there is in such a union the true spirit of worship and the strength of loyal service, the Church becomes a revealer of the truth and of true religion to the world.

There is a great joy in this service, and a very sacred privilege. We have to recognise that the living truth for our day and generation is in no creed or ancient record, but must be in our own lives. Thus from each one is asked a faithful contribution to the common store. No one but has his part in the receiving of the light and the revealing of GOD to the world.

The appeal touches our life at every point: in the secret chamber of the heart, that there may be more reverence and humility, more of the gladness of faith and self-surrender, more of the joy of companionship with the Eternal amid the glory of His works; and so more treasure may be brought into the House of Prayer, to enrich the fellowship of common worship. Then in the brotherly union of the Church there is always more to be achieved, in franker fellowship and deeper sympathy, the graces of individual character kindling new life in other hearts; and from that common centre of devout life a new spring of hope and strength for willing service in the world: the battle of righteousness, for the Kingdom of GOD on earth, set with a new determination, with a more joyful confidence in the strength of the Eternal.

Thus the Seekers become also the Givers, that the light may shine more and more unto the perfect day. From this true life of the present, more light is again cast upon the past. The ancient history, the profound experience of the men of old is better understood, and speaks more directly home to us. The old teachers have a richer wisdom to unfold, the leaders have fresh inspiration, because of the humble faithfulness of the workers in the present: so by action and reaction a fuller measure of the true light of GOD shines upon the world.

It ought then to be with wondering gratitude and awe that we accept the trust of our Free Churches, for in them once more the testimony of the prophets of old is to be declared, the spirit of a true devotion, a heartfelt, beautiful and helpful worship is to be maintained, and the power and beauty and joy of our Christian discipleship are to be demonstrated to the world. It is so much easier to make a confession of faith with the lips and to submit to the outward authority of a Church; but here are to be living organs of divine truth, an effectual union, both for worship and for work, of humble, faithful souls. It is a great and holy calling, full, if we will take it so, of the delight of a great adventure in the illimitable ocean of Divine Truth and Love, yet with the assurance of a Home and a Guardian Care beyond the reach of which we cannot drift.

If such is the ideal, we do well to ask in all seriousness of our Churches, in which our own place of service is, What is their testimony to Truth? What is the spirit that rules in them? What marks do they bear of true Christian grace? What are we doing, to be equal to our high trust?

PHILIP JAMES BAILEY.

OUR grandparents read Bailey's "Festus" with astonishment and admiration. More than sixty years ago the poem was first published, and only last Saturday its author passed away, at Nottingham, which was also the place of his birth.

Philip James Bailey was born April 22, 1816. His father was a man of literary tastes, author of the "Annals of Nottinghamshire," and for some years proprietor and editor of the Nottingham Mercury. Bailey studied, but did not graduate, at Glasgow; he was called to the bar, but did not practise. He wrote "Festus," and published it anonymously in 1839. Pickering was the publisher. The first edition was printed in Manchester, where Bailey was then living; the second edition in London, in 1845, with the author's name on the title-page.

"Festus" was received with enthusiasm. "A most remarkable and magnificent production," said Bulwer Lytton, and Mary Howitt declared, "There is no more enthusiastic admirer of 'Festus' than myself." Ebenezer Elliott's opinion was that it "contains poetry enough to set up fifty poets." When the second edition appeared, Tennyson told Fitzgerald to read it: "You will most likely find it a great bore, but there are really very grand things in 'Festus.'" The New England Dial was as enthusiastic as any: "In boldness of conception and delicate touches of nature—wild passion, 'Festus' is unsurpassed. It speaks from soul to soul."

There have been eleven editions in England, and more than twice that number in America. In 1889 the author brought out a jubilee edition, with a great part of other poems he had published incorporated, and the result was a poem of stupendous length. If anyone should now attempt to read it, Tennyson's prediction to Fitzgerald would doubtless come true, but last year Mr. Albert Broadbent, of Manchester, issued a little threepenny "Festus Treasury" of selected passages from the poem, which give an ample taste of its quality. Routledge was the publisher of the Jubilee Edition.

"Festus" is the Faust of an ardent young Transcendentalist, a Faust who was tried but not found wanting by his Lucifer. The poem has little dramatic power, but is an out-pouring of the author's mind, declaring, as he himself said, "a belief in the benignant providence of God, in the immortality of the soul, in the harmonised gospel of reason and faith combined, in the just, discriminative, and equitable judgment of the spirit after death by Deity, and in the delightsome duty of aiding upon earth the peaceful, morally progressive, and voluntary self-evolution of humanity as one brotherhood."

It was undoubtedly a very remarkable production for so young a man, and if, instead of growing more diffuse, he could have laboured to concentrate its thought and perfect its form, it might have made a great poem.

As a fair example of the verse we may quote the following passages from the prayer of Festus in the market-place:—

Grant us, O God! that in Thy holy love
The universal people of the world
May grow more great and happy every day;
Mightier, wiser, humbler, too, towards Thee.
And that all ranks, all classes, callings, states
Of life, so far as such seem right to Thee,
May mingle into one, like sister trees,
And so in one stem flourish; that all laws
And powers of government be based and used
In good, and for the people's sake; that each
May feel himself of consequence to all,
And act as though all saw him; that the whole,
The mass of every nation, may so do
As is most worthy of the next to God;
For a whole people's souls, each one worth more
Than a mere world of matter, make, combined,
A something godlike, something like to Thee.

. . . . . .

And we pray
That men may rule themselves in faith in God
In charity to each other, and in hope
Of their own soul's salvation: that the mass,
The millions in all nations, may be trained,
From their youth upwards, in a nobler mode,
To loftier and more liberal ends. We pray
Above all things, Lord! that all men be free
From bondage, whether of the mind or body;
The bondage of religious bigotry,
And bald antiquity; servility
Of thought or speech to rank and power; be all
Free as they ought to be in mind and soul,
As well as by state-birth right; and that Mind,
Time's giant pupil, may right soon attain
Majority, and speak and act for himself.
Incline Thou to our prayers, and grant, O Lord!
That all may have enough, and some safe mean
Of worldly goods and honours, by degrees,
Take place, if practicable, in the fitness
And fulness of Thy time. And we beseech Thee
That truth no more be gagged, nor conscience dungeoned,
Nor science be impeached of godlessness;
Nor faith be circumscribed, which as to Thee,
And the soul's self affairs, is infinite;
But that all men may have due liberty
To speak an honest mind, in every land;
Encouragement to study, leave to act
As conscience orders.

The patient explorer will find in "Festus" many things well said, and sentences which he will be glad to remember for their fine sentiment, simply expressed. Here we will add only three brief quotations, the last of which is the one for the sake of which Bailey is likely to be really remembered:—

Who so speaks
The soul of kindness, speaks the mind of God;
For nature is all kind, and all He made.
Justice and power are attributes of God,
But love His essence.

True, honest life,
Holy and simple; peace; a cheerful faith
In God; and nothing spent not purely earned.

We live in deeds, not years; in thoughts, not breaths;
In feelings, not in figures on a dial.
We should count time by heart-throbs. He most lives
Who thinks most, feels the noblest, acts the best.
Life's but a means unto an end; that end,
To those who dwell in Him, He most in them,
Beginning, mean and end to all things, God.

THE WRITINGS OF H. W. DRESSER.

II.

To bring philosophy to the test of experience—to show that "the real includes the ideal in the actual process of realisation," is the brave intent of Mr. Dresser's books. He meets the various questions which religion and science and social life inevitably raise, and discusses them in all intellectual seriousness. And then, taking yet higher ground, he asks us to consider them as they appear to the mind in those calm moments of insight when, withdrawn from the tumult of affairs, and of our own restless thoughts, we look out upon the world with steady and untroubled gaze. One is reminded of Socrates in the Republic, arguing much of many things; but ever hoping to reach, with Glaucon and Adeimantus, his comrades in debate, the clear sunlit heights where, for them, the eternal beauty of truth shall shine, to give them the joy of real knowledge. The vision granted thus, in the hour of insight, is, for each one, our modern seer holds, his own perception of the ideal in its relation to the real, and should be henceforth trusted and fearlessly lived by, here in the actual world. Reason is much, but intuition is more; and that which we see, in the great calm moods of the soul, is that which is true, for us, and to be accepted as the law and the inspiration of life—as the secret of strength and happiness and repose.

There is nothing new in this. It is what we all say if we have taken life with any noble seriousness and wise intent. The difficulty is, with most, to reach those heights of quiet and serene vision, and then, in the stress and tumult of affairs, to be just to that vision, and keep its light undimmed. And it is here that Mr. Dresser's writings help us and may prove of lasting value. There is in them what I will venture to call a glow of practical philosophic inspiration, which gives them a unique interest and significance. He writes as one who has made his own peace with life as a whole, and found his own line of action amid the stress of human things. His is the calm strong utterance of a balanced soul—the voice of one telling simply and nobly the truth which has become as daily bread to his own spirit. It is this that makes him worth reading.

I have said that his fundamental position is not new or strange; it is the doctrine of the Divine Immanence—the simple yet sublime faith that one universal spirit pervades and informs all existence. The reasons for this faith are given with the freshness and simplicity of an earnest thinker, and the metaphysics of his argument will be found stated in terms which the plain man can easily master if he cares. But the ultimate assurance is to be sought in the direct deliverance of consciousness when the mind is lifted to that mood of "wise passiveness" wherein it may be greatly receptive of truth. Let me give some illustration of his manner of presenting this deeper realisation of faith in things unseen.

He has been discussing the questions raised by scientific materialism, and has shown that its final rest in a doctrine of the Unknowable cannot be maintained. We are conscious of a Reality within and behind all phenomena, which ever is, and which, in all our knowledge, must be in part revealed, however much also, and in greater part, concealed.

Reason, pushed to its utmost limits in the profoundest moments of scepticism, thus assures us of the existence of an ultimate reality whose wisdom, although far transcending our own, yet includes it, leaving no room for absolute doubt.

Then we are taken to the higher ground:—

Sometimes, in a moment of unusual stillness, one rises wholly above the earthly or personal self to the eternal, causeless and spaceless realm, where infinite peace abides. One can hardly tell how the experience begins; all descriptions of it and of what one perceives there seem utterly inadequate, cold and prosaic. Yet no moment of life seems more real than this, none so near the soul-life or dreamless experience which we sometimes feel is to be ours in the future; and no experience leaves a more lasting impression. For one is no longer the mere finite self seeking to fit incongruous and fugitive facts into the mosaic of rational truth. These rare moments seldom come when they are voluntarily sought. But a Somewhat seeks us, something ineffable draws the attention away from the cares and inclinations of finite life for a few moments of calmest rest in intimate nearness to the life of infinite wisdom and perfect love. It is then that one has some sense of life's meaning as a well-ordered whole, as one surveys a fair landscape from a commanding mountain height, looking far beyond the narrow vales of doubt and despair. One sees that the whole is beautiful just because the landscape possesses its varied configurations, because man is given every opportunity to doubt, to sin, to defeat the moral and spiritual purposes for which he is born. One believes it inevitable that there should be but one ultimate energy, one final wisdom, love, and goodness; for one sees the tendency of all facts, of all lives, all purposes, to refer to and be completed in the Life which knows neither beginning nor ending, the great infrangible Whole where the finite will is essential to the will of infinite love. One seems to penetrate to the very heart of this deepest Essence, perceiving its life, its meaning, its purpose, both in its transcendent and in its manifested sense as the realising energy of our world. One understands that, unless there were such a universe, with its paradoxes of sin and suffering, and the perpetual flow of events which on the human side seem so mysterious, thus bringing ever-varied aspects of the Self before its all-comprehending thought as objects of its unfailing devotion, its life would not be complete. The wisdom or beauty of everything as it is, in this completed sense, is thus brought vividly before the mind. In this one brief glance behind the dream of physical life a flood of light is thrown upon the troublesome problems of our finitude. Thereafter, one foresees, all descriptions of life will seem shortsighted and mean which do not thus view things in the light of their origin, development and outcome as related to the whole.

The great Reality which thus persists and prevails through all appearance, and which reason, grasping the deeper significance of Evolution, perceives to be a unity of law and of resident force, is discovered to the soul, in its hour of insight, as spiritual, and a harmony of life inspired by love. To know how fully and happily Mr. Dresser escapes the dangers of Mysticism and Pantheism, which beset these upland reaches of thought, the chapters on this subject must be read, and they will repay careful reading. His intellectual equipment and his strong sense of the meaning and value of the personal life protect him here. The Universal and Divine is focalised, for him, in the Individual and Human. Man, as the rational and moral child of the all-creative Fatherhood, capable of thought and insight and will, must have a real and intelligible and purposive place in the great drama of the Absolute.

Here, on the one hand, is that Self whom no words can adequately name, whom no thought can grasp, whom no life, no world, seems wholly to reveal, who is no less, but infinitely more, than we mean by the words Person, Universe, Mind, Beauty, Power, Goodness, Spirit, God, Father, or any term that has been rightfully applied to Him in the past. Yet, on the other hand, the finite self is still there, one with, but not identical with, the ineffable Spirit . . . beholding its well-ordered system of self-manifestation.

Avoidance of all confusion between the personal revelation and the living Essence in its entirety indicates the escape from pantheism into a just apprehension of God. Not all of God speaks to the soul within, nor in the world of nature without. Yet all that we have held sacred remains—in its place—not as a complete, but as a partial, revelation; that which is "of" or "from" God, as Swendenborg would put it; that which is not God himself, yet is not independent of Him. . . . As a thought dwells in the mind of the thinker, inseparable from it, yet a distinct object of perception, just because of its precision and contrast, so the soul of man dwells in the life and love, the beauty and wisdom of God, persistently itself, yet never alone.—"The Perfect Whole," pp. 92, 95, 142.

When we come to the practical interest of this discussion and its application to the realities of human life and duty, the writer's firm and fearless grasp of his subject is made very surely manifest. The problems of suffering and sorrow, of health and disease, of moral responsibility, of education, of inward poise and repose amid the conflicting claims and confusions of the external world, are dealt with in the light of this ideal philosophy, and they are dealt with as by one who has really known them and wrestled with them to some purpose. His great contention is that this faith in an eternal order of wisdom and power may become so real to thought and feeling and will as to create a central calm in the soul which can be made effective in all the labour and trouble and conflict of life. The book entitled "The Power of Silence" is mainly concerned with the more practical aspect of the writer's ideal. There is here no attempt to shirk the problem of evil or to treat lightly the dark and terrible realities of human misery and crime. The endeavour is to approach them from the point of view of evolution and the law of progress, always claiming for the soul its right to rest in the great thought of the whole and its own personal relation to the one Spirit by which alone it, and all other forms of life, have come to be. We cannot escape suffering and sin, or elude the difficulties and distresses that pertain inevitably to the finite life. But if this philosophy of the ideal be true, then it should apply to every part and process of the actual, in the common experience of man. It should give us, and should maintain within us, a repose of intellect and heart which no outward events or passing troubles could invade to overthrow. Peace should thus be possible to man, through the faith of reason and insight, which would transform for him his actual world, even while accepting it and its inevitable conditions as they exist for him to-day.

Nor peace that grows by Lethe, scentless flower,
There in white languors to decline and cease;
But peace whose names are also rapture, power,
Clear sight and love: for these are parts of peace.*

Health of body as well as of mind, clearness of discernment whereby to know the wise course of action in perplexing hours, courage to hold to one's purpose in face of all obstructions, and power to resist the impact of disease and sickness depend—so Dresser holds, and declares he has abundant evidence for it—on this inward poise and balance of soul which faith in the unseen wisdom of the whole bestows. That reserve of moral strength which belongs to the man who does not fret against the Nature of Things, who does not propose to "dictate to the Supreme Power" or complain of the actual state of any part of the world as it appears at this particular stage of evolution to which we happen to have come, who leaves what is beyond his reach now, whether of possession or achievement, content with what is possible to-day, yet sure that more will be possible in due season, who has that balance and equipoise of soul which saves from worry, yet also from indifference and ease—this reserve of strength for the real duty and endurance of each hour is what Dresser in his "Power of Silence" pleads for with such ardour of conviction and prowess of faith. He writes as one who has looked on the evils which threaten his country by reason of the stress and overstrenuousness of its life, and has seen that the great need of his age is repose—the serenity of mind which only a great faith in the real world of spirit can give. He calls men to quiet thought and calm vision, knowing well that peace and plenty and power may be found thus, and not otherwise.

"To know how to rest—this is the great need of our hurrying age. We are too intense, too active. We have not yet learned the power and supremacy of the Spirit, nor the value of quiet, systematic thinking. We are unaware of the power and value of a few moments of silence. Yet it is in our periods of receptivity that we grow. . . . Oftentimes, if the way be dark, and we can get no help, it is better to cease all striving, and let the thoughts come as they may, let the Power have us; for there is a divine tendency in events, a tendency in our lives which we can fall back on, which will guide us better than we know, if we listen, laying aside all intensity of thought, and letting the activities settle down to a quiet basis. . . . Silence invites the greatest power in the world, the one Power, the one Life. Let us be still, in the truest and deepest sense of the word, and feel that Power. It is All in all. It knows no space. It knows no time. Its slightest activity is universal and eternal. It surrounds us here and now, in this present life, this beautiful world of nature, of law and order, this inner world of thought and the soul. It is the supreme wisdom and perfect love. . . . Its love and peace are present here with us. Let us then be still. In this one restful, happy moment we have won the peace of eternity, and it is ours for ever."

Reading some of these sentences, we may think that the old quietism of the mystics has, after all, come back to us with a little modern science and philosophy thrown in to win for it some attention in a new world and a critical age. But it is not so. It is a call to rest, only that we may wisely act and nobly rejoice. Man is his own star and must work out his own destiny.

"Life and all it brings him ultimately depends on his own wisdom and the intelligence he puts into it. He is weak and fearful, at the mercy of matter and passion, only so long as he lacks understanding. To know self and overcome it, to know the law and obey it—this is the sum of righteousness; and all that duty demands of us at first is to make the start, to remember Nature's law of growth, and persistently to keep the great end in view."

WORDSWORTH.

IV.

THE WORTH OF MAN.

WORDSWORTH has himself recorded that when his affections were first led

From kindred, friends and playmates, to partake
Love for the human creature's absolute self,

the feeling abounded most

Where sovereign Nature dictated the tasks
And occupations which her beauty adorned, and shepherds were the men that pleased him first, the shepherds of his native hills whose task the winter long was "to wait upon the storms," driving the flocks into sheltering coves at their approach, feeding them when snow is on the ground,

And when the spring
Looks out and all the pastures dance with lambs,
And when the flock with warmer weather climbs
Higher and higher following them upon the mountains. For such a life the shepherd leaves his home at dayspring, and with the companionship of his dog lives among the hills, the fragrant wild thyme beneath his feet; sometimes with the help of his staff he leaps from crag to crag,

And o'er the brawling beds of unbridged streams,
Himself he feels,
In those vast regions where his service lies,
A freeman, wedded to his life of hope
And hazard, and hard labour interchanged
With that majestic indolence so dear
To native man.

Though he must have dimly felt that this creature whom he met on his schoolboy rambles had the common lot as husband, father, that he learned and taught and suffered like the rest

From vice and folly, wretchedness and fear;

yet he saw little and cared less for this: imagination spiritualised his early hero.

I felt his presence in his own domain,
As of a lord and master, or a power,
Or genius, under Nature, under God, Presiding.

The shepherd's form in the landscape added sublimity to the scene and suited well the glory of the setting sun or towered giant-like through the mist.

Thus was man
Ennobled outwardly before my sight,
And thus my heart was early introduced
To an unconscious love and reverence
Of human nature.

Wordsworth considered it as a great advantage that his early impressions of humanity were thus removed from

The weight of meanness, selfish cares,
Coarse manners, vulgar passions, that beat in
On all sides from the ordinary world
In which we traffic, and that men

Did first present themselves thus purified,
Removed, and to a distance that was fit.

His face he considered was thus "turned toward the truth." Imaginatively he beheld man surrounded by Nature, akin to Nature, his occupations determined by his direct dependence on Nature; and he expressed his thankfulness that he had not early intercourse with "the deformities of crowded life."

Humankind in his early imagination were a noble incident of nature.

Nature herself was, at this unripe time,
But secondary to my own pursuits
And animal activities, and all
Their trivial pleasures.

And later, when twenty-two years of his life had passed, and Nature, "prized for her own sake," became his joy, even then

Was man in my affections and regards
Subordinate to her, her visible forms
And viewless agencies: a passion, she,
A rapture often and immediate love
Ever at hand; he, only a delight
Occasional, an accidental grace,
His hour being not yet come.

During the time he was at Cambridge

An idler among academic bowers, and when in London he met with the vulgar light

Of present, actual, superficial life, his perception of humanity was coloured by his study of history and antiquities, and London's actual present impressions of trivial forms

Of houses, pavements, streets, of men, of things, and the "vulgar men" about him, were overcome by the weight of ages, the strong vague sense of the wonderful significance of the capital city in history and its present place in his country's destiny and that of the world.

The human nature to which he belonged and which he reverenced and loved was not "a punctual presence," not the personality of individuals, but "a spirit diffused through time and space." Thus the grossness and triviality and ugliness of the lives of many people he met did not detract much from the general sense of the grandeur of human life built up of all the impressions of man's significance which had been fed by study and observation of buildings and monuments and his abiding conception of man as the supreme manifestation of nature to which he had now easily developed.

Everywhere a vital pulse was felt,
And all the several frames of things, like stars,
Through every magnitude distinguishable,
Shone mutually indebted, or half lost
Each in the other's blaze, a galaxy
Of life and glory. In the midst stood man,
Outwardly, inwardly contemplated,
As, of all visible natures, crown,
As, more than anything we know, instinct
With godhead, and, by reason and by will,
Acknowledging dependency sublime.

The multitudes of the vast city set forth before him the unity of man by their exhibition at times of the movement of a sublime idea among good, bad and indifferent people showing one spirit of conquest over ignorance and vice. Thus amid many scenes of vice and guilt, debasement and misery, he never lost faith in "what we may become." Amid the "busy hum," as throughout his life till then, Nature had led him on.

The world of humankind outweighed not hers
In my habitual thoughts: the scale of love,
Though filling daily, still was light, compared With that in which her mighty objects lay.

The river of life down which Wordsworth smoothly glided during his early years brought him to torrents and cascades when he went to France at the time of the Revolution. He had been born in a poor and homely district, and had never throughout his schooldays met anyone, boy or man, who had been vested with attention or respect on account of wealth or blood; and at the University he found a Republic of letters, where all stood on equal ground, brothers in honour, scholars and gentlemen.

And wealth and titles were in less esteem
Than talents, worth, and prosperous industry.

God's mysterious power in Nature, the fellowship of venerable books, mountain liberty which he felt himself, and the freedom that impressed him in the sturdy shepherds, all helped to make him an enthusiast for "Liberty, Equality and Fraternity." He was ready to fight against the poverty and misery of the world, and he carried with him the vague but strong feeling for humanity as a whole, and was ready to sacrifice everything personal to himself for the sake of Freedom for the people. His love for a generalised humanity suffered shock when his own country turned traitor to the cause he held divine and her own, and leaders of the Revolution proved weak and libertine and lacking in principle, while the opponents of liberty had in their selfishness of interest the cohesion which was lacking among those who were pledged to the service of humanity. He sorrowed on the atrocities when on every side beset with foes,

The goaded land waxed mad: the crimes of few Spread into madness of the many.

In the night time he had "ghastly visions" of despair

And tyranny, and implements of death;
And innocent victims sinking under fear,
And momentary hope, and worn-out prayer,
Each in his separate cell, or penned in crowds
For sacrifice, and struggling with fond mirth
And levity in dungeons, where the dust
Was laid with tears.

This was not vague and sentimental. The shock had come: he had plunged down the cataract, and cross-currents played with him, and his soul was troubled indeed, not for his own fancies or imagination, but for the people individually and collectively. Before, he had loved man as, like Nature, an expression of God, and there had been nothing that disturbed seriously his beatitude. Now, man acting contrary to the will of God, opened the way for innumerable experiences of pain and melancholy. Wordsworth was face to face with the reality of sin and misery, and the first consolation and light that came to him as an explanation in some measure of this world problem which seemed overwhelming in its reality was the perception, like that of the Prophets of old, that there was retribution in these terrible events. These were not the harvest of popular government and liberty,

But a terrific reservoir of guilt
And ignorance filled up from age to age,
That could no longer hold its loathsome charge,
But burst and spread in deluge through the land.

He himself in his earlier mood, an active partisan, with genial feelings, had yet supposed

That throwing off oppression must be work
As well of License as of Liberty, but Liberty to do what we like never got a hold upon him, and he parted company with all who proposed to build up social liberty out of individual license: his indulgence towards that sort of thing did not amount to justification of it in himself; it was no more than an allowance of that strain of influence in the workings of humanity which he looked at imaginatively in his earlier mood.

He became sceptical of nature and man, and saw neither in their wholeness and brotherhood, for a while, and he hoped that he or future time would see

The man to come, parted, as by a gulph
From him who had been,

and at the same time saw the events and shows of outward nature in dis-connection and lost her deeper harmonies.

The sceptical mood was but a phase of no permanence. Knowing much more of the actual character and condition of man, he regained faith in him, but recognised the difficulty of changing him and his condition from what it is to what it ought to be. He gained

A more judicious knowledge of the worth
And dignity of individual man.

Not the generalisation with which his imagination kept company when he joined in the revolutionary enthusiasm,

No composition of the brain, but man
Of whom we read, the man whom we behold
With our own eyes.

Considering the possibilities of this actual human being, he inquires with increased seriousness:

Why is this glorious creature to be found
One only in ten thousand? What one is,
Why may not millions be?

No sudden revolution would change the character of men wholesale and make of the community something different altogether from the individuals of whom the community consisted. General happiness and noble character are attainable only by the education of all towards the ideal of manhood. What was good was not to be judged according to the judgment of the wealthy few who see

By artificial light;

we must not accept generalities framed to be easily understood and to satisfy the narrowness and self-conceit of those who are prosperous or of any section of the people, as if it were true education to know words which, setting forth the outward marks

Whereby society has parted man
From man, neglect the universal heart.

Wordsworth would trust Nature and Human Nature in companionship. He would have every child taught the rudiments of knowledge, that the way might be open for obtaining information and holding converse with great minds, and for expressing what was felt and known; and no education would be an advantage which withdrew the child from play among the ordinary simple and beautiful surroundings of the natural world. It seemed a terrible thing to him that children should be taken from their games and away from country life to work in factories, and hardly less terrible that men and women, fathers and mothers, should be used in like manner, not for any advantage to themselves, but to build up a general prosperity, the "Wealth of Nations."

If it was foolish to expect that a great and sudden upheaval of society would transform men into something altogether different and better than they were before—and this lesson he had learned with a painful struggle—it was equally certain that the general wealth or well-being could not be built up by the degradation of the many. National well-being must be the sum of the well-being of the individuals that made up the nation.

He did not care that the people should have an extensive book education, a knowledge of systems and classifications, but that they should have the elementary knowledge of letters which would enable them to develop as circumstances and ability directed, accompanied by moral and religious influences, and never in separation from the sights and sounds and health-giving presence of Nature. Nor did he expect to bring all to one class level, but desired that there should be all the essentials of happiness for all classes, while his sympathies were with the lowly.

Wordsworth's respect for mankind, his confidence that there is something worthy of regard in every human being, that every child is a child of nature and of God and does not cease to be so as it grows though it go astray, his belief in a divine humanity whose glory and dignity are manifested in the few but are possible in all, are expressed not only in inspired passages of his poetry, but also in his choice of characters to portray. A notable example of this is the Wanderer, who is made the most revered and wise and beneficent personage in the "Excursion"; but throughout his period of deep poetic insight and expression he dwelt upon the life of simple people and depicted the excellence of those who were in no wise distinguished or renowned for their outward position. In his frequent choice of commonplace names and record of what before his time would have been considered very prosaic circumstances and events, we find expressed his love of ordinary humanity. Even when he failed, his effort was to show the poetry and beauty and worth of the common lot; and he did not always fail when his critics said he did. As his success was great where some poured ridicule upon him, judging by artificial standards; it is not surprising that he disregarded criticism when it had some scrap of wisdom in it, and valued poems that have not been much help to the world as highly as those which are immortal.

The Poet of Nature, of God living and revealing Himself in Nature now and always, was also the poet of the dignity and worth of every human being; and his purpose was, as a prophet of Nature, to teach others to love what he loved, and show them how the mind of man becomes

A thousand times more beautiful than the earth
On which he dwells, above this frame of things,
In beauty exalted, as it is itself
Of quality and fabric more divine.

PRIESTLEY PRIME.

KEEPING THE FAMILY.

From the "Christian Register."

RICHTER insisted that the school was nothing but a supplement, or a supplementary form of the family; and when he undertook to establish the kindergarten, he insisted that it was strictly a family evolution. Its intent was not to take children away from home, but to help those mothers who were unable to fulfil their home obligations. His purpose was to educate whole families, parents as well as children, in order to make nobler homes. Harris, our United States Commissioner of Education, uses almost the same language when he says "the school is a supplement of the family." Nothing should destroy or weaken the family relation. No phase of social life should intrude on or weaken family life. The State came out of the family, and is in all ways an enlargement of family functioning. The Church has no real end but to save the family. Its original purpose was to draw together the deceased members and the living members in a holy fellowship. Religion bound together the living and the dead, and perpetuated the love of kin. Its services were family services. Any social organism not based on the family is illogical and dangerous. Whatever else we do, we must keep the family clean, healthy and intact, or our government and our Church alike go to pieces. With the family bond weakened and the family relation divested of its sacredness, there is no confidence in community or in the State. The most unnatural Church is a sectarian Church, but the most historically true Church is a coalescence of families for common service. The old town church was, therefore, as natural for spiritual purposes as the town meeting was for political purposes.

But it is in this line that the school has been the most biassed of all our social functionings. The early English school was a matter of the household, and the public school was simply a coalescence or co-operation of several families in care of some one member of the community. It was intended to supply what the average home could not. It was in the completest sense of the word a family supplement. No nation ever existed in ancient or in modern history which did not give the first seven years of life to the care of the mother, the next seven to the father, and the next seven to the community or State. Our primary schools were not intended to take the child away from the mother or to release her from her duty. Neither were our secondary schools intended to discharge the father of his family obligations. Our public schools do not constitute an organisation by themselves any more than do our Churches. They should be considered as standing for and sustaining the family instead of supplanting it.

Harriet Martineau was probably the ablest woman of the nineteenth century. In her "Household Education" she says:—"Every member of the household—children, servants, or apprentices—every inmate of the dwelling must have a share in the family education." She insisted that the differentiation of the school and Church from the family should not be so complete as to render the family effete, a mere breeding-place, while the house became a workshop. She would have every member of the family a real member, as the limbs are members of the body. "Every member of the family must be a member of the domestic school of instruction, and must know that he is such." In other words, education is a family matter, and religion is a family matter by no means to be delegated permanently and altogether to an outside organism. Our modern ideas are inclined to ignore the family. We try to begin education with the school itself. The school invades the rights of the family, and forbids the duties of the mother. The reconstructed school will do nothing of this sort. It will emphasise home instruction, and it will permit no parent to shirk responsibility.

To emphasise the family is an obligation that at present is most insistent. We have come to disbelieve in the ability of the family to judge wisely of its separate members or to fulfil natural obligations in the way of instruction. Is the family a failure? Did nature blunder? We believe that nothing can take the place of the family: first, in apprehending the idiosyncrasies of children; second, in setting life ideals; third, in safeguarding from evil influences; fourth, in establishing guiding principles; and, fifth, working these principles into characters. Ask any man of moral force to what he owes his power, and it will be a rare case that does not attribute effective manhood to home example, home precept, and home ideals. Miss Martineau pictures the complete family as advancing together, in equal companionship, toward the great object of human existence; that is, "the perfecting of each individual within its limits." These individuals are no longer all under the same roof. One may be in the distant town, another in a far country; yet they remain one household, living in full confidence and sympathy, though their eyes may seldom meet, and a clasp of the hand may be a rare luxury. "The deepest impressions received in life are those imparted to the sensitive mind of childhood; yet the mature reverence and affection of a manly mind are excited more efficaciously when the active members of a household see their grey-haired parents looking up to nature, and reaching after truth and right, with the humblest trust and earnest docility." It would be well if this little book of Miss Martineau could be republished, and become a household factor—a stimulus to the restored family. We believe that what is to-day wanted is not more socialistic government, but more family life and family independence and family honour.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Aberdeen.—The following note is from the People's Journal:—"The meetings conducted by the Rev. A. Webster on Sunday evenings on the Broad Hill are, in some respects, the most remarkable of their kind held in the city. Every summer during his ministry he has kept them going, and the audiences have sometimes been very large. Mr. Webster is dealing with objections to Unitarian teaching. He usually speaks for forty-five minutes, and gives equal time for questions. Mr. Webster makes a point of informing his hearers as to the course of the 'Higher Criticism,' and as expositions of advanced religious rationalism his addreses are unique."

Astley.—Harvest Thanksgiving Services were held on Sunday, the Rev. P. Holt being the preacher. The singing was led by an augmented choir. Larger congregations were present than on former occasions, and increased collections were taken. A fruit banquet was held on Monday evening, at which there was a good attendance.

Crewkerne.—On Sunday last the Sunday-school anniversary took place. Mr. S. W. Wright, of Devonport, conducted the services, and preached two very appropriate sermons to appreciative congregations, the chapel in the evening being crowded. The scholars, assisted by the chapel choir, sang special music in a manner highly creditable to them.

Doncaster.—Last Sunday evening, at the close of the service, a meeting was held to give the good wishes of the congregation to Miss Emily Cruse, who, as the winner of a King's Scholarship, is leaving Doncaster for Darlington to pursue her studies at the Training College for Teachers in that town. In recognition of Miss Cruse's devotion to the work of the church and Sunday-school, the presentation of a dressing-bag was made to her by the Rev. Halliwell Thomas, on behalf of the congregation.

Glasgow: St. Vincent-street.—A social meeting of this congregation was held on the 5th inst. in connection with the introduction of the electric light. After the light had been switched on by Mrs. T. Ballantyne, the chair was taken by Mr. Stewart, President of the Managing Committee, supported by the Rev. J. Forrest, and others. The Chairman stated that the church had now been reslated, the interior repainted, the electric light installed, and a number of other improvements carried out. Great satisfaction had been expressed with the whole of the improvements, which had been completed at a cost of £225. Mr. Forrest afterwards spoke gratefully of the willing support received from the Ladies' Sewing Society and from various members of the congregation in contributing a large proportion of the funds. The choir, in the course of the evening, rendered a number of anthems and solos, the whole proceedings throughout being of a very cordial and satisfactory nature. On Sunday last formal re-opening services were held, when, in the evening, the electric light was used for the first time during worship. The Rev. J. Forrest preached in the morning on "Our Purpose as a Free Religious Society," and in the evening dealt with the question, "Which is the Right Religion?" The discourses were intently listened to by large congregations. Liberal collections were made on behalf of the repairs fund, and it may be stated that nearly the whole amount required has now been raised by the members of the congregation themselves.

Gloucester.—A meeting to consider the Education Bill was held on Tuesday evening at Woodcroft, near Chepstow. The chair was taken by Mr. W. Moxon Fuller, and the meeting was addressed by Sir Charles Dilke, M.P., the Rev. Walter Lloyd, and Mr. J. W. Probyn, C.C. A letter was received from the Bishop of Hereford (who had been expected) regretting his absence and enunciating the views upon the question which he has already made public. A resolution condemning the Bill was carried unanimously; as was also a vote of thanks to Mrs. Price, of Pen Moel, for the use of the hall in which the meeting was held.

Hull (Induction of the Rev. F. H. Vaughan, B.A.).—A service for the induction of the Rev. F. H. Vaughan as minister of the Park-street Church was held on Tuesday afternoon, conducted in the first instance by the Rev. Charles Hargrove, of Leeds, in place of the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, of Bristol, who was prevented from being present. After the singing of "Now thank we all our God," prayer, and the reading of the lesson, Mr. Hargrove extended the right hand of fellowship to the new minister. It gave him the greatest pleasure, he said, to welcome Mr. Vaughan to that large company of ministers of religion, which included the Archbishop of Canterbury, the subject nearest to the King, and the lowliest captain in the Salvation Army. The preachers differed very much amongst themselves, but all stood as witnesses of the higher life and the call of God. As one who had for forty years enlisted in the ranks of the ministry, he welcomed Mr. Vaughan to those ranks, and to that little body of Unitarian ministers of the country, and more especially of Yorkshire. They might be few and insignificant, but all they had to ask was were they doing the duty that God had assigned to them, and speaking His word, which was given to them to speak? For their own part they had hearty good-will for all, and rejoiced to hold a place in the Catholic Church of all those throughout the world who strove after God and His kingdom. Mr. S. Harris gave expression to the congregation's recognition and welcome to their new minister, which Mr. Vaughan acknowledged in a few modest and earnest words. After a prayer of dedication, offered by the Rev. Joseph Wain, and the anthem "God is a Spirit," the Rev. Dr. Drummond, Principal of Manchester College, Oxford, delivered an earnest and eloquent charge to the minister. He said that preaching without self-sacrifice could never touch the conscience or the heart. Preaching was not to gain a reputation but to vanquish sin; not to draw crowds together to admire the rhetoric of the preacher, but to augment the moral and spiritual force in society. The minister did not preach himself, but effaced himself that the Divine Spirit might reach the hearts of his hearers, and God alone be glorified in every soul. They could not be Christians by attending to any observances, or assuming the outward garb of holiness, or professing holiness, which never rose above the level of dry intellectual formula, but only by possessing a heavenly and Christ-like mind. If ministers could not feed men's souls with the bread of life from heaven they might as well close their chapels, but if in simplicity they spoke what they had seen and knew, some would receive and find in Christianity a Lord who ruled only that He might emancipate. For the sake of the very men whom they would serve they could not consent for one moment to palter with the truth or lower the standard of right, and if they were ever misunderstood and incurred undeserved odium, so be it. They stood before a supreme Judge, and Him they could not disobey. A charge to the congregation was then given by the Rev. Alexander Gordon, and at the conclusion of the service tea was served in the schoolroom, followed by a welcome meeting, at which Mr. S. Harris presided. Addresses full of hearty encouragement and hope for the future of Mr. Vaughan and the members of the church were delivered by the Revs. C. Hargrove, Roger Smythe, John Dale, Dendy Agate, Alexander Gordon, Dr. Drummond, C. B. Upton, and J. Wain, and the meeting was brought to a close by a few words expressive of sincere welcome from the chairman, the Superintendent of the Sunday-school, and representatives of the various societies connected with the church.

London: Plumstead.—On Sunday, Aug. 31, after evening service, a meeting of this congregation was held, at which a presentation on the occasion of her approaching marriage and departure from the neighbourhood was made to Miss Ada Burrows, who for more than eight years has been voluntary organist of the church. The presentation, which was made by the Rev. L. Jenkins Jones, on behalf of the congregation, consisted of a massive dining-room clock, and a salad bowl in carved oak and silver. Mr. Jones spoke very warmly of the value of the services rendered by Miss Burrows to the church, and offered to her their very cordial good wishes for the future. The choir and Sunday-school also made gifts to Miss Burrows, who acknowledged the presentation with much feeling.

Rawtenstall.—The Rev. Jenkyn Thomas, formerly of Pendleton, commenced his ministry on Sunday last under auspicious circumstances. Large congregations assembled morning and evening, and his practical discourses—in the morning, "Feed the Church of God"; in the evening, "A House of Prayer"—were greatly appreciated. The pulpit and communion were beautifully decked with flowers. The choir sang special music, the anthem, "Praise God in His Holiness," being finely rendered. A public welcome conversazione will take place on Sept. 30 to inaugurate Mr. Thomas's ministry.

Stockton-on-Tees.—On Saturday, Aug. 31, Mr. and Mrs. G. R. Wright invited the teachers, Sunday scholars, and friends of the church to their farm at Eaglescliffe, and in glorious weather a very enjoyable time was spent.

Stourbridge (Welcome to the Rev. A. H. Thomas, B.A.).—On Friday evening, Sept. 5, a meeting of the congregation of the Presbyterian Chapel was held in the Town Hall to welcome the Rev. A. Hermann Thomas as minister of the chapel, in succession to the Rev. A. W. Timmis, now of Manchester. Mr. Thomas, who completed his course at Manchester College, Oxford, in June, is a son of the Rev. Halliwell Thomas, of Doncaster. The proceedings of the welcome began with a tea, which was well attended, and subsequently a meeting, with something of the character of an induction service, was held. Mr. T. Grosvenor Lee presided, and was supported by the Rev. Dr. Drummond, Principal of Manchester College, and others. The charge to the Rev. A. H. Thomas was delivered by Dr. Drummond, who dwelt upon the responsibilities of the ministry and the congregation, and their duties one to the other. The Rev. H. McKean, of Oldbury, delivered the charge to the congregation. In an address of welcome the chairman briefly narrated the history of Protestant dissent from the days of Luther, and especially as it concerned Unitarianism. Addresses of welcome were given by the Rev. A. H. Shelley, of Cradley, on behalf of the local ministers, and by Mr. A. W. Worthington and Mr. J. T. Short on behalf of the congregation. Replying to these addresses, the Rev. A. H. Thomas thanked Dr. Drummond for his attendance, and the ministers and audience for their welcome. He spoke of the difficulties a young minister felt in taking over the charge of a church, and asked the congregation to bear with him in any shortcomings. The proceedings terminated with a musical programme provided by the organist, Mr. Arthur Woodall.

IN A SPECIAL ARTICLE ON

"WHY MEN AVOID CHURCH,"

"THE DAILY MAIL" says:—

"From the first page to the last of this thoughtful and inspiring little book there is not one word of insistence on the passive acceptation of dogma—an insistence that in the past peopled our own free thought platforms and left only women in our churches. And yet throughout the thirty-six essays of which the volume is composed, there is nothing unscriptural, nothing that any fair-minded person could term unorthodox. It is only that in pondering over life and death the author dares to use the brains with which the Creator has endowed him.

"And how breezy and refreshing are these little articles, with their reconception of the Christ, their spiritual insight, their passion for the good, their ready recognition of the presence of holiness in unlikely places, their cult of beauty, and of the blessed virtue of cheerfulness, and their never-failing optimism. And then their common-sense! After all, that to the average reader is their culminating virtue. The ordinary man as he peruses these essays feels that he is being encouraged to think; begins almost to hope that here he may find a firm foothold for his wavering feet."

has purchased, at a cost of nearly £600, a plot of freehold land, and they now appeal for help to erect a plain, substantial building to serve for all purposes. It is hoped to be able to do this for £1,500, making a total cost of £2,100. The land, thanks to the generosity of Mrs. John Grundy, of Summerseat; Miss S. Scholes Wrigley, of Windermere (on her own and her late mother's behalf), and Mr. R. T. Heape, of Rochdale, is entirely paid for. The Congregation have themselves promised over £300 towards the erection of the building. They carry on the Services and the Sunday School without any grant, and they feel that the remarkable success of their efforts justifies them in asking friends to help them to carry on their work under more favourable circumstances than at present. Their appeal has the full approval of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, the North and East Lancashire Mission, and the North Lancashire and Westmorland Unitarian Association; and the B. and F. U. A. has promised £25 to the Building Fund.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

WE publish this week, as already announced, the first of Mrs. Bosanquet's articles on Questions of Social Economics, "How much can the State do?" Next week we hope to publish the first part of a valuable study of "Professor Huxley as a Scientific and Philosophic Thinker," by Dr. G. Dawes Hicks, of Unity Church, Islington. The first of Professor Poynting's articles is to appear on Oct. 4.

RECENT numbers of De Hervorming, the organ of the Dutch Protestantenbond, have borne witness to the keen interest excited by the application of Miss C. A. E. Cremer, a university graduate in Arts, to be admitted to the ministry of the Gospel in the Dutch Reformed Church. The application was first considered by a committee, which was equally divided and reported to that effect, three members being of opinion that it was desirable that women should be admitted to the ministry, adding nevertheless, that the moment was not opportune for giving legal effect to their wish; the other three, on the contrary, holding that a declaration should at once be made, to the effect that the admission of women was "contrary to the will of God."

ON this report, the matter was debated by the Synod of the Church on July 31, when the finding of the three willing members of the committee was rejected by twelve votes to seven, and the opinion of the other half was affirmed by ten votes to nine, but with an alteration made on the President's suggestion, so that the Synod affirmed the admission of women to the ministry to be, not indeed "contrary to the will of God," but "contrary to Scripture." The Synod, however, would seem to have a strong-minded secretary, for the letter informing Miss Cremer of this decision stated that the Synod declared her application to be contrary to the will of God! De Hervorming, in a comment on the situation, remarks that no one can wonder that the Synod could not at once agree to the admission of women, but that it is sufficiently remarkable that seven out of nineteen members considered it desirable.

THE last of the series of letters on the Education Bill contributed by Dr. Clifford to the Daily News under the title "What is at Stake?" appeared last Saturday, and the letters are to be printed at once as a pamphlet by the National Reform Union. In his last letter Dr. Clifford sums up the whole matter thus :—

I repeat, then, in conclusion, the question with which I started. What is at stake in the war raised by this Education Bill? and I answer :—

1. The primary rights of the people to control their own life, directly and freely, in the indescribably important department of elementary and secondary education.

2. The enjoyment and exercise of full liberty of conscience.

3. The maintenance of constitutional law in the procedure of Government.

4. The efficiency and adequacy of education, sustained by the funds of the people, in what are known as denominational schools.

5. The continuance and extension of the people's schools, and the progressive realisation of the true ideal of State education.

6. The complete equipment of the teaching profession, its deliverance from theological and ecclesiastical tests, and the opening of its doors as a profession, and of its training-schools, to ability, industry, willingness to serve, and citizenhood.

7. The exclusion of women from the ranks of those who may be freely and directly chosen to serve in the administration of national education.

8. The fair fame and augmented serviceableness of the English Church.

9. The stability and growth of our Empire. There is the stake! Let every citizen take the sword and play the man for his country and for the world.

UNDER the title "The Beatific Vision of God" last week's Methodist Times had a warmly appreciative leading article on the Essex Hall Lecture of 1899 by "the well-known, learned and devout Unitarian, Mr. Philip H. Wicksteed." The lecture, our readers will remember, is on "The Religion of Time and the Religion of Eternity," drawing lessons from the contrast between mediæval and modern thought. On this the Methodist Times remarks :—

There are profound differences between us and even so Christian a Unitarian as Mr. Wicksteed, but we do not know that we have ever seen so small a book so full of profound, instructive and edifying truth. We warmly commend it to all intelligent and educated Christians who are capable of reading with discrimination. Mr. Wicksteed bravely faces the fact that "the ideals of the Middle Ages, and more especially of the twelfth, the thirteenth, and the fourteenth centuries, are reasserting their attractive force." Certain developments of the High Church Movement in England are enough to fill thoughtful minds with bewilderment and almost with despair. What do they mean? Are we really going back again to the Middle Ages? To treat this whole movement with the vulgar scorn with which the Church Times treats Protestantism is to be equally foolish and futile. The late Dr. Dale demonstrated his pre-eminence as a theologian by the seriousness with which he recognised and examined the attractions of Romanism. The immensely increased influence of mediæval ideas is shown by the new enthusiasm for Francis of Assisi, the ever widening love of Dante, and the revived study of Thomas Aquinas. Mr. Wicksteed's profound knowledge of Dante has specially qualified him to deal with this perplexing fact. The Renaissance and the Reformation, like all urgently-needed and inevitable reforms in such a world as this, rendered inestimable service to mankind, but practically neglected or forgot some things that cannot be neglected or forgotten without immense loss.

"The Religion of Eternity" our contemporary prefers to describe as "The Beatific Vision of God," so well stated in the opening declaration of the Shorter Catechism as the chief end of man, "to glorify God and to enjoy Him for ever." This we do not perhaps realise so fully as the men of the Middle Ages, but it is no less profoundly true for us than for them.

What is the fundamental point of agreement between the three great Christian teachers of the Middle Ages? What is the supreme attraction of Christianity as they understand it? Aquinas appeals to the intellect, Dante to the imagination, Francis of Assisi to the heart. But they all fundamentally agree with the Shorter Catechism that the end, the ideal of human life, is "to enjoy God for ever." But can it be said that all the Protestant Churches have given in practice due prominence to that central truth? Our best teachers, our most devout preachers and poets, our mystical saints have done so. But will anyone with adequate knowledge maintain that the devotional literature of the last three centuries is as deep and heart-stirring as the devotional literature of the preceding centuries? We have happily escaped from the fatal "other-worldliness" of the misguided Christians who thought that they could best save their own souls by neglecting all their human duties and fleeing to monasteries and nunneries where they developed the worst forms of fanaticism and vice. But there is an opposite extreme into which we, with our practical virtues, are liable to fall. After all, we too, seek a city out of sight, our permanent home is not human society as at present constituted, and our eternal satisfaction is in God.

Not the fear of hell, says the Methodist Times, but love, is the great motive power in religion, that attractive power by which Christ draws all men to himself. The Methodist and the Unitarian will not give the same interpretation to the love of Christ, but they are at one in the profound conviction that "our eternal satisfaction is in God."

ON Sunday, Sept. 14, on the occasion of the British Association meeting, the Rev. R. A. Armstrong preached in All Souls' Church, Belfast, a sermon on "The Faith of Professor Huxley," which is now published as the September number of Sermons for the Day (Liverpool Booksellers' Company, 1d.). The text is Habakkuk ii. 4—"The just shall live by faith"—and the sermon shows with a number of striking citations from Huxley's Life, how he had a veritable faith in the reality and power of truth, and of the justice and beneficence of the Universe. After quoting several passages, concluding with Huxley's declaration that "veracity is the heart of morality," Mr. Armstrong adds:—

Now I say that all this passion for veracity, this absolute loyalty at whatever price to truth, is in itself a life-long act of faith. No one can prove by arguing that it is always best to tell the truth and to believe the truth. There is much that may be said by the mere debater in favour of the profitable deception of others and the pleasant deception of oneself. But deeper than such arguments, more profound than superficial dialectic, lies in the nobler spirits of our kind the unreasoned but intense conviction that truth is best, that all untruthfulness corrupts and degrades, all truthfulness purifies and exalts. And that conviction is a continuous act of faith in the moral structure of the universe and in a moral sanctity outweighing all expediency.

And having further dwelt on Huxley's conviction that "the Divine Government is wholly just," and set his assurance of its beneficence, as expressed to Kingsley, over against a later expression with the remark that it represents "a deeper and more deliberate opinion than the words thrown off in a casual note to Darwin in relation to a passing incident of a comparatively trivial character," Mr. Armstrong continues:—

'I am far indeed from thinking that the contents of Huxley's faith as here revealed are the fullest that are possible to an earnest and intelligent man even though he abjure all self-deception and refuse credence to all doctrine which contradicts sound reason. I believe in God the Father and in his personal and individual love for every child born into the world. But I hold these letters of Huxley to constitute a most notable and instructive illustration of the fact that the "just shall live by his faith," that deeper down than all the reasonings of the intellect on the phenomena of the material world, there is in every good man some underlying faith—some assurance prior to and independent of the more superficial reason, which will be his stay in great trouble and his guide and inspiration in the strenous struggle of life.

The sermon concludes by pointing out the limits of logical demonstration, and the necessity of faith in some fundamental facts for the man of science no less than for religion. In the last paragraph a superfluous "not" has slipped in, but the meaning is clear, that "No man can get away from sundry certainties which are wrought into our common human nature." And further:—

A good man cannot get away from sundry other certainties which make the universe a temple and life a sacrament. And though a good man declare that he knows not God, yet is no small part of the secret of the Lord revealed to him, and the lamp of the unknown God shines about his steps.

THE September number of the Mill Hill Pulpit completes the tenth year of the monthly issue of the Rev. Charles Hargrove's sermons. (To be had from Mr. Charles Stainer, 82, Ravenswood-terrace, Hyde Park, Leeds. Annual subscription, 1s. 6d., post free.) The September sermon on "Sea Tides on Inland Rivers" uses the parable of the tide, felt hundreds of miles from the coast of the great Amazon, to enforce the lesson of the silent intimations of the Spirit, which come to us amid the things of the earth, understood and interpreted by the sensitive soul. The religious impulse is indeed world-wide, but too often "the care of the world and the deceitfulness of the good things of life choke the word, and it becometh unfruitful."

Yet now and again, not twice in the day like the tides, nor once in the week like the Sabbath, but as the wind which bloweth where it listeth and when, comes to us all the witness of the Spirit and the call to the higher life. This earth is not all, nor this life the end of all. The Eternal Spirit "bears witness with our spirit that we are Sons of God," even we, like God spiritual, immortal, superior in our inmost being to the senses which make so imperious a claim upon us, and to Time which takes from us all which the senses reveal.

IN the September English Illustrated will be found an article on Oxford, with some good illustrations, and another on the Rock Temples of Ellora in the native state of Hyderabad. In the Sunday Magazine Miss Stone continues her account of experiences "In the Grip of the Brigands." Under the title "A Model Women's College," Good Words gives an interesting illustrated account of the Royal Holloway College at Egham, built at a cost of £800,000, and opened by Queen Victoria in 1886. There is accommodation for 200 students, and last year 133 were in residence. In Harper Mrs. Humphry Ward's new story, "Lady Rose's Daughter," which began in the May number, approaches a climax in its subtle and extremely interesting study of life "in what passes as the best of English society."

REFERRING to our note of last week on the conflict between the Tradesmen of St. Helens and the local Co-operative Society, a Manchester correspondent writes to justify the action of the Tradesmen on the following ground:—"If the Co-operative Stores were treated as joint-stock companies and paid income-tax on their profits before declaring their dividends, and instead of the present 'exemption' from the tax the exemption were that it be not recoverable on account of the limit of income of its members, there would be no ground of complaint by private traders, who are solely desirous that their competitors should be saddled with the same burdens as themselves."

THE September Seed Sower contains the first part of a most interesting paper on "Pensées Writers," by the Rev. E. L. H. Thomas. Starting from the famous Cartesian oracle, Cogito ergo sum, Mr. Thomas remarks that we cannot help being and we cannot help thinking, however little we may think or be, and then proceeds to describe the writers, who, without using any of the specific literary forms, such as the lyric, the drama, the essay or the novel, collected their thoughts together as "Pensées," Proverbs, Maxims, Meditations or what not. A writer of Pensées "will simply string them together or put them haphazard into a casket."

His method is an unsystematised seeking after wisdom—a philosophy, love of wisdom, but not a system, a theology, thought about God, but not a science. The race of "Pensées" writers perhaps share the "acute sobriety," as Mr. John Morley calls it, of Shaftesbury, one of whsoe "Pensées" is, that "the most ingenious way of becoming foolish is by a system."

There are many other sentences from this paper we should like to quote, but must be content with one more passage, and commend the whole to our readers' attention:—

The cover of my edition of Joubert's "Pensées" is scattered over with golden pansies. "There's pansies, that's for thoughts," and golden pansies for golden thoughts—"elect, precious," select, choice, elegant, "oracular gems," to use a phrase of Milton's. It is just possible that the golden pansies may have some slight allusion, also, to the prize of the Golden Violet awarded in the Floral Games at Toulouse, and its romantic associations with Clémence Isaure and Count Raymond of Toulouse, and where Joubert spent much of his early life. "To glance over Joubert's Pensées,'" said a writer in Macmillan's Magazine of 1852, "is like uncovering a tray of diamonds." It will scarcely be denied, therefore, that we have rich fields, not to say "diamond fields," for investigation and contemplation. "Light," says Joubert, "is the soul of the diamond," and light, we may say, is the soul of these "Pensées." Sometimes, no doubt, the light may in some way be obstructed or obscured, producing a somewhat vague and cloudy aspect, as if reflection had been carried on under difficulties. Such a "Pensée" may be likened rather to the milky iridescence of the opal than to the white light of the diamond. Joubert has himself said, "Fully to understand a grand and beautiful thought requires perhaps as much time as to conceive it."

THE autumnal conference of the United Kingdom Band of Hope Union will be held next week at Newcastle-on-Tyne, when the National Unitarian Temperance Association will be again represented by its treasurer, Councillor F. A. Edwards, F.R.G.S. In connection with the gatherings Mr. Rowland Hill will preach at the Church of the Divine Unity, New Bridge-street, in the morning, and in the afternoon addresses will be given to the scholars, teachers and friends by Mrs. Alec Tweedy and Mr. F. A. Edwards.

MR. G. H. PERRIS, editor of Concord, the monthly organ of the International Arbitration and Peace Association, is to sail to-day (Saturday) from London to Boston, on a short lecturing tour in the States. Mr. Perris will lecture chiefly on various aspects of the International Peace problem and the religious, political and social outlook in England.

QUESTIONS OF SOCIAL ECONOMICS.

I.

HOW MUCH CAN THE STATE DO?

How can we best promote a good life—i.e., a life which shall be healthy, upright and enjoyable—amongst all the members of the community? That is the question to be answered primarily by the study of Social Economics; and it is involved in the many problems which come before us to-day in the shape of "questions." The Housing Question, the Drink Question, the Wages Question, and a score of others are presenting themselves to the social conscience as imperatively demanding an answer; and if the answers are slow to come it is not for want of much earnest seeking.

Extreme Theories Contrasted.

Perhaps the most marked general tendency in the various solutions offered is that towards increasing the sphere of State control and activity, including under this head the work of municipalities and other local government bodies which derive their authority ultimately from the State. In a series of articles entitled "Municipal Socialism," the Times is engaged in calling attention to the dangers and difficulties incident to this tendency, and takes up an attitude of apparently unmitigated hostility to the movement. Its attitude, indeed, seems to be that of the school which maintains—not without some show of justification—that society would get its business done best if everyone minded his own business. "If each before his own door swept, the village would be clean;" and to that end everyone should be left as free as possible both to judge for himself what his business is, and to carry it out as seems best to him. Perhaps the most consistent and forcible exponent of this view (much what the Germans used to call "Manchesterthum,") is Mr. Auberon Herbert; but there are many less articulate than he who cherish the same confidence in the happy coincidence between the interests of each man and those of his neighbours, and the same resentment against social compulsion, especially when it takes the form of rapidly increasing rates and taxes.

In direct opposition to these is the school which maintains that there is no necessary coincidence between the interests of each man and those of his neighbours, that the better able he is to look after himself the more likely he is to do so at the expense of others, and that every individual has duties towards society which he cannot be trusted to fulfil except under compulsion. It is followers of this school who urge that all business is, strictly speaking, public business, and should be managed by the community, instead of being left to individuals to carry on for private profit, and to this end they are consciously or unconsciously pressing forward all kinds of State and municipal enterprise.

The General Mean.

Between these extremes come the mass of people who, perhaps without any clear theory on the matter, maintain in practice a compromise between the two. They cling to individual freedom and enterprise, but are too shrewd not to see that however it might work in a village, it is wasteful and ineffectual in a town for every man to be his own street-sweeper and scavenger; while, on the other hand, they cannot avoid seeing that work which is monopolised by the State (or municipality) is apt to be itself inefficient and without legitimate profit to anyone, and they hold that many, if not all, of the desirable undertakings which individual enterprise is unequal to are nevertheless successfully carried on by voluntary associations of individuals.

Instances in Hospitals and the Work of Housing.

I may illustrate these different degrees of voluntary and compulsory activity by referring to the various kinds of hospital. There is the small private hospital which is the outcome of individual enterprise and carried on for private profit; there are the large public hospitals supported by charitable endowments and subscriptions, and managed by voluntary associations; and, finally, there are the Poor Law infirmaries which are under State control and supported by a compulsory rate.

As another illustration, I may take the provision of houses for the working-classes. For the main part it is still left to the speculative builder, who builds for his own profit. But it is more than half a century since voluntary associations were first formed to provide in London an improved type of accommodation, and these associations still continue and have their latest descendant in the newly-formed Garden City Association. Of late years also the municipalities have been eager to partake in the work, and are building out of public money; and, finally, perhaps the best movement of all has been that of the working-classes to provide houses for themselves with the aid of Building and Co-operative Societies.

Some Public Control Inevitable.

In no case, of course, is the element of public control entirely absent. Everyone who lives in society at all must adapt himself to his fellow-men, and in so doing must conform to general regulations and conventions. But the degree of compulsion exercised differs greatly as between the man who in building of his own free will merely has to conform to certain sanitary regulations, and the man who is compelled to contribute towards the building of houses in which he has no obvious interest. What degree of compulsion, or of public action involving compulsion, is wise and justifiable is the battle now to be fought out, and it is one of the greatest importance for the future.

Present Tendency to Extended State Activity.

For good or for evil, there is no doubt that the tendency to-day is to enlarge in every direction the sphere of State activity, and sometimes—though not necessarily—to diminish that of voluntary enterprise. Whilst Parliament is being reluctantly pushed towards schemes of old age pensions and a minimum wage, municipalities are pressing forward eagerly to undertake the provision of houses, train and tram services, electric lighting, water supply, libraries, cemeteries, slaughter-houses, and even in some cases of quite minor articles of consumption, such as ice. Some of these undertakings are supposed to be on a commercial basis, and to be actually profitable to the ratepayers; others are frankly uncommercial, and justified by their educational value.

Commercial Experiments and their Dangers.

To the extreme opponents who would condemn this extension of State action without a hearing, it is a fair answer to point out that the play of voluntary enterprise has not so far proved sufficient to meet all our difficulties, and that it is at least a legitimate experiment to try whether by taking action in common we cannot devise methods of carrying on the work, compulsory if need be, which shall attain better results. But then it must be borne in mind that such action is experimental; that experiments affecting the well-being of whole communities should not be undertaken too light-heartedly and without careful counting of the cost, especially as they can seldom be reversed; and that they can only be justified by their results.

There are certain very obvious dangers attendant upon the movement, and the Times has done good service in calling attention to some of these. It is an unpleasing picture which it draws of the reckless expenditure of the ratepayers' money upon the personal gratifications of municipal authorities; and even more reprehensible is the occasional practice of making some enterprise appear profitable to the public by charging its expenses to another account. These, it may be urged, are merely accidental evils, and should not be counted against the policy as such; but they are accidents to which business managed in this way is peculiarly liable unless we can ensure its administration by men of a high standard of rectitude and disinterestedness. Perhaps one of the reforms most seriously needed if the movement is to continue is that more men of this type should come forward to take their share in public work, instead of leaving it so much in the hands of less responsible people. Many, no doubt, refrain just because they will have nothing to do with doubtful practices; but it is a finer thing to maintain one's integrity in the pressure of public service than to protect it in retirement.

The Community and its Employés.

One difficulty which is revealing itself lies in the fact that the electorate of municipal bodies consists to a considerable extent of municipal employés, who are quick to discover that by a judicious use of their vote they can do much to influence their own wages and hours of work. It is said that there are 30,000 municipal employés in and around London; and that in Sheffield men are leaving the skilled trades to become tram conductors and street-sweepers. It is a good administrative rule that the employés in a business shall not elect their employers; and there would be no injustice involved if, in order to secure administration for the benefit of the whole community instead of for one section only, it were found necessary to apply this rule to municipal employés.

The Checking of Individual Enterprise.

Another danger incident more especially to municipal trading is that of checking individual enterprise. Even where the State or municipality does not monopolise an industry completely, its powers and its control of public money make it a formidable rival to contend with. Some, of course, would desire to see voluntary enterprise altogether superseded, on the ground that public administration of business is more profitable to the community; but this is a position which it is hard to maintain in the face of past experience. It is a striking fact that even the advantage of working on a large scale is beginning to be claimed by voluntary enterprise, which (e.g.) is prepared to supply electric light from one centre to several towns, as against municipalities which are confined to their own area, and resist intrusion from without. Moreover, we have to reckon with the essential conservatism of public bodies. It is true that in embarking on any business they are likely to do so on the most expensive scale, and with all the latest improvements; but at our present rate of progress the improvements of one year are apt to be the dilapidations of the next; and we never find that public bodies are quick to move forward with the times, or to adapt themselves to the changing needs of the people. This has been strikingly shown in the Housing policy of the London County Council.

Two Points in Conclusion.

There is much more to be said on both sides of the question, and two points I must touch on, however briefly, before closing. The first is, that in counting the cost we must bear in mind that it does not fall entirely upon the well-to-do. We do not perhaps realise how much actual distress may be caused by high rates until we hear of districts in London where crowds of people may be seen outside the town hall (kept in order by the police) who are unable to pay their rates and want some grace allowed. There is no doubt that, either directly, or indirectly through high rents, many of the poorer workers are feeling acutely the pressure caused by the new policy; no doubt also they are feeling some of its advantages.

The second point is that when the State extends its activity not only to managing public business, but also to that most private business of all, the maintenance of individuals and their families, the dangers alluded to above of checking voluntary enterprise and of corrupt administration are greatly increased. But that opens up a whole new chapter of economic considerations, and must be left for a future occasion.

In conclusion, I would suggest that it is not important to try to predetermine any limit to the sphere of State activity, but that it is of the first importance when any extension is proposed to make ourselves acquainted with the circumstances, to form a clear judgment on them, and to elect the best men possible for carrying on our public work.

HELEN BOSANQUET.

NEVER give way to melancholy. Nothing encroaches more. I fight against it vigorously. One great remedy is to take short views of life. Are you happy? Are you likely to remain so till this evening, or next month, or next year? Then why destroy present happiness by a distant misery, which may never come at all, or you may never live to see? For every substantial grief has twenty shadows, and most of them shadows of your own making.—Sydney Smith.

LITERATURE.

MORE ESSAYS BY "J. B."*

IF readers of the Christian World do not know Mr. Brierley they will at least be familiar with "J. B." Others who may come across the man and his work for the first time in the present volume may find some stimulus to their interest in both in learning that by such previous volumes as "Studies of the Soul," "From Philistia," and "Questions for the Free Churches," he has already established a claim to respectful attention.

In the author's interest it is to be regretted that there is no explanation given in note or preface of the manner of the book's composition. Occasional essays upon a variety of things must allow of much "overlapping"; and merely to have stated that this volume is composed of reprints of such occasional essays would have palliated, if not wholly excused, a number of repetitions of phrases and illustrations which would have to tell against a reader's satisfaction with the work in book form. This, however, is a limitation of excellence that goes no deeper than the form of the production; and in other respects this form has much to commend it, for a volume of bright, short essays on such topics as these is more difficult to find than more ponderous tomes.

The ponderous tome cannot be dispensed with; but it should be more extensively popularised, and that is a function books of this kind perform.

"Ourselves and the Universe" is not an attractive title. "We and the Universe" would be worse. Either might be justified could it serve to awaken special interest in the contents. But on the back of a volume which appears at a glance as of Popular Essays, the first feeling produced is one of irritation and annoyance at being summoned by so loud a bell to so slight a feast. A title that raised no false expectations would do more honour to the book. But when we have discounted such elements and come to take stock of the volume on its merits we find, amongst whatever else, much friendly counsel and cheerful companionship.

These are things too rarely found in modern prose to be taken without some special grace of acknowledgment. Cold-blooded analysis and growling cynicism we are somewhat over-weary of; and there still remains to us some instinct for joyousness which welcomes all in sympathy with such an attitude without too curious inquiry as to its logical justification. The cynic indeed has logic on his side. But it is not the least of Mr. Brierley's merits that he does not "travel" in the interests of any firm of Syllogism manufacturers. He may by consequence have this defect of his qualities, that he gives you no points that you can put down in a note-book as new knowledge. But this is a defect shared by the blackbird, a day in the country, a timely glass of water, and most things that are helpful in our tired moments. We cannot dispense with logic all the time; we must come back to it sooner or later, and then we shall shake our heads, no doubt, over the seductions of this pleasant-voiced companionship. But we shall walk less heavily with those other fellows and be less afflicted with the grunting and the growling, from the vivified consciousness that the same world contains also such souls as Mr. Brierley's.

We are heartily at one with Mr. Brierley in his optimism. But we feel that as yet optimism must be its own justification; it cannot be based upon any induction of facts. If life is worth living it is because it must be worth living. To suppose the opposite brings its own refutation in the Euclidian "which is absurd." Our cynical friends, of course, admit the absurdity. Mr. Brierley denies the proposition, and would prove that life is worth living because "any man to-day if he chooses can have the consciousness of God in his own spirit."

That, indeed, were ground sufficient to dignify his span of mortal years to "any man." But is it a fact? We are familiar at Evangelical gatherings with the talk of people which abounds in such expressions as "We got hold of God," "God said to me," "God brought me to see," "Jesus spoke peace to my soul." In Roman Catholic circles we hear similar confessions of familiar intercourse with Mary or one or other of the accredited saints or angels. That these phrases stand for some real psychological experience may well be; but to translate it bluntly into a direct consciousness of God is one of those acts done in the name of religion that still make it necessary to distinguish between the words "truth" and "philosophical truth." Such an expression is true because it represents a valid experience. It is not philosophically true, because it gives to that experience an explanation which it cannot justify. And yet if a man shall thus claim to have "seen the Father" it is not for those less privileged to deny his claim. At the most we dare only caution against misapprehension, and ask of one so claiming, "Are you certain?" For the rest of us it is still by faith, and not by sight, that we must walk.

This is not an isolated instance of a bald assertion doing duty as argument in this book. But we quote only one more; it occurs in the essay on "The Art of Happiness."

An Amiel, when he is forty, may talk of hopes disappointed and of the future as a dreary prospect, but not even an Amiel can do that at twenty.

The pessimism of youth is surely no unfamiliar phenomenon. Those who have had no more immediate experience of it have met it at least in such types as Carlyle intends by his word "Wertherisms."

The book is weakened by a good deal of loose writing of this sort. For a certain type of readers no doubt it is just such writing that commends a book. It conveys an air of assurance; but the popular taste in such matters needs rather to be guided than satisfied.

A pleasing feature in the book is its wealth of literary reference. But this would be of more value if sources were quoted in footnotes, as some at least of the many passages introduced from ancient and modern writers suggest a context that many readers might turn to with interest. Merely to open these side issues, with possibilities to the reader of following out the clues, is to add very considerably to the serviceableness of such a volume. It is perhaps a strong testimonial to our author's literary accuracy that he has given correctly (p. 9) a quotation from St. Paul which, in spite of its familiarity, is almost always given in accordance with the misquotation of a Patristic reference instead of in the actual Pauline phrase.

We hope the book will attain to further editions; for which some condensation and revising of raw places would be a worthy preparation. A few slips of type also on pp. 22, 40, 177, and 330 should be corrected; and on p. 156 either Lyte's name should be substituted for Newman's, or the title of the hymn altered. It is amusing to question whether unconscious association of ideas found in similarity of sound (Lyte and Light) led to the slip in the MS. Is Pilgrimings (p. 8) an improvement upon Pilgrimages? Alexander's is not a fortunate instance (p. 73) of the degradation of old age. He was still a young man when he died. To the statement "the outer has been fitted to the inner" (p. 80) we would suggest a quære.

Not God tempers the breeze to the shorn lamb, but God tempers the shorn lamb to the breeze, is surely the lesson of the Darwinian Book of Genesis.

On the whole, to criticise such a work as this is to destroy it; but to commend it is best to do it justice.

For in these matters one must have in view the requirements of a definite circle of students. For such readers—and they are a vast multitude—this is a kind of book we should gratefully see more of. Its tone is healthy, its style pleasant, its temper courageous and its outlook wide. It should help to break down the prejudices and alarms which keep so many living three centuries behind their times, and awake them to some appreciation of the more glorious liberties that attach to citizenship in (to use a phrase which makes the title of what is perhaps the best as it is also the first essay in the book) A ROOMIER UNIVERSE.

SHORT NOTICES.

Everyman: a Morality Play, in a reprint with modernised spelling and a brief introduction by F. Sidgwick, will be welcomed by those (and they were very many) who were deeply impressed by the recent representations of the play in London, first in St. George's Hall and afterwards at the Imperial Theatre. A little more introduction for the uninstructed would have been better, but may be sought in Ward's "History of English Dramatic Literature" and A. W. Pollard's "English Miracle Plays." Reading the quaint, but somewhat bald text, one realises how much the play owed to the fine acting of "Everyman," especially in the passage where the penalty of wrong-doing is at last accepted with genuine contrition. (A. H. Bullen, 18, Cecil-court, Charing Cross-road. 1s.)

To our store of children's books we are extremely glad to be able to add Elizabeth Fry, the Prisoner's Friend, the story of a beautiful and devoted life simply and earnestly told by Miss J. E. Brown. Taking the life of this beneficent Quaker lady as the subject for lessons to her own Sunday School class, Miss Brown was deeply impressed by the value of the lessons in a life so rich in human interests and so far-reaching in its influence, and thus was happily impelled to throw her narrative into book form, now published by our Sunday School Association. The early life of Elizabeth Gurney in her Norwich home is first described, her awakening to an earnest consecration of her life to good, and after her marriage to Joseph Fry, the wonderful work she accomplished among the Newgate prisoners, and in wider efforts for prison reform. In telling the story Miss Brown makes good use of Mrs. Fry's memoirs, and there are some striking quotations from her more intimate expressions of faith and aspiration, helpful for the lessons which may be based on this little book. It deserves a warm welcome in our homes and schools. (Sunday School Association. 8d.)

The Channel Islands, in the "New Guides" Series, by E. Gallienne-Rôbin and Harold Child, appears to be a good matter-of-fact guide, with necessary information as to communications and places of interest, &c., and maps of each of the principal islands; but we miss a map of the whole group, to show their relative position. However small the scale, such a map seems essential to a good guide. And while we are very ready to belief in the delights of these islands, and especially of Sark, as a holiday resort, with grand rocky coast and glorious sea, we do not find that the guide attracts and quickens that enthusiasm. We have found much more of the atmosphere and fascinations of these islands in Miss Rôbin's stories (published by C. H. Kelly) "At the Leap of San Juan: a Sark Story," and "Jeannette of Jersey," which have the advantage, also, of good illustrations both of the scenery and the people. Miss Rôbin is doubtless aware, as her readers will be, of the weak points of her stories, but they are not without interest; the latter especially has an historical interest, telling of the early introduction of Methodism into Jersey. Another of Miss Rôbin's little books, "Guernsey and Sark Legends and Stories," is published at Guernsey itself. The "Guide" has a general chapter on the history and natural history of the islands, including [a list of notable islanders. Among these, Guernsey claims le Page Renouf, the Egyptologist; and Jersey, two distinguished artists, Millais and Ouless, and the scholar brothers Valpy. (Grant Richards. 2s. net.)

A new edition of George Eliot's Life, as related in her Letters and Journals, arranged and edited by her husband, J. W. Cross, has been issued in two small volumes, tastefully bound in limp cloth. These volumes belong to the "Warwick Edition" of George Eliot's works. The paper is so thin that over six hundred pages go into wonderfully small compass, and yet the type is clear and pleasant for reading. It is a more convenient edition to handle than the old one volume popular edition. (Blackwood. 2s. a volume net.)

An edition of The Mill on the Floss, cheaper even than the "Warwick," is also issued in two volumes, a little smaller in size, but with very good type. (Blackwood. 3s. net.)

Esther Allington; or, A New Investment, by Rose Harrison, hon. organising secretary of the Children's Protection League, is a good Temperance story, with abundant variety of human interest. The heroine is the daughter of a wealthy and good-hearted brewer, and the story tells how she and her brother Victor, when he comes home from Oxford, are gradually brought to realise the dreadful evils of the drink traffic, and the son and heir refuses to enter his father's business. The conflict which ensues, and the tragedy which at last brings the father to work out his son's good purpose, and the daughter's subsequent experiences, are vividly narrated, and the economic and moral teaching, while not unduly hindering the story, is forcibly impressed upon the reader. (Ideal Publishing Union, 33, Paternoster-row. 1s. net.)

The late Dr. Brewer's Reader's Handbook, re-issued in a new and cheaper edition, is a dictionary of "Famous Names in Fiction, Allusions, References, Proverbs, Plots, Stories, and Poems." It is a laborious compilation, full of curious and amusing information. Its very miscellaneous character may be seen from three consecutive entries, where under "Tweedledum and Tweedledee" we find a quotation from some verses by J. Byrom (1691-1763), followed by "Twelfth Night," with an account of Shakespeare's plot, and "The Twelve," with a list of the Apostles. Seven pages are devoted to the "Errors of Authors." On the page immediately preceding these the author speaks of the "Erl-King" as haunting "The Black Forest of Thuringia"! (Chatto and Windus. 3s. 6d.)

Another curious book of reference, 5,000 Facts and Fancies, by W. H. P. Phyfe, comes to us from across the Atlantic. It is a "Cyclopædia of important, curious, quaint, and unique information in History, Literature, Science, Art and Nature." From "Aaron's Breastplate" and "Roman Walls" to "Bimetallism," "Fifth-avenue," and "Mugwump," the miscellaneous information ranges. Doubtless there are many more 5,000 facts and fancies in the world, but that does not make those included in this substantial volume less interesting. (G. P. Putnam's Sons. 21s.)

KINGSLEY'S SNOWDON AND TO-DAY'S.

" . . . a little botanist, terrifically learned fellow. He and his father before him knew about this fern which grows nowhere else in Great Britain. One season he must bring it down in a pill-box, thinking to let the visitors rest their eyes upon it for once before they died. All excitement and eagerness he goes up to a blunt old gentleman and opens the precious pill-box, saying 'Have you ever seen an *Atroxis mellamina?' 'No, sir, I haven't, and what's more I don't want to—not the least bit interested.' And then, 'pon my word, he hunts me up. I hadn't a notion what he was up to, but when I saw the pill-box I decided that the diminutive gentleman had secured a beetle or some other entomological specimen. 'Have you ever seen an Atroxis mellamina?' said he. 'Yes, rather,' said I, hoping to score; 'a magnificent fellow, isn't he?'"

While this story is being told I am waiting for my breakfast and wandering round the room after the manner of a new-comer. I had come up the night before and had only time to unstrap my luggage and dive into bed. A token of other days soon meets my eyes. It is a frame containing three photographs—Tom Hughes, Charles Kingsley, and, probably, Tom Taylor. For this is, and yet is not, the famous Welsh inn, "the divinest pig-sty beneath the canopy," of Kingsley's day. The landlord is no longer bluff Harry Owen, portrayed with such a gusto of affectionate regard in "Two Years Ago." Nor does the landlady patch certain garments (to quote Tom Hughes's verse)—

With flannel of three colours—she hadn't got no other.

The old spacious kitchen has to be looked for to be seen. There is now nothing isolated or remote about this heart of the heights. As you walk the roads to Capel Curig, Beddgelert, or Llanberis you suddenly hear the simultaneous put-t-t-t and grrr-rr-rr of a motor-car, and the next instant it swings rapidly round the bend in lordly insolence of black and yellow stripes, passes and swiftly disappears, emitting the stench of Stygian exhalations.

The "inn" is busy with alert waitresses who still know how to speak Welsh prettily to each other, and are, as I try to believe, specially attentive to me because I address them in that immemorial tongue. It is a rare old hostlery fragrant with the atmosphere of easy and innocent self-indulgence. The "new management" seems to succeed in the effort to provide city conveniences while maintaining the associations of a traditionary day. It would be for all the world like being in the best hotel of a first-class agricultural market town were it not that here are harboured some score of guests—guests whom you have met before in Switzerland, at the Lakes, everywhere, and will meet again every holiday season until you pass into a less monotonous and tourist-ridden world. You forget, of course, that you are yourself a tourist, and look about you with the protesting air of one that declines identity with so dubious an assembly. Then you observe with some amusement that every new-comer does the same, and you accordingly learn to display self-possession by surrendering yourself to the comedy and becoming thereby merged in the common life of the hotel.

* I advise the reader not to look this up.

Besides, we are not all British tourists. At least, one or two celebrated mountaineers with an Alpine reputation redeem the company from smug common-place. To the well-concealed merriment of the initiated these expert climbers encourage the garrulous boasting of green amateurs who are flushed with their recent triumph over the "Parson's Nose." Hence much tall talking about the Lliwedd gullies and chimneys, nice bits of rockwork, solid hand-holds, frightfully friable surfaces, and tremendous back-work.

One visitor, an old hand as you find out later, can tell interesting stories of the good old days when, as a youth, he sat with the immortals on Harry Owen's settle and watched them, not without awe, puffing Olympian clouds out of long churchwardens.

A day or two of rain and then—glorious vision!—the range stands out before us with miraculous nearness.

One has only to take a few steps up the road to see Crib-goch, its fissures all smoothed out by an illusive haze, gleaming like a polished piece of steel. This is Sunday, the one day in all the week on which to ascend Snowdon, for the trains are not running, and the summit will have standing room for all. I took the well-known upper track which affords an unsurpassable view of Llanberis Pass, showing its whole length enfolded by rugged heights, the road a wriggling riband below, and the lakes far off shimmering in the morning sunshine.

It is a marvellous day. The haze disappears and Snowdon towers close at hand with every sinuous crack strangely conspicuous, and the streaks of white quartz glistening like tiny torrents and cascades beneath the blinding light. Nearing the summit one can see the black ridge against a radiant sky with clean-cut rock projections—sentinels that grin like diabolic gargoyles of some titanic temple. I reach the topmost ridge to learn that there may be intense clearness on one side and curdling clouds on the other. A few more minutes and I am sitting on the ordnance cairn breathlessly surveying the wide impressive panorama of cloud and sea and land which roll around in perpetual and bewildering motion. I am exceptionally favoured, for this is one day in a thousand—as indeed is every day! I watch the revolving clouds boiling and seething up from below. It seems as if the watcher were poised in the centre of an earthless world—all sky below, above, around. I have stood on the Alps at a height of 13,000, not 3,000, feet, but I have never seen anything like this. The mid-day sun strikes vertically down on a tumbling sea of mist. The ascending vapours wreathe and weave themselves into fantastic shapes, skeins of white wool, wonderful networks of many tinted threads, and wild tangles of gauzy veils. Suddenly there is a rift and a break of bluey transparence through which can be seen, as through a window of some palace of cloud, the distant earth. On my left is Llyn Llydaw, green as Lac Thun. In front Tremadoc Bay, half hidden in a faint fog, which works confusion of sea and sky; and the river making a broad streak of winding light. On my right are Llyn Quellyn and other lakes and tarns visible for an instant, then hidden again in the fleecy depths of the under-sky. Each moment has its perfect effect never to be repeated. The sun shines fervently on the lower clouds which break up and move about with luxurious undulations and delicate wisps of white. At some attenuated spot you see revealed the pale blue outline of a neighbouring range. Patches of inky black shadow in full contrast with patches of dazzling sunlight dapple and speckle the whole visible earth with a wondrous mystical loveliness; and there, thousands of feet below, are the vivid green valleys dotted with houses, and every tree and hedge distinct. You breathe in the outlook as if it were an atmosphere.

The sheds and flagstaffs and ginger-beer-drinking tourists are forgotten. It matters not that on a single record day over 1,700 people will ascend this peak and that 450 will stand here together a hustling mass. There yet belongs to the summit an element of the eternal which man does not make and cannot mar. We may still brood here and contemplate the tumultuous ocean of breaking crests of rock and swelling billows of grassy heights and understand the words of the ancient—"I will lift up mine eyes to the mountains whence cometh my strength."

AN ECHO FROM THE SEAT OF WAR.

The Rev. C. J. Street, of Bolton, sends us the following extract from a letter received by him from Miss Bertha Sutcliffe, a nursing sister at the Burgher Camp, Krugersdorp, Transvaal, feeling that it will be interesting and instructive to our readers. The letter is dated July 27 last:—

"Many people have already 'treked' to their farms; but, although families are leaving every day, the camp gets no smaller, as the people are returning from Natal now, and many of the prisoners have already come in. We had 400 men come in from the commando in one day the week after peace was proclaimed.

"It was a touching sight—one never to be forgotten—to see the men come in; hundreds of the burghers, men, women, and children standing down by the 'spruit' (the entrance to the camp) to welcome the men in. Some looked for father or husband, who came not, while others met friends whom they had mourned as dead. One man came, and was only just in time to stop his wife being married to another man; he had been reported dead eighteen months before; she was very pleased to see her husband home again!

"You will perhaps remember my telling you of a woman who had lost five children in camp. Soon after I wrote to you the woman herself was very ill, and while she was too ill to be told, the news came that her husband had been killed. When she recovered she was told, and mourned him bitterly; but I am glad to say that he also turned up. In the midst of the rejoicing I saw one man standing alone, with tears streaming down his cheeks. I went up and asked him if he had no one to welcome him. He burst out crying, and told me he had come expecting to find wife and three children, but he found that they were all dead.

"Many men came up to us in camp on that and the following days, and shook hands and thanked us heartily for the care which had been bestowed upon their children. One Dutch woman came up to the place where we were still waiting for the men to come, and said that when her 'maan' came she should let him kiss 'zuster' before he kissed her, which I think was one of the greatest compliments she could have paid me.

"Every one of the people who have gone home, although pleased to go home to their farms, say that they will miss us very much. Several people who are otherwise quite ready to go are remaining in camp for some time longer in order to receive medical attendance. Some of my people went away last week, and they said that if the baby was taken ill when they were on the farm, they should send a horse at once to fetch sister. I am enclosing a copy of a letter which I received yesterday, supposed to be written by the baby five months old. It is only one case, but it is typical of the feeling towards us throughout the camp.

"We have no fear now of anything being hidden away from us. The other day a little chap of five dragged his little brother of three up to the out-patient tent for sister to see his sore mouth, and when the little one was going to cry, he assured him that sister would make all right. Another boy we found was coming up from the town every day because he had heard that things were done well in camp.

"We have had many serious accidents lately, but one and all are marched up to the tent. To-day we had a man run over. He limped back to his mother's tent, where a kind neighbour was going to offer advice and dress with some old family ointment. You would have smiled at the look of disdain which the young man's mother gave as she flung away the ointment, and said that none must touch the leg but the doctor or the nurse."

In a previous letter, dated March 31, before the war was over, Sister Bertha Sutcliffe said :—

"This camp can scarcely be taken as a criterion, as it is, I believe, a model camp, and now our death-rate is the smallest of any camp. Last month we had only five deaths in the whole camp (4,000 people). . . . The worst of the sickness was over when we got here. At one time the suffering must have been dreadful even here. I don't know what it must have been in some of the camps. One woman, whose child died in my camp a few days after I came, told me she came into the camp with ten children, and now she has only two left. Another, whose two boys were very ill, begged me to save them ; she had already buried five. I am glad to say they got well. Another woman had buried twenty-three near relatives from the camp. I am glad to say that state of things is over; but we rather dread the winter with its cold nights. The medical superintendent spares himself no trouble. Before the trained nurses arrived, he would get up in the middle of the night and go round and poultice some bad pneumonia cases. . . . They are thinning out the camps very much. This one has spread out to nearly twice its original size, and yet they have sent over 2,000 away to Durban, so that the people have much more air-space."

Correspondents are requested to note that to be sure of insertion the same week, news must reach the Office by the first post on Thursday at latest, and the earlier in the week the better.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

John Brown.

WHITTIER'S poem, "The Branded Hand," was written in 1846, and during the following years the conflict over the question of slavery in the United States grew more and more bitter and violent. A new territory west of the slave State of Missouri was being settled (now the State of Kansas), people from the North being determined that it should be kept free from the taint of slavery, while Southerners were bent on making it a slave State. Armed bands of lawless men crossed the border from Missouri to plunder and drive out the settlers who were against slavery, and there was much violence and bloodshed.

It was a time of very sore trial for all friends of freedom, and especially for such a lover of peace as Whittier. In 1856 he wrote some verses on the "Burial of Barber," one of the victims of that troubled time in Kansas. Whittier felt that the death of every true man in such a cause must hasten its victory, and really bring shame and defeat on those who seemed by their evil violence to be gaining the upper hand. Thus he wrote :—

We in suffering, they in crime,
Wait the just award of time,
  Wait the vengeance that is due ;
Not in vain a heart shall break,
Not a tear for Freedom's sake
  Fall unheeded : God is true.

While the flag with stars bedecked
Threatens where it should protect,
  And the Law shakes hands with Crime,
What is left us but to wait,
Match our patience to our fate,
  And abide the better time ?

Patience, friends ! The human heart
Everywhere shall take our part,
  Everywhere for us shall pray ;
On our side are nature's laws,
And God's life is in the cause
  That we suffer for to-day.

Well to suffer is divine,
Pass the watchword down the line,
  Pass the countersign, "Endure."
Not to him who rashly dares,
But to him who nobly bears,
  Is the victor's garland sure.

But there were many of the Abolitionists who could not have the patience for which Whittier pleaded, and felt that the time had come to fight for the freedom of the slaves. Whittier grieved that they should use such violent means to gain their noble end, but could not refuse his admiration for their heroism and self-sacrifice.

This is seen in his poem on "Brown of Ossawatomie," the famous John Brown, who with his sons had taken part in the conflict in Kansas, and in 1859 made an attempt at Harper's Ferry, in the State of Virginia, to raise up armed resistance, that should at once make an end of slavery in the States.

The attempt failed, and the old man and those of his party who had not been killed in the fight were taken prisoners, and John Brown was condemned to death as a traitor and hanged.

Whittier could not believe that he had been right to make such an attempt, and while greeting Brown as a martyr to the cause, he yet wrote :—

Perish with him the folly that seeks through evil good !
Long live the generous purpose unstained with human blood !
Not the raid of midnight terror, but the thought which underlies ;
Not the borderer's pride of daring, but the Christian's sacrifice.

He believed that patience would have proved "that right is more than might," and if they had not taken up arms the State would yet have been compelled to recognise that they were in the right.

She may strike the pouncing eagle, but she dares not harm the dove ;
And every gate she bars to Hate shall open wide to Love !

Yet, as I have said, he was filled with admiration of Brown's heroism and his single-hearted devotion to the cause, and in the earlier verses of the poem records a touching incident, which occurred as Brown left the prison on his way to execution, and revealed the tenderness of the stern old man :—

John Brown of Ossawatomie spake on his dying day :
"I will not have to shrive my soul a priest in slavery's pay.
But let some poor slave-mother whom I have striven to free,
With her children, from the gallows-stair put up a prayer for me ! "

John Brown of Ossawatomie, they led him out to die ;
And lo ! a poor slave-mother with her little child pressed nigh.
Then the bold, blue eye grew tender, and the old harsh face grew mild,
As he stooped between the jeering ranks and kissed the negro's child !

The shadows of his stormy life that moment fell apart ;
And they who blamed the bloody hand forgave the loving heart.
That kiss from all its guilty means redeemed the good intent,
And round the grisly fighter's hair the martyr's aureole bent !

The year after John Brown's death Abraham Lincoln was elected President, and in 1861 the Civil War between the Northern and Southern States broke out, and before it was over the freedom of the slaves was decreed. During those terrible years, the men of the North, who were fighting for the Union and for the cause of the slaves, remembered John Brown as a martyr to their cause. He had been willing to die, as they were, rather than suffer that great wrong any longer, and the thought of his brave death made them stronger for the fight. What they felt about him was put into the popular verse, which became a battle song,

John Brown's body lies mouldering in the grave,
But his soul goes marching on.

Whittier mourned that the cause of freedom and humanity had not triumphed without the awful sacrifice of that great war, but it was through cleansing fires of self-sacrifice that his people were passing, and he could not but honour the spirit in which, like John Brown, they gave themselves to the cause.

To perfect in you the image of God is the work of a life—the great work. It can be accomplished only by a life. Not by a few brief resolutions in your better moments, though they have their use, but by the plain path of daily duty is this won : by faithful work and just thought, pure and holy love, the heart of goodness and the soul of faith.—Theodore Parker.

THE EDUCATION CONFLICT.

THE Bishop of HEREFORD, in the letter from which we quote in another column, urges once more his proposal for securing to the ratepayers effective control of the schools which they are to be called upon to support, but providing also that in denominational schools the head-master, where it is so desired, shall belong to the same denomination as the school. This compromise is urged as a just and fair agreement, in accordance with the axiom that taxation and representation must go together, and also as "wise and expedient, in the interests of peace and goodwill, because it will take away all reason for refusing payment of the rate, and will, I hope, produce harmony and friendly co-operation between Churchmen and Nonconformists instead of prolonged sectarian strife and bitterness." And in an earlier passage of his letter the Bishop writes :—

I should have rejoiced if the subject could have been lifted altogether out of party politics, and Churchmen and Nonconformists could have met everywhere in friendly conference on the subject, instead of ranging themselves in opposite camps and turning an educational discussion into a political fight.

But unhappily there is little hope of any abatement of the violent partisanship on either side, and the issue, whatever it may ultimately be, will come out of the sharp conflict of opposing parties. The determination of the Nonconformist opposition to the Bill steadily grows, under Dr. CLIFFORD's strenuous leadership (though one could wish that the movement had found a better poet than Mr. HIRST HOLLOWELL!), and the ultimatum of the refusal to pay rates, if the Bill passes in its present form, or to administer the Act, whether one regrets or glories in it, represents a serious factor in the situation not to be neglected.

Meanwhile, apart from this acute religious controversy, it is of the utmost consequence that the bearings of the Bill upon the education of the people as a whole should be clearly understood, and to this end we strongly recommend the careful study of a paper just issued by the National Education Association, a "Diary of the Bill," which furnishes a very clear statement of the present state of the Bill, as amended in committee up to Clause 7, and as it will be taken up again when Parliament meets next month.*

The first seven clauses of the Bill, as originally introduced, and as amended in committee, are printed in parallel columns, so as to show at a glance what alterations were made (the most notable being the rejection of the permissive Clause 5), and then follow the remaining clauses and the schedules, which have still to be dealt with, and a most instructive list of new clauses and some of the amendments to be proposed from both sides of the House.

The "Diary" gives a complete record of the progress of the Bill up to date, with the figures of each division, and then follow some valuable notes on the "Amendments and Concessions," and on the present position of the Education Question under the Bill as so far amended.

The notes show how slight is the provision made for Secondary Education, for while the "may" of Clause 2 was changed into "shall," the force of this more effective word was broken by further changes in the clause.

The Government successfully resisted proposals in this direction, and the ineffective result of much discussion was the establishment of an obligation only to "consider the needs of," and the insertion of words "as seem to them desirable," which expressly excluded the Authority from the compulsory obligation to supply or aid the supply of Education other than Elementary.

With regard to the present position of the Education Question under the Bill, the following are some of the concluding notes :—

Two great forces have created the Educational progress of recent years, (1) irresistible pressure (by a system of direct democratic control) from those people who have to gain or suffer as the education is good or bad, and (2) irresistible pressure from a Government Department armed with a statutory obligation to coerce, and with drastic powers of coercion.

Both these forces are to be abolished.

The Board Schools.

Each Public School for Elementary Education (Board school) is to be transferred from a popularly-elected body, elected mainly by the people who use it, and is in future to be managed by the nominees of a Committee largely composed of nominees of vested interests and generally far removed from any direct interest in the school.

The Curriculum is to be cut down (Clause 18), and the Education in Elementary schools will tend to become similar to that which has been considered adequate in the average Voluntary school; and as regards new ideas and methods their present sensitive adaptability is liable to be replaced by the cautious immovability which for centuries has distinguished the public schools and colleges under nominated governing bodies.

Great difficulties are put in the way of the creation of any more Public Schools, and inducements are offered for the closing of those in existence and the substitution of Denominational schools not under public management.

Voluntary Schools.

It has been decided (Clause 6) that the Public Education Authority (acting through a committee) shall "be responsible for and have the control of all secular instruction" in these schools, but these words have still to be defined, and there is no security at present for these schools being improved from an educational point of view. The interest and moral support of a constituency of "annual subscribers" (a valuable force which has much diminished in recent years) is to be discarded. The schools are to suffer (Clause 18) a restriction of their curriculum; the power of the Board of Education to compel improvements is curtailed. The defects and insufficiency of the buildings which is often their chief failing is left as at present to voluntary efforts, and the control of the buildings is separated from the control of the school.

Among the other subjects dealt with in these valuable notes are Secondary and Technical Education, the Training and Position of Teachers, the Position of the Municipal Authorities and Areas of Local Administration. Of this last it is said :—

The area of administration is a matter of vital importance in all municipal affairs. There are in round numbers about 1,800 municipal areas in the country, and the policy of Educational Reformers has been to make each one, to a large extent, autonomous. Powers of grouping and federation being added. The area must be of such a size as to bring in as many as possible of those who have a direct interest in promoting the efficiency of the work to be done, and narrow enough to exclude those outlying districts which would check local patriotism. The amendment of the Bill, so far as it has gone, with regard to the limits of areas for educational purposes, produces a ridiculous position.

And the conclusion of the whole matter is as follows :—

The progress and natural growth of popular education is threatened in every way. If there are buried amongst much evil in the Bill, a few possible benefits, these could more easily be secured by separate legislative or administrative changes, and the defeat or withdrawal of this Bill would be an advantage to National Education.

THE EDUCATION BILL: VIEWS OF CHURCHMEN.

AT the meeting held at Pen Moel last week a letter was read from the Bishop of Hereford to Mrs. Price, who had organised the meeting. In this letter the Bishop said:—

"The Bill deals with matters of such importance to the country, and if it passes in its present shape seems likely to produce such deplorable religious controversy and bitterness, that thoughtful people everywhere ought to give it the most serious and dispassionate consideration with a view to its being so modified as to save us from the consequences of an ill-starred policy."

"The amendments for which I have pleaded as required on grounds of justice and expediency alike are, I suppose, pretty well known. They are to this effect: that in every school where the buildings are provided by the denomination that (1) that denomination should retain the property rights in them, and be responsible for their upkeep and necessary extension; (2) should nominate one-third of the managers, whilst the parish council or parish meeting should elect one-third, and the local education authority the remaining third. I also propose it as reasonable that whilst the whole board of managers must, of course, appoint all teachers, those managers who are nominated to represent the denomination should have the right, if they choose to exercise it, to require that candidates for the office of head teacher must be members of the denomination; all other posts [should be open to members of any religious denomination."

Mr. H. Lee Warner, one of the Liberal members of the Norfolk County Council, who is also a Churchman, has forwarded to the Archbishop of Canterbury a memorial with regard to the Education Bill from thirty-eight members of the Council who are also members of the Church of England. The memorialists express a wish that a majority of the managers of Voluntary schools should be elected representatives of the county or parish—and that whilst preserving the office of head teacher in Church schools, where the Church is the only school available, other posts should be open to all denominations; and also (here the Norfolk County Councillors go beyond the Bishop of Hereford) they would make it incumbent on the managers to provide that, in addition to Church teaching as at present provided, there should always be an alternative class conducted by one of the teachers on the staff in accordance with the Cowper-Temple Clause.

How such a proposal is viewed by High Churchmen may be gathered from the Presidential Address of the Rev. G. Bayfield Roberts, at the annual meeting of the Gloucestershire (Central) District Union of the E.C.U., held last week. He said:—

"How could a Church school in return for so much cash down admit within its walls the ministry of the official teachers of heresy and schism? That would be to allow their organisation to be used for the propagation of error. . . . As Catholics they had to remember that exclusiveness was the note of Catholic doctrine. Catholic doctrine was true, and every other doctrine was false. They could not admit any rival. They must show themselves the determined enemies of every other form of doctrine, and to admit the teaching of Dissenters within their buildings would be a betrayal of their trust."

As Mr. Bayfield Roberts represents a very powerful section of the Church of England clergy, his words are worth attention. He described it as fatuous folly for Churchmen to seek aid from the ratepayer and taxpayer; it would eventually and justly end in disaster to the Church schools, but as Churchmen would not, or could not, support their own schools, he advocated "universally State-provided schools, with a free right of access to the ministers of all denominations." This proposal is an insiduous one; it means two things: that the public should pay for the whole cost of the Church schools, the buildings as well as the education given in them; and that as regards all other schools the Cowper-Temple Clause should be repealed. To be forewarned is to be forearmed.

THE WRITINGS OF H. W. DRESSER. III.

WE may say finally, and in simplest words, that to present a view of life which makes for larger health and nobler happiness is the aim of these writings; and a concluding notice of them must endeavour to give, and chiefly by extracts chosen with some care, further illustration of their significance and effectiveness in relation to that aim. Health and Happiness—so far as these depend on the mind, on the inward harmony of thought and feeling, on the mental attitude one maintains towards the world as a whole, and toward those other beings with whom we share life here: Health and Happiness, too, as enabling the individual to make his best available contribution to the well-being of his fellows and the social progress of the age in which his lot is cast. Our real life—that which is most significant and actual to us—is the life of mind. Not what happens to us, but what happens within us—not the outward conditions, but how we think towards these and reckon with them, is the vital concern, and determines the issues for character and conduct in the world. "As a man thinketh in his heart so is he." "Keep thine heart with all diligence, for out of it are the issues of life." These great sayings of old time receive some very effective comment in the writings of this young American thinker. To the mind is given a power by which to determine, not indeed the material conditions or flow of events in the external world, but their effect upon our own life, in relation to its strength and joyfulness and the moral worth of individual action. We have great power of choice in this matter, by reason of that inward freedom which enables us to give attention to one class of ideas and refuse attention to another class. "We are for ever choosing and rejecting certain ideas and lines of conduct to the exclusion of certain others, and into this choice is thrown all that constitutes us men and women." "The whole process, the law that, as is our direction of mind so is our conduct, seems wonderfully simple and effective when we pause to consider it. Yet we are barely conscious of the great power we exercise every moment of life. We are not aware that in the fact that the mind can fully attend to but one object at a time lies the explanation of a vast amount of trouble, and that by the same process in which we make our trouble we can get rid of it."

Many pages of "The Power of Silence" are concerned with the application of this principle to the various ailments and diseases from which human beings suffer so much. In America, during the last half-century, this doctrine of the power of mind over body, in relation to physical disease, has been carried to great extremes. Under the names of "Faith Healing," "Mental Cures," "Christian Science," and the like, all sorts of extravagant claims have been put forth. We have been assured that thinking can mend a broken bone, and believing eradicate cancer from the system. Dresser is aware of these extravagances and has reckoned with them, yet adheres to the saner view of which they are the abuse or the caricature. His position is that if we grasp the idea of an ordered purposive unity in things and rest calmly in the Perfect Whole, and then form the habit of resolutely turning away from morbid fears and worryings, and from brooding over real or imaginary ailments, and keep the mind fixed on the brighter, healthier side of life, an enormous power will be developed from within of resisting the attacks of illness, and of throwing off the troubles that afflict either the body or the soul. He rejects the theory of "faith healers" and "Christian scientists," that all disease is mental. He holds that it is very largely physical, and that there is in the body itself a natural healing and recuperative power. But the action of this power is often hindered by fear and forgetfulness on the one hand, and by drugs and doctoring on the other. Calmness of mind, hopefulness, faith in the wisdom of the universe, and a fixing of attention on the saner, happier side of life, will leave the restoring energies of Nature herself to do their work. "Healing is due to the action of natural restorative power within the physical organism. No healer ever healed. No drug ever cured. Wisely used, drugs may be effective in assisting Nature to remove impurities and other obstructions. Wisely used, therapeutic suggestion may produce the same result by more agreeable means. But it is very important to note that the real healing power is the natural tendency of the body to regain equilibrium. The prime factor in every case is the power of Nature. Healing is simply assistance rendered to Nature." He contends that, in the main, this help rendered to Nature is spiritual and from within. A rational and restful view of the universe, in which we are embosomed from the moment we come into being, and a wise direction of the mind, under all the varying conditions of life, will tend to create that inward repose through which Nature can best perform her healing and restoring work.

Few, I suppose, to-day would deny that there is much truth in all this. Many a doctor and nurse, as well as ministers of religion, would be glad to avail themselves of spiritual aids in the treatment of all kinds of suffering and disease. The merit of Dresser is in the clear and sane, yet vigorous and unfaltering statement of the principle involved, and the fearless application of it to actual life and the everyday interests of men. The following passage may seem to appeal somewhat too confidently to our faith in the powers of the mind; but in the light of the whole argument of the book, it is worthy of serious attention. We should note that by "thought" is here meant, not merely or chiefly a logical process of the intellect, but the whole movement and purpose of the inner spiritual man in its vital relation to the spiritual universe itself.

"Of all known forms of the one energy, then, thought is the most powerful, the most subtle, and probably the least understood. Used ignorantly, it brings all our misery; used wisely, its power of developing health and happiness is limitless. . . . We have learned that all power acts through something; and, in order to understand how the realisation of spirit can break up an organic or chronic disease, so-called, one must remember how such a disease is built up, and what the power behind thought really is. We have seen that the inherited beliefs, the borrowed opinions and fears, the troublesome mental pictures, the description of symptoms made by doctors, and the whole thought process whereby a disease is made out of a disturbance which nature would have cured had she been permitted, is impressed upon spiritual matter, and then reflected in the body. All this must be changed . . . by another and more powerful direction of mind, not of the personal self alone, but a realisation which, consciously and intelligently, opens the individual to the healing power, to the same Power on a higher plane which unconsciously heals the ignorant enthusiast at the shrine, but leaves him no wiser, because he has no understanding of it. To many people it seems impossible that a person in a quiet frame of mind can wield such power as this, and actually penetrate with the energy of the spirit to the very core of a diseased state and break it up, overcoming density and contraction in the muscles and tissues of the body which no physical remedies can affect. Yet this has been done repeatedly, and done, too, by those who knew precisely what they were doing and how they did it. The right use of this quiet, penetrating thought is a science, and every detail of this present analysis of the healing process is based on actual experience in performing just such cures."*

All this may be a good deal more rational than will appear to the reader who is somewhat impatient of the more spiritual view of life in all its manifestations. The significance of what truth may be here becomes more evident if we can look on the various mental and physical troubles, from which men suffer, in the way Dresser looks at them. "Disease," he says, "is not an entity which can seize us any way, regardless of our condition. Disease is mal-adjustment to the forces that play upon us." It is caused, in great degree, by such things as lethargy of mind or body, bigotry, narrowness and fixity of ideas, anxiety, fear, bad temper, depression and want of hopefulness and cheer. "Narrow religious opinions have a cramping effect on the whole life. The tendency to nervous hurry is responsible for a large proportion of the more modern ailments. People dwell in fixed and straitened directions of mind until they become cranky or insane. Worry and fear play an important part in all varieties of disease, and some people have scarcely a moment's freedom from tormenting beliefs and mental pictures. Ill-will, want of charity, jealousy, anger, or any emotion which tends to draw one into self, to shut in and contract, is immediate in its effect. Unrealised ambition, suppressed grief, continued unforgiveness, dwelling in griefs and troubles instead of living above them, disappointments, and a thousand unsuspected causes, which impede the free and outgoing expression of the individuality, have a corresponding effect on the outer being." Hence the secret of health is to be found in a "wise adjustment to the real conditions of life. We shall eliminate disease not by fighting it, not by studying its causes or doctoring its effects, but by seeing the wisdom of the better way. When we learn that it is a matter of economy never to rehearse the symptoms of disease, never to get angry, never to cherish ill-will, revengeful or unforgiving thoughts, never to make enemies, but always to be charitable and friendly, kind and hopeful, we shall not need to be told how we caused our own dis-ease; nor shall we need to say, 'I will not think these wrong thoughts any more,' for they will die out of themselves."

All this will appear ridiculous to the thoroughgoing materialist, and to the mere physical scientist, and to the self-centred invalid, and to many others. It is ridiculous if taken too literally and as a complete statement of the sources of human suffering and of the means of recovery to healthful joy. But as calling attention to one profoundly important and greatly neglected aspect of the successful conduct of life, it is an appeal not to be lightly disdained and dismissed.

Finally, let us hear the call of this practical idealist to take life, as often as we can, on its brightest, happiest side. There are words which, when heard or read, seem to lift a veil from before our eyes and show us a real world of beauty and joy, such as hardly any outward conditions can make or mar, if only the mind is well-balanced and the vision calm. It has been Dresser's privilege to write such words. They are the simple and sincere and unforced language of a heart that has thrilled to the truth they enshrine. Behind them is that large and liberal philosophic faith to which reference has been made in these pages; within them is the glow and fervour of a heart that has felt the joy and strength which the emotional realisation of such faith can bestow.

"It is a matter of economy for ourselves, and it is a source of happiness to ourselves and our friends, if we habitually look for the good wherever we go, and in this way show superiority to all that is belittling and mean. We shall soon find no time left for complaint and discouragement if we undertake this happy task with a will. We shall discover new traits of character in our friends, new sources of enjoyment in trivial things, and new pleasures even in the weather—that potent cause of useless complaint and regret. New beauties will reveal themselves in nature and human life. We shall gradually learn to see life through the artist's eyes, to look for its poetry, its harmony, its divine meaning. It is well, too, in matters of disagreement with others, to preserve the same large spirit and breadth of view, remembering that we have more points of agreement than disagreement with them, that we belong to the same infinite Love, and all mean the same great truth, only we cannot say it. It is rather better to be tolerant, to have a large charity for people, than to expect them to be like ourselves. One person of a kind is usually enough. God apparently needs us all. Those who have learned to think, especially those who realise the meaning of evolution, are usually aware of their faults; and encouragement is what they need. People do nearly as well as they can under the circumstances and with their scant wisdom. If we know a better way, it will become evident to them if we practise it"*

"It is enough for me to know that I am needed. Life can never seem dull and unworthy of being so long as this consciousness persists. If I lose it I have myself to blame. I fail to discover my true self until, having exhausted mere self-scrutiny, I await in silence, and let myself be discovered as a moment embosomed in eternity, a word in the divine language, a quality of perfect being. . . . If at one moment I seem puny and ignorant, at another—in the ineffable moment of illumination—I am the heir of all the ages and of all wisdom. In these two moments I know myself first as finite, then as infinite. I did not seek out this deepest truth, I did not reason it out. It sought me, and I recognised the Seeker. 'Out of the darkness it came insensibly into the marvellous light of day.'"

"Every factor in life may be made good in its place. It is for us to enlarge the consciousness of the whole, the eternal beauty of the never-ending right. It is for us, if we would grow strong in the Spirit, to live a simple life, that nothing may interfere with the steady advance of the higher nature from within. Where the heart is right, all good works shall follow as the fruition of natural law. Where the heart is right, one may save oneself a thousand trying experiences, thereby making one's life far more helpful to others. Where the heart is right, a love that is superior to ourselves will choose us as its instrument in the expression of its own divinity."†

So Health may be largely won through wise and calm and self-forgetting thoughts, and Happiness, through recognising, in ourselves and in each of our fellows, a child of the Eternal, with a real work to do and a rightful place to hold, even here amid the scenes and the surprises of time.

W. J. JUPP.

WE may plead the immanence and transcendence of God in such a way as apparently to evade both blame and duty. But not for long. Sooner or later reality must overtake us. God has not lost His hold, whatever we have done. And His hold is that of laws that not only religion, but science, recognise as universal. Our sonship is no more an abstraction than His Fatherhood. It is the assertion of principles that we must follow, whether to spiritual life or spiritual death. They are knit into the warp and woof of the universe, and into our own being.—May Kendall, in "Present Day Papers."

A STUDY IN HUMAN NATURE.*

II.

We have seen some of the characteristics of Mr. James' method in his recent Gifford Lectures. He relies on experience, and bases his conclusions on a remarkably wide range of facts as contained in personal documents.

Broadly speaking, there are two types of spiritual experience, depending on temperament: the "sanguine" and the "sombre," the "once born" and the "twice born." These latter words are used by Francis W. Newman in a passage which Mr. James quotes :—

> God has two families of children on this earth, the once-born and the twice-born. . . . The former see God not as a strict Judge, not as a glorious Potentate, but as the animating spirit of a beautiful, harmonious world—beneficent and kind, merciful as well as pure. The same characters generally have no metaphysical tendencies; they do not look back into themselves. Hence they are not distressed by their own imperfections; yet it would be absurd to call them self-righteous, for they hardly think of themselves at all. The childlike quality of their nature makes the opening of religion very happy to them: for they no more shrink from God, than a child from an Emperor, before whom the parent trembles. They read his character, not in the disordered world of man, but in romantic and harmonious nature. Of human sin they know perhaps little in their own hearts and not very much in the world; and human suffering does but melt them to tenderness. Thus, when they approach God, no inward disturbance ensues; and without being as yet spiritual, they have a certain complacency and perhaps romantic sense of excitement in their simple worship.

The "twice-born" are introspective, with a strong sense of the need of deliverance from sin—that is, from the evil with which they feel themselves to be entangled—and sometimes with tendencies to morbidity and excessive self-accusation. The "once-born" are joyous, serene, optimistic, finding a congenial spiritual home in modern liberal Protestantism, and not least in Unitarianism as represented by such men as Emerson, Parker, and Hale. They possess or are possessed by a spiritual condition, temperament, tendency—call it what you will—which has a wider meaning than Newman gave to it. It is not "optimism" as a mere opinion about things; it is an active condition of mind which voluntarily concentrates attention on all that is good and happy, to the exclusion (to the utmost possible extent) of all that is bad and unhappy. This general tendency Mr. James calls "The Religion of Healthy-mindedness." "The supreme contemporary example of such an inability to feel evil is of course Walt Whitman."

"Healthy-mindedness" as a Permanent Condition.

Some would be inclined to dismiss such a state of mind as childish, if not something worse; but Mr. James warns us that the situation is too complex to lie open to so simple a criticism :—

> Much of what we call evil is due entirely to the way in which men take the phenomenon. It can so often be converted into a bracing and tonic good by a simple change of the sufferer's inner attitude from one of fear to one of fight; its sting so often departs and turns into a relish when, after vainly seeking to shun it, we agree to face about and bear it cheerfully, that a man is simply bound in honour, with reference to many of the facts that seem to disconcert his peace, to adopt this way of escape. Refuse to admit their badness; despise their power; ignore their presence; turn your attention the other way; and so far as you yourself are concerned at any rate, though the facts may still exist, their evil character exists no longer. Since you make them evil or good by your own thoughts about them, it is the ruling of your thoughts which proves to be your principal concern.

And when any kind of happiness is actually in possession, the thought of the opposite kind of evil can no more acquire the feeling of reality than the thought of good can gain reality when melancholy rules. This contrast may assume deep significance, for all invasive moral states and passionate enthusiasms make one feelingless to evil in some direction :—

> The common penalties cease to deter the patriot, the usual prudences are flung by the lover to the winds. When the passion is extreme, suffering may actually be gloried in, provided it be for the ideal cause; death may lose its sting, the grave its victory. In these states the ordinary contrast of good and ill seems to be swallowed up in a higher denomination, an omnipotent excitement which engulfs the evil, and which the human being welcomes as the crowning experience of his life.

The conclusion, therefore, which Mr. James presses upon us is this: The systematic cultivation of "healthy-mindedness" in our views of life is consonant with important currents in human nature and is anything but absurd. It has sound physiological and psychological foundations, which may be summed up in the statement that to a certain real extent we make our own worlds. "As a man thinketh, so is he." The reader will see that the question of relieving evil is here regarded from a point of view different from that of "egoism versus altruism." What Mr. James has in view is not so much a method by which a given individual may relieve the sufferings of others as a method by which each and all may learn to relieve themselves of much unnecessary suffering.

Extreme Forms of Healthy-mindedness.

In fact, "healthy-mindedness" sometimes works in directions far removed from what is usually known as religion. Havelock Ellis, in a book entitled "The New Spirit," says that laughter of any sort may be considered a religious exercise, for it bears witness to the soul's expansion. And in Seeley's "Natural Religion" it is maintained that "any habitual and regulated admiration is worthy to be called a religion." On this Mr. James makes a caustic remark :—

> He [Seeley] thinks that our music, our science, and our so-called "civilisation," as these things are now organised and admiringly believed in, form the more genuine religions of our time; and certainly the unhesitating and unreasoning way in which we feel that we must inflict our civilisation upon "lower" races by means of Hotchkiss guns, &c., reminds one of nothing so much as of the early spirit of Islam in spreading its religion by the sword.

The "religious" needs of the "healthy-minded" may indeed be met in various ways. There is a sort of religion of Nature which attracts many minds; it is based on the theory of evolution, interpreted so as to lend support to the idea of universal meliorism and progress. We thus get a naturalistic optimism which Mr. James considers to have displaced Christianity from the thought of a large part of our generation. Of this he gives a typical example, taken from the manuscript collection belonging to Professor Starbuck, of Leland Stanford University. Mr. Starbuck sent certain questions on the subject of personal religion to many and various individuals, and received many and various replies. The material thus collected is classified and discussed in a very interesting, sensible, and instructive book which he has recently published, entitled "The Psychology of Religion," published in the "Contemporary Science Series." To one of these circulars the following answers were given :—

> Question.—What does Religion mean to you? Answer.—"It means nothing; and it seems, so far as I can observe, useless to others. . . . Praying, singing of hymns, and sermonising are pernicious—they teach us to rely on some supernatural power, when we ought to rely on ourselves. . . . I *tee*totally disbelieve in a God. The God-idea was begotten in ignorance, fear, and a general lack of any knowledge of Nature. . . . As a time-piece stops, we die—there being no immortality in either case." Q.—What comes before your mind corresponding to the words God, Angels, Heaven, &c.? A.—"Nothing whatever. I am a man without a religion. These words mean so much mythic bosh." Q.—Have you had any experiences which appeared providential? A.—"None whatever. There is no agency of the superintending kind. A little judicious observation as well as knowledge of scientific law will convince anyone of this fact." Q.—What things work most strongly on your emotions? A.—"Lively songs and music. . . . I greatly enjoy Nature, especially fine weather. . . . I never go to church, but attend lectures when there are any good ones. All my thoughts and cogitations have been of a healthy and cheerful kind, for instead of doubts and fears I see things as they are, for I endeavour to adjust myself to my environment. This I regard as the deepest law. Mankind is a progressive animal. I am satisfied he will have made a great advance over his present status a thousand years hence." Q.—What is your notion of sin? A.—"It seems to be that sin is a condition, a disease, incidental to man's development not being yet advanced enough; morbidness over it increases the disease." Q.—What is your temperament? A.—"Nervous, active, wide-awake, mentally and physically; sorry that Nature compels us to sleep at all."

Mr. James is willing to call this writer's state of mind by courtesy a religion; "for it is his reaction upon the whole nature of things, it is systematic and reflective, and it loyally binds him to certain inner ideals." In any case he is a sufficiently familiar contemporary type.

Unitarianism as a Religion of Healthy-mindedness.

It is interesting to find that, for the best expressions of "healthy-mindedness" in religion in the ordinary sense of this word, Mr. James quotes from Theodore Parker and from Dr. Edward Everett Hale (for the latter, see Starbuck, "Psychology of Religion," pp. 305, 306). Dr. Hale says :—

> I observe, with profound regret, the religious struggles which come into many biographies, as if almost essential to the formation of the hero. I ought to speak of these, to say that any man has an advantage, not to be estimated, who is born, as I was, into a family where the religion is simple and rational; who is trained in the theory of such a religion, so that he never knows, for one hour, what these religious or irreligious struggles are. I always knew God loved me, and I was always grateful to him for the world he placed me in. I always liked to tell him so, and was always glad to receive his suggestions to me. I can remember perfectly that, when I was coming to manhood, the half-philosophical novels of the time had a deal to say about the young men and maidens who were facing "the problem of life." I had no idea whatever what the problem of life was. To live with all my might seemed to me easy; to learn where there was so much to learn seemed pleasant and almost of course; to lend a hand, if one had a chance, natural; and if one did this, why, he enjoyed life because he could not help it, and without proving to himself that he ought to enjoy it. A child who is early taught that he is God's child, that he may live and move and have his being in God, and that he has therefore infinite strength at hand for the conquering of any difficulty, will take life more easily, and probably will make more of it, than one who is told that he is born the child of wrath and wholly incapable of good.

We scarcely need to remind our readers that these words express a faith which is a reality to the speaker—a faith which has grown as naturally as a tree grows, increasing in strength year by year—once a tender leaf and nothing more, now a sturdy oak.

Does this Cover all the Facts?

In what Dr. Hale says, Mr. James finds the expression of a temperament "organically weighted on the side of cheer, and fatally forbidden to linger, as those of an opposite temperament linger, over the darker aspects of the universe." The Expository Times, commenting on the passage which we have quoted, suggests a doubt as to whether the religion of "healthy-mindedness," even in such a case as that of Dr. Hale, is really a "religion." Other organs of "orthodoxy" have positively asserted that it is no religion at all. Thus, the British Weekly and the Baptist Magazine have affirmed that apart from Jesus Christ no religious experience is valid—which is equivalent to the assertion that there is no access to the Divine outside certain Protestant evangelical sects. This is not, of course, what is meant, but it is the immediate consequence of what is said. The absurdity arises from the confusion introduced into orthodox Christology by the doctrine of the Trinity. If—as the British Weekly seems to say—Christ may be experienced as a "present fact" in whom "all mysteries are revealed," the "fact" may equally well be named "God" or "the Holy Spirit." In Christian Mysticism all three modes of expression are found.

As regards the opinions of the "scientific" brother whose answers we have quoted, the Expository Times asks the same question with more reason:—

> Is this person one of "the healthy-minded" in religion? Is he one of the once-born? And are all the once-born, including such a one as this, who expects the same immortality as a time-piece, really heirs of eternal life? This question is the question of questions for us to-day. Other difficulties will wait, this one must be settled. The "sick souls" are not too well received among us at present. It is the "healthy-minded" we encourage. Our God is "the happy God." And we seem to have settled it in our minds, though we have not yet inserted it in our creeds, that in Adam all do not die, and that there is less joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth than over one happy and healthy person who sees no occasion for repentance.

We hope that the leaders and guardians of "orthodox" thought will frankly face the questions thus put to them. The latter part of the passage which we have just quoted agrees in the main with what Mr. James himself says:—

> The advance of liberalism, so-called, in Christianity, during the past fifty years, may fairly be called a victory of healthy-mindedness within the Church over the morbidness with which the old hell-fire theology was more harmoniously related. We have now whole congregations whose preachers, far from magnifying our consciousness of sin, seem devoted rather to making little of it. They ignore or deny eternal punishment, and insist on the dignity rather than on the depravity of man. They look at the continual preoccupation of the old-fashioned Christian with the salvation of his soul as something sickly and reprehensible rather than admirable; and a sanguine and "muscular" attitude, which to our forefathers would have seemed purely heathen, has become in their eyes an ideal element of Christian character. I am not asking whether or not they are right, I am only pointing out the change.

The difficulty with the Religion of Healthy-mindedness is not—as the British Weekly and its friends seem to think—that the exponents of it avoid using the phraseology of the evangelical scheme. The difficulty is more fundamental. A strong, deep, simple faith, like that of Edward Everett Hale, is the fruit of a gradual and rational growth of the inner life, harmoniously responding to favourable outward influences, such as is not possible for the mass of mankind. Hence the forms in which it naturally expresses itself do not and cannot effectively touch the majority of men and women whom we meet day by day: the ideas do not correspond to their experience. Mr. James himself practically admits this. He thinks that the Religion of Healthy-mindedness fails to take account of the total situation in life, for one of the basal elements in religion must be deliverance from evil, and no deliverance is possible which does not sound the depths.

Some Educational Inferences.

Mr. Starbuck describes the religious temperament of which we have been speaking in a suggestive chapter entitled "Growth Without Definite Transitions" ("Psychology of Religion," Chap. XXIV.), in which he points out the chief conditions on which it depends:

> One condition which seems to conduce to gradual development is religious surroundings in childhood. If from the earliest years the child drinks in the conception that religion is a life of love and helpfulness, rather than a body of doctrines, this will go far towards obviating the necessity of learning it as a painful lesson. . . . Another pretty clearly-marked condition is that children be kept reasonably free from dogmas that they are incapable of assimilating. The dogmas may be in essence right if they can be fully interpreted, and it may be, and probably is, necessary to teach children much that they cannot understand—many things that appeal to the deeper intuitions, and will never be understood as clear cognitions; but it should never be forgotten that religious conceptions easily crystallise, and one of the greatest hindrances to growth is that these set forms which project themselves out of an earlier life frequently become numerous and insoluble. . . . Another condition is that there should be a certain mixture of faith and doubt continually—a sufficient degree of freedom to question all things, to ensure a clear horizon, and enough trust and insight and poise of spirit to remain firmly rooted in the heart of religion.

Mr. Starbuck was not thinking specially of Unitarianism when he wrote these words; and, as he shows, examples of this temperament, in a pure and attractive form, may be found even in those religious bodies which insist on the necessity of a "conversion" crisis. But he could hardly have given a better statement of the ideal which we, as upholders of a genuinely free Christianity, deliberately set before us for realisation—however far from that ideal our achievements may be. Still we have to face the fact that at the present time and with the conditions under which we live, growth usually does not come in this way. When we see how complex a fact mere existence has come to be—the ever-changing, ever-growing inner life, with its deep-seated instincts of mind and body, and the multiform social and physical influences brought to bear upon the individual by no will of his own; the natural tenacity with which familiar beliefs or established habits are held to, and the inevitable necessity of gaining new ideas or changing old points of view; above all, the native tendency of mind by which a man regards any beliefs or habits, whose value he has learnt by his own experience and thought, as being for everyone the only true paths to the goal which he has reached by them—remembering these things, we can understand that in spiritual matters development is more likely to proceed by crisis, storm and stress and struggle, or else to end in mental petrifaction, than to be the gradual, rational process by which the "once-born" have grown. A Church may give religious instruction and spiritual leadership which will effectively appeal to minds of this type, and yet may utterly fail to appeal to the mass of mankind; and if it deliberately limits itself to the former endeavour, it must needs fail in the latter. We must not complacently think that people only need to be "educated up" to our message: the varieties of experience and temperament are such that no kind of appeal can possibly be effective with all. Might not this simple fact be remembered by those among us who are ever in a state of feverish anxiety to "get the people in"? If all men were made after one type—and that the type which the influence of the particular minister and Church in question could touch—then the problem of getting the people in would be a simple one; but it scarcely needs much reflection to show that the real state of things is something very different.

LOYALTY TO TRUTH.

SIR,—If the letter from Mr. Walters, in your last week's issue, could be read either as a pure abstraction, or even in simple forgetfulness of the most remarkable sentence in Mr. Walters' sermon on which I commented a fortnight since, I do not think there is a single position in it, from beginning to end, which either I or any other reasonable man would think of controverting, or deem it worth while to controvert, at least at the present moment; but it is not at all possible for any man with open eyes so to read it. The simple fact is that, from beginning to end, the letter is an attempt by Mr. Walters to justify and vindicate that very sectarianism which, in his sermon, he so entirely repudiates, and which he would have others to entirely repudiate, and an attempt also to prove that, though he and others so inconsistently assume a sectarian name, take up a sectarian attitude, and combine for sectarian ends, they yet do so without the sectarian spirit of exclusiveness; and these contradictory things cannot, by any legerdemain or logic whatever, be made to hang together, excepting, in the well-known and unhappy sense of the "common hangman." It is morally and intellectually impossible for Mr. Walters to teach, as he does all through his letter of last week, that we cannot be "loyal to truth" without assuming the sectarian attitude, using a sectarian name, and acting from sectarian motives, and, at the same time, go on saying, as he does say in his sermon, that "here, then, in this latest heresy case, we have a distinct proof that, to be 'loyal to truth' a man must renounce sectarianism and all its works." If Mr. Walters finally chooses to stand wholly by the sectarian position of his letter, he must cease to hold the non-sectarian position of his sermon; and, until he gives up his own sectarianism, which he now tells us is indispensable to his loyalty to truth, he cannot advise the Wesleyans and others to give up their sectarianism, since they are as well, or as ill, entitled as he is to plead that, just as he now claims that his sectarianism is indispensable to loyalty to his truth, so their sectarianism is equally indispensable to loyalty to their truth. Such is the dilemma in which Mr. Walters has placed himself, as between the catholic sentence of his sermon and the absolutely irreconcilable sectarianism of his last week's letter.

As to the attempt which Mr. Walters also makes to show that while, like other sectarians, he and those who think with him use a sectarian name, assume a sectarian attitude, and combine for sectarian ends, they are yet *un*like their sectarian neighbours, free from the sectarian spirit and practice, it is as inconclusive and inconsistent as endless other attempts of the same kind that have preceded it. The astounding suggestion that there is some analogy or other between the legal and moral position of the fully representative character of the Wesleyan Conference in reference to all Wesleyan ministers and Wesleyan congregations, and the legal and moral position of the entirely non-representative character of the B. and F.U.A. in reference to our churches is entirely baseless; and so to reason from the practices or non-practices of the one, as compared with the practices or non-practices of the other, is as bad in ethics as it is poor in logic, and that it is logically worthless goes without saying. Moreover, it is an entire fallacy to assume, as does Mr. Walters all through his letter of last week, that, because the B. and F.U.A. does not do what it has neither the legal nor the moral right, nor the least disposition to do, and because there is no central authority of any kind amongst us to override the liberties of our ministers or of our congregations, therefore there is no fear and no danger of those liberties being interfered with at all. Have these champions of liberty in the abstract, and these repudiators of central interference, whether of Conference, Assembly, or Convocation, quite forgotten that the evil thing we all alike deprecate may transact itself, in all its enormity and ugliness, through congregations themselves, or sections of congregations, or little coteries of half-a-dozen men, in utter disregard, not only of all the personal and ecclesiastical rights of others, but also of legal and moral obligations on their own side? Will any one of these good friends, indeed, venture to deny what I here and now, as more than once before, affirm, that, as a matter of concrete fact, there have been, in our own churches, at least two cases of *dis*loyalty to truth, compared with either of which "the sad case of Dr. Agar Beet" is as nothing and less than nothing? Loving liberty as much as any man among us, and caring for "loyalty to truth" as much as I care for liberty, in view of abundant facts, I say again, "Good brothers all, let us look at home, and let us, at least, thus try to learn that, whether or not "the great Shepherd and Bishop" of all souls has set us to be watch-dogs over other folds, we may still humbly hope He has set us to be shepherds over our own little fold, and called us to be faithful, each in his own sphere.

Meanwhile, those of us who hold by the non-sectarian attitude Mr. Walters so finely assumed in his eloquent sermon, and then so incontinently abandoned in his letter, have no such difficulties as those which he and all who agree with him experience. So far from thinking that "loyalty to truth" demands from us the sectarianism of Mr. Walters' letter, we are quite certain that we cannot be loyal to truth without the clear and absolute renunciation "of sectarianism and all its works" set forth in Mr. Walters' sermon. We can preach and teach, and try to live, all the truth that comes to us as loyally and as earnestly as any sectarian of them all; but we do not, as our sectarian advocates do, see the necessity or the wisdom of putting a patented label on it, as if the great truth of God had become our own small nostrum. Why, indeed, should any man among us thus give up the prophet's free calling for the self-hired avocation of the spiritual quack-doctor? Nor can we honestly ignore the obligations laid on us by the best traditions and inheritances that have come to us from the past, especially as seen in our "open trusts." To us it seems the direct opposite of "loyalty to truth" for anyone now living to fasten either the Unitarian or the Trinitarian name upon chapels deliberately differentiated from both the one name and the other by those who, in the long ago, built, and, it may be, endowed them also. On all grounds we are quite sure that Mr. Walters got on to the right line when he preached the doctrine that, to secure "loyalty to truth," as well as loyalty to liberty, we "must renounce sectarianism and all its works." "OUR CAUSE."

SIR,—You refer in this week's INQUIRER to a note which appeared in the Essex Church Calendar, and you describe a statement which is there made—namely, "our cause at Hastings only dates back forty years"—as a dreadful piece of denominational slang. Is it any use, Sir, my protesting against this, for your criticism seems to me to be as unkind as it is uncalled for. We should all admit—and no one, I believe, more willingly than the writer of the note in question—that "our cause" is older than any single effort to serve it; but surely, Sir, any effort to serve the cause of truth and genuine religion may be fairly described as "our cause." If we are not to use the expression "our cause" to describe the effort that is being made at Hastings, will you tell us how we may express ourselves without giving such dire offence to yourself, and possibly also to others? "Our Church," I may add, would not express the same meaning—the present building not being erected till some time after the services were started.

I venture to say that your note only confuses and disheartens those of us who are striving to make known our cause to others. And it is guidance and encouragement that we look for in your paper.

ROBERT HARROP WOLFF.

Bayswater, Sept. 16.

[We should be sorry if our protest against the use of denominational slang, made last week, not for the first time, seriously confused or disheartened anyone. The matter surely is not so serious as that. But the habit of speaking of a congregation or a Church as "a cause" is a constant aggravation to us (and we believe to many others), from which we should be thankful to be rid. Why not say "the congregation" or "the work" dates back to such and such a time? That we take to be good English. But when someone writes to us that we have "only a very feeble cause" at Little Peddlington, or "it is a shame that we have no cause at Mudford," or "we once had a cause there, but it is dead," it sets our teeth on edge.—ED. INQ.]

EDINBURGH.

SIR,—It appears to me that Mr. Whytock, the secretary of the St. Mark's Chapel, Edinburgh, has quite misconceived the object of my letter. I wished to draw attention to the fact that at the chapel itself no announcement as to its closure or even as to its services was visible. The notice in the Scotsman was, for any who, like myself, had just disembarked from a steamer on which the daily papers were not delivered at sea, absolutely futile. But I venture to take a wider view, and to suggest that as our chapels have to fulfil a public as well as a private function, it is monstrous neglect of the former to close an important chapel in the greatest show-city in the kingdom in the very height of the season. Other denominations do not close their doors because the minister is taking his well-earned holiday.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Accrington.—Harvest Festival services were held on Sunday last, the preacher being the Rev. Charles Peach, of Manchester, who gave an address to scholars in the morning, and preached afternoon and evening to good congregations. Willing hands had decorated the chapel with fruit and heather and autumn foliage.

Acton.—The services here were resumed on Sunday evening last, when the Rev. W. C. Bowie preached an inspiring sermon on "Following Jesus." Several of those who have been attending these services have not yet returned from their summer holidays; but, notwithstanding this, there were about twenty present. The London District Unitarian Society have now undertaken the oversight of the Acton congregation, and have presented them with fifty copies of the new Essex Hall Hymnal. It is hoped that a permanent addition to our churches will be the result of the earnest effort now being made by the friends at Acton. Next Sunday the Rev. Frank K. Freeston, of Essex Church, will conduct the service. The help of any friends who may be residing in the neighbourhood is earnestly requested.

Ainsworth.—A note appeared in Tuesday's Times, in the column of Ecclesiastical Intelligence, announcing that some farm land belonging to the old Cocky Moor Chapel, left as an endowment for the support of the minister, has been found to be rich in minerals, the value of which is estimated at £40,000. Part of this wealth, if the sanction of the Charity Commissioners can be obtained, may be applied for the purchase of a new burial-ground, and for the renovation of the school buildings.

Chowbent.—On Sunday evening last the Rev. J. J. Wright lectured in the chapel on "Some Lessons from P. J. Bailey's Poem 'Festus,'" commending, to those who could not read the bulky volume, "A Festus Treasury," of admirably-selected passages, published at 3½d., by Broadbent, Manchester, of which twenty-five copies were ordered after the service. Mr. Wright's lectures during this month also include "Rose's Diary," a poem by H. S. Sutton, and Langbridge's poems, "Poor Folks' Lives" and "A Cluster of Quiet Thoughts," to which The Inquirer called attention some little time back.

Dudley.—On Sunday the anniversary of the Sunday-school connected with the Old Meeting House was celebrated by children's flower services morning and evening. The chapel was effectively decorated, and special hymns were rendered by the children, who entered the chapel at each service singing a processional and carrying bunches of flowers, which were received at the communion rails by the minister. Sacred solos were sung by Mrs. Beddard, and that in the evening was accompanied on the violin by Mr. Sidney Lewis. There were good congregations, especially in the evening. The services were conducted by Mr. Edgar Lockett, of Manchester College, Oxford, who is doing vacation duty at Dudley for a series of Sundays. Collections were taken in aid of the Sunday-school funds. On Tuesday the children had their annual treat, generously provided by Mr. and Mrs. Bean. The Rev. George St. Clair will be the minister-in-charge of the congregation for six months, beginning Oct. 12.

East London Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The seventh aggregate service of scholars and teachers was held at Mansford-street on Sunday afternoon, the 14th inst. There were about 250 present. The address was given by the Rev. R. H. Greaves, of Highgate, on "Sowing and Reaping," and was listened to very attentively by those present.

Hale (Appointment).—The Rev. Arthur Leslie Smith has accepted a unanimous invitation to the ministry of Hale Chapel, and will enter on his duties on Oct. 12, when the annual Harvest Thanksgiving services will be held.

Halstead.—The Harvest Thanksgiving service was held on Sunday, conducted by the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, his subject being "Lessons from the Corn Fields." The church band played "Everlasting Life" at the commencement, and Mozart's "Twelfth Mass" at the close of the service. Two solos, "Calvary" and "The Way of Peace," were sung by Mrs. E. Arnold. The congregation was augmented by friends from Gosfield, Sudbury, Colne, and Bocking, and was the largest that had been for over thirty years, nearly 200 being seated inside, and several standing in the porch and outside. The collection was for new books, and was an improvement on previous years. Since the congregation has been under the Provincial Assembly the members have steadily increased, and the general congregations have been large.

Newchurch.—On Saturday last the quarterly conference of the North-East Lancashire Sunday School Union was held at Newchurch, when the Rev. Jenkyn Thomas, of Rawtenstall, read an able paper on "Parental Duty." An interesting discussion followed. There was a good attendance of delegates and friends. A vote of thanks was heartily accorded to the reader of the paper and to the ladies who provided tea. On Thursday Harvest Thanksgiving services were held, when the Rev. W. R. Shanks, of Manchester, a former minister of the church, preached two excellent sermons. At each service there was an exceptionally good attendance. Special hymns and anthems were sung. The collections were in advance of the previous year. On Monday evening a fruit banquet was held in the schoolroom, when dancing and games were enjoyed.

Padiham.—The Rev. J. H. Wicksteed preached farewell sermons in Nazareth Chapel on Sunday week, prior to his removal to London, and on the following Monday evening a largely-attended farewell meeting was held. Councillor Roberts presided, and an illuminated address was presented to Mr. Wicksteed, with warm expressions of gratitude to him and to Mrs. Wicksteed for the work they had done in Padiham, and for the gift of their house in Blackburn-road to the congregation for a parsonage. The Revs. A. W. Fox, W. H. Burgess, and J. J. Shaw, Messrs. N. Ingham and J. Hartley on behalf of the congregation, and Mr. J. S. Mackie, of Burnley, were among the speakers. Mr. Wicksteed acknowledged the great kindness of his friends, and on his own behalf and his wife's bade them an affectionate farewell.

Saffron Walden.—On Sunday, Sept. 14, the evening service at the General Baptist Chapel was taken by Mr. John Keates, of Trowbridge, and minister of Rushall, Wilts. His subject was "The Unspeakable Gift of God," which he worked out with admirable clearness and pathetic force. After the service the Rev. J. A. Brinkworth distributed a number of handsome medals commemorative of the Coronation to the Sunday-school children and to several old scholars who were present. The congregation, which included an "old scholar" who had not been in the chapel for forty years, exhibited much interest in the proceedings.

Sheffield: Upperthorpe.—Re-opening services were conducted on Sunday by the Rev. A. H. Dolphin, the minister-elect, the chapel having been closed for the last six weeks for extensive renovations. Chapel and schools have been thoroughly cleaned and redecorated, the heating apparatus and lighting arrangements have been considerably improved, and the organ has been re-built and enlarged by Mr. G. F. Heald. Mr. Hugh Stannus supervised the plans for the decoration, and the scheme is most effective, having given the chapel and schools a bright appearance, which was lacking before. The cost has been about £400, which has still to be raised, and collections were made for that purpose at the re-opening services, to be continued for the next two Sundays.

Whitchurch.—Sunday-school anniversary services were held in the Church of the Saviour last Sunday, the preacher being the Rev. C. D. Badland, M.A., who delivered three most impressive addresses on the importance of Sunday-school work. There were good congregations, and the collections were highly satisfactory.

Wolverhampton: Opening All Souls' Church.—On Sunday, Sept. 7, the opening services were held in the new temporary church, Bath-road, which, thanks to the generosity of the Midland Christian Union, the trustees have been able to erect, and which has been christened All Souls' Church (Unitarian). The building is quaintly picturesque and somewhat unique in appearance, and will accommodate about 150 persons. The preacher for the occasion was the Rev. J. C. Street, of Shrewsbury, who gave two inspiring sermons, entitled "Holy Places" and "A Living Church for To-day" respectively. The number of attendants was good. Several members of the Kidderminster choir kindly came over and rendered assistance. On Monday, Sept. 8, a tea was served in the schoolroom (lately used for services), and was partaken of by over eighty adults and children, a number of friends having come from other Unitarian churches in the district. After tea a public meeting was held in the church, presided over by Mr. H. E. Perry, chairman of the church committee. Amongst those on the platform were the Revs. A. A. Charlesworth and E. D. P. Evans, and a number of other Unitarian ministers of the district were present. Upon the platform also was the Rev. C. F. Bone (Congregationalist minister), who spoke of the common sympathy which underlies spiritual services. There were certain underlying principles on which they as Christians might all agree, and that was the reason why he was there that night. Mr. T. Grosvenor Lee spoke as representing the British and Foreign Unitarian Association and Mr. Byng Kenrick as representing the Midland Christian Union, of which he is president. The pastor of the church, the Rev. J. B. Higham, said he was at that church not to emphasise a creed, therefore they called the church "All Souls." They believed the secret of grace lay deep in the souls of all men, and not in the surface of words. They called the church Unitarian because it was governed by people whose convictions tended to the greatest simplicity in all things. He wanted to gather in that church people who each knew the sorrow, failure, or disappointment of individual life, so that they could find brotherly sympathy and words of comforting prayer. The secret of the Church was its corporate life of mutual help. Alderman Price Lewis (a Methodist, and at one time mayor of Wolverhampton) made a fraternal speech, and other speakers were Rev. J. C. Street, Councillors Frost and Evans, Mr. Phillips, and Mr. W. L. Teasdale. The meeting was well attended, and it is felt will be productive of good feeling and sympathy.

The old hermit Palladius having five hundred scholars, used never to dismiss them without this admonition: My friends, be cheerful; forget not, I beseech you, to be cheerful.—H. Scougal.

IN A SPECIAL ARTICLE ON

"WHY MEN AVOID CHURCH,"

"THE DAILY MAIL" says:—

"From the first page to the last of this thoughtful and inspiring little book there is not one word of insistence on the passive acceptation of dogma—an insistence that in the past peopled our own free thought platforms and left only women in our churches. And yet throughout the thirty-six essays of which the volume is composed, there is nothing unscriptural, nothing that any fair-minded person could term unorthodox. It is only that in pondering over life and death the author dares to use the brains with which the Creator has endowed him.

THE SOUTH SHORE UNITARIAN CHURCH, BLACKPOOL,

has purchased, at a cost of nearly £600, a plot of freehold land, and they now appeal for help to erect a plain, substantial building to serve for all purposes. It is hoped to be able to do this for £1,500, making a total cost of £2,100. The land, thanks to the generosity of Mrs. John Grundy, of Summerseat; Miss S. Scholes Wrigley, of Windermere (on her own and her late mother's behalf), and Mr. R. T. Heape, of Rochdale, is entirely paid for. The Congregation have themselves promised over £300 towards the erection of the building. They carry on the Services and the Sunday School without any grant, and they feel that the remarkable success of their efforts justifies them in asking friends to help them to carry on their work under more favourable circumstances than at present. Their appeal has the full approval of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, the North and East Lancashire Mission, and the North Lancashire and Westmorland Unitarian Association; and the B. and F. U. A. has promised £25 to the Building Fund.

Board and Residence.

A FEW young people received in PLEASANT HOME near Victoria. Terms moderate.—Mrs. ROBERT TURNER, 94, Grosvenor-road, S.W.

BOURNEMOUTH. — Elvaston, West Cliff, BOARDING ESTABLISHMENT. Unrivalled position on sea front, close to the Highcliffe Hotel. 50 rooms. Full-sized billiard table. Lovely grounds, with access to Cliff Promenade. Due south. Near Unitarian Church.—Mr. and Mrs. POCOCK.

BOURNEMOUTH.—Most comfortable private BOARDING-HOUSE; close to sea; sheltered among the Pines; south aspect. Billiard-room (full-sized table). Terms moderate.—Address, Miss CHALDECOTT, Stirling House, Manor-road.

NEWQUAY, CORNWALL. — Hazel Mount, Bay View Terrace. Sea and country view. APARTMENTS.—Mrs. VICKERS.

ST. LEONARDS.—"Crantock," 59, Warrior-square. First-class BOARD and RESIDENCE, newly furnished and redecorated. Sea View, excellent cuisine, billiard room, sanitary certificate.—Mr. and Mrs. SIDNEY P. POTTER.

HERBERT RIX, B.A., offers new LANTERN LECTURES on PALESTINE. Fee £2 2s. Prospectus on application to H. RIX, Limpsfield, Surrey.

MISS LOUISA DREWRY will give, at her own house, during the coming Autumn and Winter, LECTURES on English Literature, Illustrative Readings, and Courses of Lessons for the Study of Individual Works. Miss DREWRY visits Schools, reads with Private Pupils, examines, and helps Students by letter and in her Reading Society.—143, King Henry's-road, London, N.W.

MR. JOHN HARWOOD is prepared to give DRAMATIC RECITALS of two hours' duration to Societies connected with our own Churches and Schools, upon exceptional terms. Selections from Dickens's "Christmas Carol," "Cricket on the Hearth" (original adaptations), Shakspere, Colman, Sheridan, and other Authors; also a novel "Lecture," entitled "The Art of Public Recitation: its Humours and Difficulties—a Leaf from my Own Experience," followed by one hour of illustrative Recitals.

Address, Fair View, Pendleton, Manchester.

REV. F. HAYDN WILLIAMS, Whitby, is SELLING 1,000 of his BOOKS, and will send MS. Catalogue to Applicants in Rotation.

The object is to recover out-of-pocket expenses in rescuing 1,150 square yards of the only public playground of Whitby from the encroacher; and also to obtain means for indictment of encroacher for a still remaining enclosure from the playground of 207 square yards.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE subject of the first of Dr. J. H. Poynting's scientific articles, which we hope to publish next week, is to be "The Transformation and Dissipation of Energy," with some reference to Professor Dewar's recent address as President of the British Association. Dr. Poynting, who is Professor of Physics in the Birmingham University, and late Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, published in 1894 his Adams Prize Essay on "The Mean Density of the Earth," and five years later, in conjunction with Professor J. J. Thomson of Cambridge, brought out the first volume of a Text-book of Physics, on "Sound." A second volume of this elaborate work, on "The Properties of Matter," is to appear within the next few days.

THE fourteenth annual meeting of the London and South Eastern Counties' Provincial Assembly is to be held, as already announced, at Hastings next Tuesday. Cheap return tickets for the day, at 6s., can be had of the L.B. and S.C.R., and good resolution starting by the 8.8 A.M. train from London Bridge, or 8.10 A.M. from Victoria, will arrive in time for the morning service, at which Dr. Hicks is to be the preacher. Sobriety must leave again for town at 8.10 P.M., or stay all night, so that we trust the evening meeting will be promptly begun and vigorously carried through. The Assembly Rooms, where that meeting is to be held, are in the centre of the town, close to the station. The speakers are to be Mr. F. A. Harrison (chairman), Mr. F. Lawson Dodd, and the Revs. W. Copeland Bowie, W. G. Tarrant, and H. M. Livens.

THE centenary of the birth of Louis Kossuth, the Hungarian patriot, was celebrated throughout the country, and particularly at Buda-Pesth, on Friday week, as a national festival. Kossuth, who died at Turin in 1894, had been an exile from his country since the disastrous ending of the revolution of 1848-9, for he could not bring himself to accept the Ausgleich of 1867, by which the liberties of Hungary and the separate monarchy were restored, under the Austrian crown. But the old divisions are now forgotten, and the whole people remember and honour Kossuth as their national hero, their leader in the time of sorest trial, to whom, in fact, more than to any other, they owe the constitutional liberties which they now enjoy. A commemorative service was held on Sept. 19 in the Protestant Church at Buda-Pesth, and then a great procession of the Hungarian Chamber of Deputies, headed by Count Apponyi, the City Council, headed by the Burgomaster, and representatives of all the counties and municipalities of Hungary proceeded to the cemetery, where wreaths were placed on Kossuth's grave and the foundation-stones of a mausoleum, to be erected in his honour, were laid.

THE demonstration of Yorkshiremen against the Education Bill was carried out at Leeds last Saturday afternoon with the greatest determination, and with unqualified success. From all parts of the West Riding the people streamed into Leeds, not a holiday crowd, but men and women bent on a serious purpose, and it was estimated by those well qualified to judge that 100,000 persons were gathered on Woodhouse Moor. The speaking was from five platforms, and lasted an hour, at the end of which a simultaneous resolution was enthusiastically passed. The demand for genuine popular control, and indignation at the destruction of School Boards, and making sectarian schools a charge upon the rates, was the burden of the demonstration. "Withdraw or Dissolve" was the demand addressed to the Prime Minister.

AT the autumn meeting of the Congregational Union held at Glasgow on Tuesday, in the absence of the President, Dr. Caleb Scott, through illness, the chair was taken by Dr. Fairbairn, Principal of Mansfield College, Oxford, who gave an address dealing for the most part with the Education Bill. With party politics, he said, as a conflict of "outs" against "ins" they, an assemblage of Christian men, of Free Churchmen, had no concern whatever. But with politics as a great public question they had a most intimate and immediate concern. Politics was to them religion applied to the Government and the constitution of the State, and they, as men who spoke for faith, who sought to construe and apply religion to the conduct of life, dare not be indifferent to it when it concerned the organisation of society, the conduct of the State, the behaviour of our statesmen, and the future of our people. Of all questions in domestic politics education was unquestionably the greatest, for education, from the root to the utmost flower, was concerned with one thing—the making of men. He then subjected the Bill to trenchant criticism, emphasising the fact that his objections to it were throughout educational, and said that they demanded a "complete, honest, perfectly sincere, free and really representative system of education. The schools of the people must not be under clerical control. There was no safeguard for religion like entrusting power in regard to it to the people.

AT the conclusion of Dr. Fairbairn's address Mr. A. E. Hutton, M.P., moved the resolution, which we printed a fortnight ago, but with the last clause amended to read:—

It urges all friends of education and of civil and religious liberty (a) to organise themselves more thoroughly to secure the abandonment of the measure or appeal to the people, and (b) if the Act is forced upon the nation to employ all personal and civil measures open to them to frustrate its operation and to destroy the Act.

This was again amended, on the motion of the Rev. C. Sylvester Horne, by omitting (a), and for (b) substituting:—

But if the Act is forced upon the nation the Assembly is prepared to advise its members to refuse to pay the rate.

Opinion on this point was by no means unanimous, but a motion for adjournment for fuller discussion was lost, and the resolution as amended was passed by an overwhelming majority.

THE proposed organised resistance to the Bill in the form of a refusal to pay the Education rate if the Bill is passed in its present form does not commend itself to Liberals generally nor to all Nonconformists. The British Weekly and the Methodist Times advocate it strongly, while it is deprecated by the Methodist Recorder and the Christian World. According to the British Weekly 180 Free Church Councils in England and Wales have held meetings regarding the Education Bill, and with few exceptions have declared for a policy of "passive resistance." About sixty Councils favour organisation for this purpose before Parliament meets; thirty-eight are for leaving the matter open as regards time, a few favour postponement, and some disagree altogether

THE Manchester Guardian strongly deprecates the "anti-rate" agitation, and points out that it is bad tactics, as likely to prevent the object aimed at. A still more serious objection is that if this kind of resistance to law is introduced it might be used by others, if the Liberals should at any time bring in an Education Bill which the Church party did not like. "We hope," says the Manchester Guardian, "on full consideration nothing will be done to injure a public movement on which so much depends, by associating it in the minds both of its friends and its enemies with a kind of political pressure which is not congenial to English politics."

THE silence of the chief supporters of the Government with regard to the Education Bill is significant. Mr. Balfour has confessed that one of its objects was to give additional assistance to the Voluntary schools. The members of the Church party who are largely, if not entirely, responsible for the introduction of the Bill have discovered that they made a great mistake when they asked for, or accepted the proffer of, rate-aid. They are convinced that if they accept aid from the rates their schools must come under public control; the clerical party would therefore prefer to see the Bill dropped.

As "a sign of the times" we may refer to a startling article which appeared in the Gloucestershire Chronicle on Saturday. This paper is the leading Conservative organ for an important Midland district, and is generally understood to be well informed. The article to which we refer is headed "The Doomed Bill." It describes the withdrawal of the Bill as an absolute certainty, and without a single word of regret. It begins with a reference to the speech of the new President of the Board of Education at Wynyard, on the 13th, in which Lord Londonderry kept absolute silence on the Education Bill—a silence that in itself is significant enough. In the same speech Lord Londonderry informed his Primrose League audience that it was their duty to be prepared for a General Election. The Gloucestershire Chronicle, in opposition to most newspapers, believes the hint was meant to be taken seriously. "We believe," it says, "that the Education Bill is doomed, and that a General Election may possibly be precipitated in the course of a few months."

P.S.A. WE have been long familiar with, and now there comes to us from Clifton the announcement of M.O.M. That is to say, Dr. Warschauer has arranged to hold a series of "Men's Open Meetings" in the lecture-room of Oakfield-road Church on the Sunday afternoons of the next three months. At the first meeting, on Sunday week, he is to give an inaugural address, "What? and Why?" and among the other subjects announced are "Shall Mars and Moloch Rule the World?" by Major Edwards; "The Social Teaching of the Sermon on the Mount," by Mr. J. Pearson; "England's Future," by Mr. W. R. Oxley; "The Present Position of Trade Unions," by His Honour Judge Austin; and "The Growth of Toleration" and "Religion and Theology in 1902: A Review" (this on Dec. 21), by the President. The meetings are intended for the free discussion of all religious, ethical and social questions of the day, and the platform is to be freely open to adherents of every school of thought. The opener of a debate is always to have the final word, and the object is "not to establish any particular ism or doxy, but to pursue and, if possible, ascertain true views."

UNVEILING OF THE JOHN SEDDON TABLET AT WARRINGTON.

ON Tuesday, Sept. 23, a tablet which has been placed upon the front of the Old Academy at Warrington was unveiled by Dr. Drummond, Principal of Manchester College, Oxford. The tablet, which is of Wedgwood ware, and was designed by Mr. Albert Warburton, bears a medallion portrait of John Seddon, the founder of the Academy, and the following inscription:—

The Warrington Academy was founded in this building in 1757, removing to larger premises in what is now Academy-street in 1762. This tablet was erected by the Warrington Society in 1902.

After the unveiling a meeting was held within the house.

Mr. WM. LONG, who presided, explained how, a few years ago, when the building was threatened with destruction, the efforts of a few gentlemen had succeeded in preserving it as a monument of historic interest. (The chairman did not mention, however, that this result was due in no small part to his own enterprise and enthusiasm.) In sequel to this the Warrington Society had been formed, one of whose objects was to preserve old buildings, and erect tablets or memorial stones, that it might be known to all time by what men and deeds they had been dignified.

Dr. DRUMMOND then delivered a most interesting historical address, in which he spoke of the settlement of John Seddon at Warrington in 1745, as minister of Cairo-street Chapel, and of the part he subsequently played in the establishment of the Warrington Academy. After the passing of the Act of Uniformity and other persecuting Acts, the Dissenters, shut out from the national Universities, were yet determined to secure for their young men a University education. Hence the remarkable succession of academies, conducted by individual men, beginning with that of Dr. Frankland, at Rathmel, in Yorkshire. When it appeared that the succession of these private academies was about to cease, a larger movement was initiated. Subscriptions were secured from all parts of the country, that old house was taken, and the Warrington Academy was established. Dr. John Taylor, of Norwich, was appointed the first Principal, and John Seddon became secretary and librarian, and ten years later he became rector of the Academy, responsible for its discipline, and succeeded Dr. Priestley in the chair of Belles Lettres. Although the Academy was founded by Dissenters it was never intended to be limited in its teaching; members of any denomination, and even Churchmen, came under its instruction in those early days. All their universities had been thrown open in the manner in which the Warrington Academy was thrown open with the single exception of theological chairs, but the Academy at Warrington anticipated what he hoped would yet be the case—the opening even of theological chairs in all the great public institutions. It was the principle of the Academy that instruction should be given in all the subjects pursued at the University. Naturally at first the professors belonged to the class of Dissenters, but they were laid under no obligation whatever in regard to their theological opinions, and so strictly was the freedom of the students respected that one of the friends of the College even remarked that if it were possible it would be desirable that the teacher's opinion should not be known, even to the pupils. That was going too far. Their present principle was free teaching as well as free learning, and the true principle was to say to the teacher, "Do all you can to find the truth. Speak freely and openly what you believe to be true. Give your students the best results of your thought and study, and leave them in absolute freedom to follow your teaching or reject it as may appear to them in accordance with the evidence." That was the course which the theological faculty which had survived from the old Warrington days sought to pursue. It was on account of that catholicity of principle that the citizens of Warrington, without inquiry as to political or religious classification, were alike interested in the Old Academy, which represented a public movement. It was intended to be public and was governed throughout by a public aim and a public spirit. Mr. Seddon, to whom he had just referred, was largely instrumental in founding the Public Free Library in Warrington. He was its first president, and he helped in the establishment of the Widow's Fund, which still existed, and of which he was also the first secretary. And so the Academy remained in that building for five years, when it was found necessary to erect larger premises, and the Academy (which had been pulled down) was erected in Academy-street. Various difficulties arose, but not until after John Seddon's death. He died suddenly in 1770. He had done a good work, for which he was most deservedly held in remembrance, and to him they had that afternoon erected a tablet that he might be remembered and honoured. The Academy came to an end ten years afterwards, but in order that it might not really cease, but be transferred to new ground, the cause was taken up by a few people in Manchester chiefly, who founded the Manchester New College, which, after various migrations, was now established in its beautiful home at Oxford. It was on account of his connection with that College that they had done him the honour to ask him to unveil the tablet. It had been a great pleasure to him to do so, and he hoped that all that was best and finest in the culture and spirit of the Old Academy might remain and grow in the good town of Warrington.

Alderman THOMPSON, chairman of the Council and treasurer of Owens College, Manchester, and one of its earliest students, also addressed the meeting.

A vote of thanks to Dr. Drummond and Mr. Thompson was moved by the Rev. MORLEY STEVENSON (Principal of the Warrington Training College), and seconded by the Rev. E. W. LUMMIS, the present successor of John Seddon at Cairo-street Chapel.

A vote of thanks to the chairman, moved by Mr. F. MONKS, and seconded by Councillor ARTHUR BENNETT (secretary of the Warrington Society), brought the meeting to a close.

IF we choose to be, we can be wanted in this world.—W. C. Gannett.

PROFESSOR HUXLEY AS A SCIENTIFIC AND PHILOSOPHIC THINKER.*

I.

THE materials for forming a just estimate of the character and labours of Professor Huxley exist now in abundance. Few men's fortune has it been, within so brief a period from death, to have had their work and personality thus carefully preserved for posterity. The "Life and Letters," given to the world by his son, is a fascinating and delightful book, the very pattern of what a good biography should be; and it is to be hoped the publishers will soon see their way to re-issuing it in some such form as the recent popular edition of Darwin's "Life and Letters." The four massive volumes of "Scientific Memoirs," just completed, furnish a monumental memorial of a career almost unparalleled for incessant intellectual activity and for constant engagement upon original research of the highest value and significance.

Truth-Seeker and Biologist.

Those whose acquaintance with Huxley has been confined to the Essays, now collected into nine volumes of "The Eversley Series," will gain an altogether different idea of him from the sources mentioned. The editors of the "Memoirs" tell us that the progress of biology during the past fifty years was largely due to labours of his of which the general public knew nothing, and they are of opinion that "he was in some respects the most original and most fertile in discovery of all his fellow-workers in the same branch of science." In the pages of the Biography, it has been said—by one who had the right to say it—"the reader has the privilege of being brought into as frank an intimacy with Huxley as was enjoyed by even his closest friends." First and foremost, he appears there as the earnest and painstaking investigator, continually approaching nature with well-designed questions, and skilfully framing a medium of communication by which the answers could be conveyed. A man of Huxley's temperament would, indeed, never have been content with the quiet, secluded life of his friend Darwin; but there is more than a touch of pathos in his son's description of how, in his busiest years, when official work and the duties of his professorship crowded upon him, he would steal a precious half-hour by driving back from the Home Office to his laboratory at South Kensington before returning home to St. John's-wood, in order to pursue his anatomical studies. A better illustration than this of the tremendous cost at which genuine scientific research in England is often carried on it would be difficult to imagine. And scarcely less noteworthy than the value of Huxley's work in itself is the spirit in which it was undertaken. "So far as I understand myself," he says, "my faculties are so entirely confined to the discovery of truth, that I have no sort of power of obscuring it." "If wife and child and name and fame were all lost to me, one after another, as the penalty," he protests to Kingsley in 1860, writing after the death of his little boy Noel; "still I will not lie." And then, in golden words which deserve to be reckoned among the proverbs of the English language, he adds: "The most sacred act of a man's life is to say and to feel, 'I believe such and such to be true.' All the greatest rewards and all the heaviest penalties of existence cling about that act." We, in these days, are drifting into mental habits, in which it would be as much for our moral as our intellectual salvation to recognise the profound significance of that supreme maxim of conscientious veracity.

His Scientific Investigations.

Huxley's original contributions to science are so many and various that only two or three of the more important can be selected for comment here. There is, however, no possibility of thoroughly understanding his attitude towards the problems of philosophy and religion, unless account be taken of his more special biological pursuits, and, in considering him in the former capacity, there is a particular interest in asking, how far he was consistent in applying the processes of inquiry and the methods of proof, which served him in such good stead as a scientific investigator.

For the purpose indicated, one "Tendenz" of Huxley's mind ought to be emphasised at the outset. He differed, namely, from Darwin in a very marked and essential respect. Darwin was a naturalist par excellence; his characteristic strength lay in the wonderful patience and subtlety with which he conducted observations of living organisms in their native haunts, and under the actual conditions of organic existence. "There is very little of the genuine naturalist in me," reports Huxley of himself; "I never collected anything, and species work was always a burden to me; what I cared for was the architectural and engineering part of the business." Physiology, "the mechanical engineering of living machines," was, he confesses, the only portion of his professional course that really and deeply interested him; his aim was devoted to working out the unity of plan in the construction of thousands of diverse living organisms, and "the modifications of similar apparatuses to serve diverse ends." There is always danger in a too-exclusive and one-sided concentration upon this aspect of the living world. It tends inevitably to an altogether disproportionate and undue stress being laid upon mere mechanism; to a belief in it as a fundamental and ultimate principle of explanation; and to a hasty reduction of vital processes to forms of physical energy and material force. A preconceived theory is thus easily carried to the interpretation of spiritual phenomena, and, since the facts are in consequence already dyed and coloured at the start, one may be sure of the result, as in the case of orthodox Apologetics, from the very beginning of the enterprise.

Wer will was Lebendig's erkennen und beschreiben,
Sucht erst den Geist heraus zu treiben,
Dann hat er die Theile in seiner Hand,
Fehlt leider nur das geistige Band.

Memoir on the Medusæ.

The physiological bent of Huxley's mind becomes at once apparent in his classical memoir on the Medusæ, written whilst as a man of little over twenty he was voyaging over southern seas, and accepted and published by the Royal Society in 1849. The Medusæ, a large family of lowly organised oceanic creatures, included within the class Hydrozoa, had previously attracted the attention of numerous observers, but no satisfactory investigation of their nature and constitution had been attempted. Huxley attacked the problem in a large and systematic way, and his researches were of epoch-making importance in the history of biological science. In the first place, from the point of view of structure, he demonstrated that the organisms in question were built up of two thin cell-layers, or "foundation membranes," an outer and an inner (to which the names Ectoderm and Endoderm respectively have since been given), disposed round a central sac or rudimentary stomach-cavity. In fully formed Medusæ, the outer membrane becomes differentiated into the skin and nervous system (the existence of which, however, at that time appeared doubtful to Huxley, but has more recently been established), and the inner membrane forms the lining of the stomach-cavity and the alimentary organs. In the second place, from the point of view of relationship, or affinity, as he called it, Huxley examined a number of other families belonging to the class Hydrozoa, and found that they were organised upon a plan essentially similar to what he had discovered in the Medusæ. Thus the first step was made towards the modern scientific method of grouping animals together on account of their real identity of structure, instead of according to the superficial external resemblances adopted by the older naturalists. But not only so. In a passage of remarkable insight, Huxley calls attention to the fact that the outer and inner membranes of the Medusæ appear to bear the same relation to one another as do the serous and mucous layers of the vertebrate embryo, the former developing into the muscular system, the latter into the organs subserving the purposes of nutrition and generation; or, in other words, that in the embryonic development of all the higher animals a stage is gone through recapitulating exactly the condition of things exhibited in the Medusæ. "This discovery," says Professor Allman, "stands at the very base of a philosophical zoology, and of a true conception of the affinities of animals"; it supplies, in fact, the key to the solution of the problems that form the subject-matter of the new science of embryology.

The Cell-Theory and Protoplasm.

In later papers, still continuing his way towards the central doctrine of unity of plan in the mechanism of living organisms, Huxley was led to a searching review of the "Cell-Theory," as formulated by Schleiden and Schwann in 1838. He came to the conclusion that the theory in question consisted of two portions of very unequal value. In so far as it offered an ultimate anatomical analysis of living beings, it was perfectly true that the substance of vegetable and animal tissue was built up of cells; but in so far as it professed to regard the cell as the ultimate unity of vital activity, the theory was without justification.

* "Life and Letters of T. H. Huxley." By his son Leonard Huxley. Two vols. Macmillan and Co., 1900. "Scientific Memoirs of T. H. Huxley." Edited by Professors M. Foster and E. Ray Lankester. Four vols. Macmillan and Co., 1898-1902.

The living body has often, and justly, been called "the house we live in." Suppose that one, ignorant of the mode in which a house is built, were to pull it to pieces, and find it to be composed of bricks and mortar, would it be very philosophical on his part to suppose that the house was built by brick-force? But this is just what has been done with the human body. We have broken it up into "cells," and now we account for its genesis by cell-force.

In short, the cell is the unit of structure, and not the unit of function. It is not the cause but the result of organisation. Cells are to the tide of life what the shells and weeds on the seashore are to the tide of the sea—a view, we are informed upon the highest authority, which, after forty years of immense progress, is becoming more and more the accepted tenet of biologists. For Huxley it furnished a basis for establishing the identity of structure in animals and plants. He laid down in the clearest way what is now matter of elementary knowledge that the slimy contents of the cells, the substance to which the name "protoplasm" has been given, is essentially the same in composition from one end of the living world to the other, and that, in many cases, it is a mere matter of convention whether we call a given organism an animal or a plant. A plant, as he picturesquely expressed it, is "an animal confined in a wooden case, and Nature, like Sycorax, holds thousands of 'delicate Ariels' imprisoned within every oak."

Before Darwin's "Origin of Species."

These investigations were published in 1853, six years before the appearance of "The Origin of Species," and it is obvious how pointedly they were making for some kind of theory of Descent. Unknown to himself at the time, other researches of his, chiefly of a palæontological character, and disclosing the intimate affinity between birds and reptiles, were tending also in a like direction. And yet, prior to the advent of Darwin's book, Huxley was a strenuous opponent of the conception of "progressive development," as it was then called, and contended that there was "no real parallel between the successive forms assumed in the development of the life of the individual at the present, and those which have appeared at different epochs in the past." Whilst admitting a process of evolution within each typical group of organisms, he did not believe that any transition of a lower type into a higher ever occurred. Indeed, curiously enough, the very principle which lay at the basis of the Darwinian hypothesis is rejected by him, in 1856, in so many words.

Regard a case of birds, or of butterflies, or examine the shell of an echinus, or a group of foraminifera, sifted out of the first handful of sea-sand. Is it to be supposed for a moment that the beauty of outline and colour of the first, the geometrical regularity of the second, or the extreme variety and elegance of the third, are any good to the animals? * that they perform any of the actions of their lives more easily and better for being bright and graceful, rather than if they were dull and plain? So, to go deeper, is it conceivable that the harmonious variation of a common plan which we find everywhere in nature serves any utilitarian purpose?

"Who," he asks again, "has ever dreamed of finding an utilitarian purpose in the forms and colours of flowers, in the sculpture of pollen-grains, in the varied figures of the frond of ferns?" And he even goes to the extent of maintaining that features such as these are "manifestations of the highest and noblest art," and that, if we have a right to assume an infinite Intellect and Benevolence, then, from the existence of a beauty and of a harmonious variety in nature, we are bound to conclude that "the æsthetic faculties of the human soul have also been foreshadowed in the Infinite Mind."

Structure and Life.

How comes it, then, that a man of Huxley's intellectual penetration should have come so near to the idea of Evolution and yet have remained so far from recognising it as he was in those Pre-Darwinian years? The explanation lies, I think, readily to hand, and it is, at the same time, full of instruction in regard to the true method of approaching the phenomena of life. No one, of course, would dispute that for certain purposes and within certain limits, the category of Mechanism may, with perfect legitimacy, be applied to the investigation of living bodies. But the boundary is soon reached when, even from a strictly scientific point of view, the conception of Mechanism can carry us no further. Possible, as it is, to regard an organism as being, in one sense, a machine, there is always another aspect in which such a view of it utterly breaks down. Whatever else it may be, it is at least a living or self-acting machine, and, in the fact of life, or self-activity, the fact of mechanism is transcended and transformed. So long as attention is confined merely to structure, the "engineering part of the business" may yield valuable information, but the moment you are concerned with growth or development, the attitude of the engineer becomes wholly and entirely inadequate. Now, growth or development, the tendency to self-maintenance and self-advancement, as opposed to the dissipation and downward trend of physical energy in the inanimate world, is just exactly what we mean by Evolution, and it is no wonder, therefore, that Huxley, confining himself almost exclusively to the material constituents of organisms, should have been standing on the threshold of a region he was not able to enter. No theory of Evolution has ever been acquired as the outcome of mechanical considerations alone.

Lamarck and Darwin.

The conception of Lamarck, for example, was openly and avowedly teleological, in the sense that it presupposed psychical, as distinct from physical, activity, and that was the ground probably of Huxley's life-long distrust of it, although many modern biologists are attempting to reinstate and support the main contentions of the older naturalist. Lamarck held that variations in the structure of an existing bodily organ or the production of a new organ resulted from new needs or wants arising and continuing to be felt by the creature concerned, and from the new movements which these needs or wants initiated and sustained. Thus, he supposed that the stretching of the giraffe's neck to reach the foliage it required for food enabled it by degrees to add a cubit to its stature, and that the efforts of some short-necked bird to catch fish without wetting itself had, with time and perseverance, given rise to our herons and long-necked waders. In other words, changes of structure were due to conscious, or, at least, sentient, changes of function on the part of the organism, directed to meet altered conditions in its environment; these changes were confirmed or strengthened by use or repetition, and all that had been changed in this way in the individual was conserved by generation and transmitted to the descendants. It is true that the Darwinian theory has much more the appearance of dispensing with the notions of purpose or end than the Lamarckian, and that Huxley would, from that reason alone, have found it more congenial to his mode of thought. Natural Selection blindly working upon accidental variations blindly produced seems, no doubt, a purely mechanical process. But there is little difficulty in showing this to be a wholly misleading description of Darwin's real teaching. In the first place, as already pointed out, the theory was based, not upon anatomical analysis of organic structures, but upon actual observation of the conditions of existence and of the modes of life and action of organic beings in the midst of those conditions, * and it was originally suggested to its author's mind by reflection on the conscious selection exercised by man in the production of artificial breeds. In the second place, such phrases as "adaptation," "function," "advantage," "sexual selection," and the like, phrases of constant occurrence in Darwin's writings, are no whit less teleological in import, and imply just as certainly psychical factors, as the conscious wants and needs that played so essential a part in Lamarck's conception. And in the third place, unless resort be made to some such notion as that of conscious effort or striving on the part of the organism to adjust itself to altered conditions, and the consequent change of structure resulting from repetition of such effort, no account is furnished of the origin of the multitude of slight variations which must be there before Natural Selection can act at all. For clearly we are but shelving the real problem, if, in order to account for the large variation that must come about in the development of a higher from a lower species, we are obliged to assume an indefinite number of small variations, of which no account can be given. Large or small, it is the fact of variation, not simply the quantity of it, that requires explanation,† and we do not rid ourselves of that difficulty by the device of reducing the variations to such very little ones! Evidently, then, however unaware of it he might sometimes have been, Darwin was working throughout with teleological conceptions, and had he adopted and consistently applied Huxley's maxim, that life is as much the result of the nature and disposition of the molecules of protoplasm as the properties of water are the result of the nature and disposition of its molecules, we may safely assert he would have come no nearer to his theory of Evolution than Huxley himself did.

Acceptance of Darwin's Theory.

In an interesting chapter contributed to Darwin's Biography on "The Reception of

* Cp. Darwin's statement, "Natural Selection acts solely by and for the good of each."

* The same thing is true, of course, as regards Wallace's work.

† Cp. Darwin's question addressed to Huxley, "If, as I must think, external conditions produce little direct effect, what the devil determines each particular variation?"

the 'Origin of Species,'" Huxley has described the state of biological opinion prevalent at the time, and the grounds of his own conversion to the Darwinian hypothesis.

My reflection, when I first made myself master of the central idea of the Origin, was "how exceedingly stupid not to have thought of that." The facts of variability, of the struggle for existence, of adaptation to conditions, were notorious enough, but none of us had suspected that the road to the heart of the species problem lay through them, until Darwin and Wallace dispelled the darkness, and the beacon fire of the Origin guided the benighted.

His subsequent advocacy of the doctrine, and his own contributions to its support, are matters of a more familiar story and must be passed over here. Suffice it to remark that the "thätige Skepsis"—the doubt which so loves truth that it neither dares rest in doubting, nor extinguish itself by unjustified belief—the attitude of mind he commended at the outset to students of Darwin's work, remained his own to the last; throughout life he "absolutely disbelieved in use-inheritance as the evidence stood," and he felt that the logical foundation of Darwinism was insecure so long as experiments in selective breeding did not produce varieties which were more or less infertile; but he accepted the theory as a "working hypothesis," and as a fruitful instrument of research. It shed a flood of light upon vast stores of facts he had been gradually accumulating, and it set him at once on the track of further discoveries.

The Utility of Theory.

And this leads us to notice, as furnishing a convenient mode of transition to the philosophical field, Huxley's view of the logical method that ought to be pursued in scientific investigation. He was fully alive to the consideration that science might be swamped in mere minutiæ, and that an illuminating idea is often of more value than cartloads of empirical details. "Progress can only be made," he insists, "by a careful combination of the deductive method with the inductive, and by bringing the powerful aid of the imagination, kept, of course, in due and rigid subordination, to assist the faculties of observation and reasoning." The utility of an hypothesis he regards as two-fold—to the original investigator its worth consists more in what it suggests than in what it teaches; for the mass of men, and for the worker himself, it provides a system of artificial memory absolutely necessary. "Those who refuse to go beyond fact," he writes again, "rarely get as far as fact; and anyone who has studied the history of science knows that almost every great step therein has been made by the 'anticipation of nature,' that is, by the invention of hypotheses, which, though verifiable, often had very little foundation to start with; and, not unfrequently, in spite of a long career of usefulness, turned out to be wholly erroneous in the long run." In other words, science for him consisted in a body of rational conceptions, under which empirical details might be reduced to order and rendered intelligible; it was as much a product of reason and even of speculative insight as the most a priori system of Metaphysics or Theology. "The world is absolutely governed by ideas," he said, and he had no desire to "weaken the foundations of rational certainty."

LITERATURE.

SIR LESLIE STEPHEN ON GEORGE ELIOT.*

SIR LESLIE STEPHEN'S "George Eliot" is a much happier effort than Mr. Paul's "Matthew Arnold" reviewed in these columns a few weeks since. Our newly-created knight of literature is a critic in the true and best sense of the word. He carefully analyses the characteristics of the writing or the writer under notice, allowing himself admiration as freely as censure, and presenting a total impression organic and distinct.

In the present volume the outward story of Mary Ann Evans is briefly sketched, and the relation of the scenes and characters of her novels to localities and persons familiar to her childhood and youth is indicated in suggestive fashion free from the exaggeration which finds a portrait in every individual and a recollection in every incident. But the book is mainly a series of careful criticisms of George Eliot's successive works from "Scenes of Clerical Life" to "Daniel Deronda."

Among the notes of Sir Leslie's criticism, more or less common to him and other critics, but presented by him with great force and lucidity, are the opinions that George Eliot's earlier work has its roots in memory and experience, which give it a more life-like reality than the later work, in which persons are too often but the incarnation of specific philosophical or ethical ideas; that while her women are real, her men are either women or at best women's men, and even Adam Bede it appears would never have had the virility to fight Arthur Donnithorne but for Mr. Lewes's intervention; that she totally fails in catching the atmosphere of life other than that of the England which she knew, and, for example, places Romola in no real Florence and Fedalma in no real Spain—Romola and Tito were only "masquerading" in Florence. Romola was, in fact, "a cousin of Maggie Tulliver"; and finally that George Eliot is no poet, an opinion which appears to be almost unanimously held by critics. At the end Sir Leslie Stephen thus sums up the position of George Eliot as an author:—

> We feel that the writer with whom we have been in contact possessed a singularly wide and reflective intellect, a union of keen sensibility with a thoroughly tolerant spirit, a desire to appreciate all the good hidden under the common-place and narrow, a lively sympathy with all noble aspirations, a vivid insight into the perplexities and delusions which beset even the strongest minds, brilliant powers of wit, at once playful and pungent, and, if we must add, a rather melancholy view of life in general, a melancholy which is not nursed for purposes of display, but forced upon a fine understanding by the view of a state of things which, we must admit, does not altogether lend itself to a cheerful optimism. I have endeavoured to point out what limitations must be adopted by an honest critic. . . . But when I compare her work with that of other novelists, I cannot doubt that she had powers of mind and a richness of emotional nature rarely equalled, or that her writings, whatever their shortcomings, will have a corresponding value in the estimation of thoughtful readers. (Pp. 205-6.)

This is a verdict entirely without superlatives; but, taken clause by clause, it carries very lofty praise, and with it the George Eliot enthusiast (and I write myself down as such) must needs rest content. And yet one would have liked some recognition and explanation of the extraordinary power of George Eliot to impress, absorb, and delight; a power manifest in all her novels and, in my opinion, in most of her poems too, and a power so diffused that, for my own part, whichever of her books I happen to have read last, except "Felix Holt," and perhaps "Daniel Deronda," and of course "Theophrastus Such," I always remain for many days afterwards under the vivid conviction that that is certainly the greatest of all her achievements.

Although the verdict seems to have gone forth that George Eliot was not a poet, Mr. Richard Hutton, I remember well, described her poems to me as "the recreation and delight of literary men." And for my part I cannot give up her claim to the poet's rank. I throw over "A College Breakfast Party"; but the pen that wrote "The Spanish Gypsy," "Armgart," "The Legend of Jubal," "How Lisa Loved the King," and "Brother and Sister," is certainly, I think, the pen of a poet. It is true there is often a lack of music; so there is in Browning. If vivid picture have anything to do with poetry, who can ever forget the picture of Fedalma dancing in the public square, or that wonderful group chiselled forth in living and breathing marble in the passage beginning—

> The tribe of Cain was resting on the ground,
> The various ages wreathed in one broad round.
> Here lay, while children peeped o'er his huge thighs,
> The sinewy man embrowned by centuries?

Note, too, the power of tragedy with which Armgart's sorrow—deemed apparently by Sir Leslie trivial—is impressed upon the heart, and the exquisite and pathetic simplicity of the recollections of the old home-life in "Brother and Sister." Nor does Sir Leslie Stephen's way of treating "The Spanish Gypsy" seem quite worthy. He complains that Fedalma's interview with Zarca, her father, affords no sufficient ethical motive for the sacrifice of her own happiness and that of her betrothed. This is how he sums up the crucial scene:—

> She is on the eve of marriage to a typical Spanish noble, with whom she is passionately in love. To her enters abruptly one of the gypsies. He explains without loss of time that he is her father; that he is about to be the Moses or Mahomet of a gypsy nation in Africa; and orders her to give up her country, her religion, and her lover to join him in this hopeful enterprise. She is, of course, a good deal put out, and explains some obvious objections; but after exchanging some paragraphs of blank verse, she walks off with her parent, leaving a short note to inform her lover that she can have nothing more to do with him. (Pp. 163-4.)

Now there is no dramatic or tragic situation in all literature that cannot be vulgarised and made to seem absurd by this sort of cheap description, and Sir Leslie Stephen seems to me here sadly to have lapsed from that sympathetic insight which alone can give understanding and appreciation. It would be just as easy, and precisely as just and helpful, to make game of the soliloquy of Hamlet or the passion of Othello; and if the critic had approached "Adam Bede" or "The Mill on the Floss" in the same mood, he could without difficulty have made these also appear ridiculous.

But for them he has much more respectful treatment; and in the exact measure of his respect his criticism becomes luminous, suggestive, and informing. And the chapters which treat in succession all the great novels of the fifties, the sixties, and the seventies are delightful reading, helping the lover of George Eliot to rationalise, without impairing, his admiration. To the early novels Sir Leslie Stephen does full and ample justice. I think he fails to recognise the full merits of "Middlemarch," and I do not understand his depreciation of the Garths, father and daughter, two of the most living and lovable of the great novelist's creations. To me it has always seemed that "Middlemarch," while exhibiting afresh all the wonderful gifts revealed in "Adam Bede," adds to the earlier books a further note of power in the extraordinary skill with which the society of a whole country town, with all its various centres of life and interest, is woven into one whole and vivid picture—the Brookes, the Vinceys, the Garths, Lydgate, Bulstrode, and Casaubon, all stamped with an individuality and reality which are the product of the highest imaginative and plastic genius. Curiously enough, if there be one figure that hardly seems so real or so "convincing," it is that of Ladislaw, whom, after reading Sir Leslie's vivacious description of G. H. Lewes, one is irresistibly compelled to view as drawn in part at least from life. With this description this brief account of a charming and instructive monograph must conclude.

> He (Lewes) was what is generally called a Bohemian, though always with a serious ambition. He could converse ably upon all such matters as interested literary and journalistic circles in London, and his wide knowledge of continental writers gave him an authority in some matters not shared by many English contemporaries. He was a brilliant talker, fully able to turn his knowledge to account. His conversation abounded in lively anecdotes, told with infinite zest; he was thoroughly genial, and ready at good-humoured repartee; and he was not hampered by any excessive reverence for conventional proprieties. He was of slight figure, and, according to Douglas Jerrold, the "ugliest man in London." It would be presumptuous to express any opinion upon the justice of so sweeping an observation. But if not beautiful, he was a man to forget, and to induce companions to forget, any such defects. He had bright eyes and a fine brow, and the whole face and bearing was full of intelligence. A social gathering must have consisted of very ponderous interests, if it could not be stirred into animation by a man with so much more quicksilver in his composition than falls to the lot of the average Briton. Nobody, one might guess, was more likely to dazzle the grave young lady, profoundly interested in philosophy, and anxious to get the newest lights in speculation, than this daring and brilliant writer, who knew all that was being done in France and Germany, and could talk with equal confidence upon Comte or Hegel or upon the last new play or oratorio in London. (Pp. 45, 46.)

THE COMING UNITY.*

WE are no believers in the possibility of a reunion of Christendom on the basis of the creeds. Historically fictitious, philosophically impossible, and religiously misleading, these ancient documents are without promise for the regeneration of that spiritual life which is at once a Church's evidence and object. Nevertheless, as a stepping-stone to higher things, we are glad to see any effort undertaken to turn these our "dead selves" to account, and in all matters of controversy anything that may serve to a clearer definition of the issues involved is to be heartily welcomed in days when such issues are too frequently obscured in a cloud of hazy rhetoric or the vagueness of metaphors and generalities. In contrast to such an attitude here is a passage from a back number of the Church Times in which there is no lack of precision:—

> We have often had occasion to affirm that the drift of undenominationalism is in the Unitarian direction. Our contention has just as often been derided or flatly denied, although the facts on which we relied were obvious enough. . . . At the rate at which the descent from Christianity to Unitarianism is proceeding, the time cannot be far distant when those who still value the primary doctrines of the Christian faith will have to consider their position, and ask themselves whether doctrinal Christianity can be found outside the pale of the Church, which continually recites and unswervingly cherishes the ancient creeds of Christendom.

We may take it, then, that there is in the Churches (and in the Church of England not less than elsewhere) a large measure of latent Unitarianism, as it were in solution, needing only to be precipitated by the introduction of some "test." Mr. Harvey's book is in effect a proposal to apply such a test, and if it were carried out the result would be highly instructive. If people would only attempt to explain to themselves what they mean by the formularies they use, many would be astonished at the unsuspected heresies of which they are guilty. How many Tritheists have we calling themselves in all good faith Trinitarians? The tapestries in the choir of Cologne Cathedral are extremely difficult to explain on a basis of "The Ancient Creeds of Christendom." But for the most part compromise, compromise, compromise settles everything. The trumpets give an uncertain sound. Your Jowett signs the articles; and the man who thinks Hegel in his study preaches Hooker in his pulpit. A very distinguished Unitarian told the present writer that he had himself been told the ministry of the Church of England was wide enough to include him. It would mean, of course, consent to wear a muzzle of phrases. But what is the value of a watch-dog muzzled?

We need say no more about this book beyond that it is well written, in a refreshingly broad and charitable spirit, with evidences of acquaintance with strong writers, if not of any depth of independent research. Let us close with a quotation from the volume, though our readers may, perhaps, give to the words an application more comprehensive than their author would endorse:—

> Without the growth of this spirit of brotherliness no action on the part of those in authority would be of much use, but in proportion as it pervades the Churches the solution of the problem of our present unhappy divisions will steadily and rapidly work itself out. There are no real barriers to remove, only imaginary barriers, the products of a false interpretation, and of a special theory of the ministry which has no place in the Prayer-book.

We fear that some of the author's co-religionists would call this last clause a petitio principii. But let divines settle these things amongst themselves, and let us be ready to hear them in a friendly spirit when they have determined what they mean to say.

DENT'S COUNTY GUIDES.*

THE great pleasure we found in Mr. Collingwood's Guide to the Lake Counties in Messrs. Dent and Co.'s series of County Guides led us to turn to the other volumes of the series already issued, and the anticipation with which we opened these books on Hampshire, Norfolk, and Surrey, was not disappointed. The series is edited by Mr. G. A. B. Dewar, the author of the Hampshire Guide, on a uniform plan, and with admirable result. The larger half of each volume consists of a series of Itineraries, by means of which the author takes us through one district of his county after another, describing what is most charming in the scenery, pointing out whatever is of most interest to be seen, and weaving into the narrative much historical reminiscence and matter of biographical interest in a manner which adds greatly to the pleasure of the ramble. Thus one comes to realise the marvellous richness of our English counties, and not only the wealth but the endless variety of natural beauty. It makes one see that there can never be any lack of delightful holiday places close at hand within our own borders, and that their interest can never be exhausted. Even if one has no chance of ever traversing half the country so described, it is pleasant reading, and delightful to feel that this is our own country, and that there is so much for our people to enjoy.

In the second part of each volume there are chapters by special writers on the birds, flowers, geology and various forms of sport in each county, and then follows a concise Gazetteer of the county, which, with the Index references to the Itineraries, helps one to abundant information as to all places about which one is likely to inquire.

The editor rightly says, in his preface to the series, that these books are not merely for the use and amusement of visitors to the counties; they will be quite as welcome to residents. Each writer is an enthusiast for his own county, and happily we have not to decide which is the most beautiful and rich in interest.

"Hampshire" was the first volume to be issued two years ago, and very fittingly while Winchester was preparing to celebrate the Millenary of Alfred. Other special interests in the county are found in

"Charles Kingsley's Country," about Eversley, and "Gilbert White's Country," about Selborne, one of the most charming of villages, with its Hanger and the long Lithe, which would be delightful to linger in even if the old naturalist had never been heard of. Then there is the New Forest, and in the Isle of Wight the special interest of Tennyson's home near Freshwater.

In Norfolk, also, there is the cathedral city, and a wealth of beauty of many kinds, which will astonish strangers to East Anglia, the long coast line, and the Broads (with 200 miles of navigable river), a paradise for the naturalist no less than for the eager boatman.

Of Surrey we must not begin to speak, but we advise those who do not already know to get this book and see for themselves. We will only add that Mr. Symington's illustrations contribute greatly to the charm of all three books.

THE lesson of Mrs. Humphry Ward's Vacation School experiment at the Passmore Edwards Settlement in Tavistock-place has been emphasised by the Bishop of Hereford, who related in the Times of Friday week what has been done during the past vacation in his own cathedral city. Hereford has only about 22,000 inhabitants. "But even here," the Bishop says, "we have mean and crowded streets, and gutter life in such streets during the rather lengthy summer holidays of six weeks becomes very monotonous and unhealthy for the children, and tends, moreover, to undo much of the good work of school time." So the loan was obtained of some elementary school buildings in the city, and notice was given in the other schools before they broke up, that a vacation school would be held there. For four days in the week (avoiding market day) the school was open from 10 to 12, and the average attendance was a little over 300, the largest attendance being 364 of boys and girls in equal numbers.

THE school opened with a daily religious lesson by the vicar of the parish, assisted on one or two occasions by a friendly Nonconformist minister, who is also one of the managers of the school where the meetings were held. In addition to kindergarten work for the younger children, drill, singing, &c., special attention was given to nature study, and lantern lessons took the children for various trips into the country. Drawing and clay-modelling were also very popular, and visits were paid to the city waterworks, the public gardens, and the Cathedral, where the officials joined in the friendliest way in ministering to the interest and pleasure of the children. The superintendent reports that the work proved most interesting to the teachers, and gave unbounded pleasure to the children, and everything went as smoothly as possible. The cost was about £45, and the Bishop points out that it might be considerably less if, under the superintendence of a capable teacher, volunteers of sufficient culture and goodwill would undertake the work. There must be scope for it in every provincial town of any size, as well as in the metropolis.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

The Brother of Mercy.

IN the year after he published "Snow-bound," telling about his old home, Whittier brought out another little book which was very popular. It was called "The Tent on the Beach," and contained a number of old stories told in verse. They were written mostly during the war time, or just after, and Whittier, feeling that they might be thought "too light for serious years," especially in the half-playful way in which they are linked together, excuses it by saying that they were written in "the enforced leisure of slow pain."

He pictures three friends camping one summer in a tent on the sea-shore, he himself being one of them, and in the evening he reads to the other two some of his poems. In the introduction, describing himself, he says that, though a born dreamer, he had to turn from his poetry to the anti-slavery fight,

> Making his rustic reed of song
> A weapon in the war with wrong.

He seemed to himself too quiet a man to make much impression on the people amid the tumult of that storm,

> A silent, shy, peace-loving man,
> He seemed no fiery partisan
> To hold his way against the public frown,
> The ban of Church and State, the fierce mob's hounding down.

But we know with what steadfast courage he did his duty, and how through his poems of indignation against the great wrong and in praise of the noble workers for freedom, he did make his voice heard.

Yet all the while, he says, his poet-visions haunted him:

> The common air was thick with dreams,—
> He told them to the toiling crowd;
> Such music as the woods and streams
> Sang in his ear he sang aloud;
> . . . . .
> And as the gray old shadows prompted him,
> To homely moulds of rhyme he shaped their legends grim.

There are stories of the New England coast, which he knew as a boy and now put into verse, and there is one story of Italy, or rather a picture from that distant land, with a touching and beautiful lesson in it. It is in the poem called "The Brother of Mercy."

It pictures an old man, Piero Luca, at Florence, who for many years had fulfilled his humble duties as a porter in the city, and had also belonged to the "Brothers of Mercy," but now is lying on his death-bed. It is a beautiful evening, in the spring-time, and the gardens of the city are filled with lovely blossom; but nothing of this can be seen in the dim place where the old man is lying, while a monk is watching by his side.

Then in the stillness he hears the tinkle of a bell from the street below, and the measured tread of a number of men walking together and carrying some burden. Piero knows at once that it is some of the Brothers of Mercy, with whom he used to work, carrying the body of someone who is dead. He feels that he ought to be with them at their work of mercy and tries to rise, but sinks back with a moan of pain, and then laments that he can no longer help, as he was wont to do.

But when the monk thinks to comfort him by telling him that now his work is done, and he is to have his reward in heaven, where he will sit crowned in glory and rest for ever, that seems to the old man a dreary prospect, and he feels that he could not be himself in such grand company. It would be hard to sit there all the time, > doing naught

> With these hard hands, that all my life have wrought,
> Not for bread only, but for pity's sake.
> I'm dull at prayers: I could not keep awake,
> Counting my beads. Mine's but a crazy head,
> Scarce worth the saving, if all else be dead.
> And if one goes to heaven without a heart,
> God knows he leaves behind his better part.
> I love my fellow-men: the worst I know
> I would do good to. Will death change me so
> That I shall sit among the lazy saints,
> Turning a deaf ear to the sore complaints
> Of souls that suffer? Why, I never yet
> Left a poor dog in the strada hard beset,
> Or ass o'erladen! Must I rate man less
> Than dog or ass, in holy selfishness?
> Methinks (Lord, pardon, if the thought be sin!)
> The world of pain were better, if therein
> One's heart might still be human, and desires
> Of natural pity drop upon its fires
> Some cooling tears.

That seems to the monk a terrible thing to say—that any anyone should think it better to go to hell, to help those who are suffering there, rather than to heaven! He flies from him in terror, and the old man is left to die alone. But he from his troubled thoughts sinks back to the prayer "Thy will be done!"

And then in the stillness he feels as though some tender presence is bending over him, and a gentle voice, like his mother's, speaks very tenderly to him:

> "Never fear!
> For heaven is love, as God himself is love;
> Thy work below shall be thy work above,"
> And when he looked, lo! in the stern monk's place
> He saw the shining of an angel's face!

It was no matter what the monks might teach about heaven and hell, his own heart of simple goodness was his best teacher. As he himself loved to be helpful and was full of pity so he might be sure that God also was loving and pitiful, and would wish him always, in heaven just as much as on earth, to be busy with his work of love.

That is the lesson of the poem, and it is one which Whittier repeats in many other ways. It was the great truth which made his own life noble and beautiful.

MR. STOPFORD BROOKE'S study of "The Poetry of Robert Browning" is published this week, in a companion volume to his delightful "Tennyson." A full notice of the book we hope to publish next week. The following sentences are the opening of an article upon it by Mr. G. K. Chesterton, in Thursday's Daily News:—

Mr. Stopford Brooke writing on Robert Browning will be to most of those who know anything of either, an important thing. For whatever other differences they may have, both are alike in this, that they have, in the age of change and scepticism, saved innumerable souls, and both alike in this, that they have maintained in that age the eternal and commonsense necessity of religion.

OUR CHURCH POLITY.

AT the meeting of the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire, held at Altrincham last June, the Rev. E. W. LUMMIS gave an address on "Organisation," the substance of which he has since embodied in a carefully written paper, which will be found in the September number of the Seed Sower. The subject is one upon which it is eminently desirable that we should have clear conceptions, both as to the principles on which our Churches are founded and the method by which their common life in one religious fellowship may best be maintained, and also, in view of their past history, as to our present duty and the lines of progress upon which our energies ought chiefly to be concentrated.

The "We" of whom Mr. LUMMIS speaks, and with whom we are here concerned, are, broadly speaking, the people gathered for religious fellowship and work into the 362 churches in these British Isles mentioned in the list of the "Essex Hall Year Book," and included within the comprehensive title of the "National Conference of Unitarian, Liberal Christian, Free Christian, Presbyterian, and other Non-subscribing or Kindred Congregations." These Churches, it must be recognised, have been brought together into one religious fellowship by various causes—partly by repulsion from more orthodox communions, partly by the attractive power of agreement on the broad lines of Unitarian teaching and the principles of liberal religion, some have been the fruit of distinctly propagandist work by Unitarians—but there is one characteristic (we would fain hope) now common to them all: They are free and undogmatic Churches, they hold to the fundamental principle of non-subscription to any form of doctrine. Unitarians have indeed founded many of them, but with Unitarians faith in a Free Church must be fundamental. Many of these Churches, indeed, are called Unitarian Churches, which on the face of it implies a particular form of doctrine, and the whole community is popularly known as the Unitarian body. On this Mr. LUMMIS says:—

> Some of us, it is true, are willing to speak about a Unitarian Church; but these would define the adjective in such a way as to exclude any specific theological meaning. Most of us, believing that the word is still generally understood in a theological sense, prefer, whenever we speak of our loosely-knit community, to avoid it, and to make use of an unqualified pronoun.
> Into the old question of the name we do not propose to enter here; we are anxious to deal with the facts of the religious life of our community. And this we take to be a fundamental fact of our Church life, that we hold to the principle of freedom, and in the fellowship of our religious life refuse to set up any dogmatic limitations. We believe in the divine power of Truth, and in order that Truth may indeed prevail our Churches must be Free.
> It is therefore of a community of Free Churches, in which the people are pledged to utter loyalty to Truth, that Mr. LUMMIS asks, Ought they to be organised for more effective life? And we will at once quote here the concluding passages of his paper, in which he deals with the objection to such organisation, which goes deepest:—
> Lastly, there are some who take higher ground. They declare that a Church organisation must always be a peril to freedom. In history all assaults upon freedom of conscience can be traced to a distrust of God's self-revelation, and an attempt to limit inquiry by premature definition. If we found a Church upon the directly opposite principle, she will offer no menace to freedom, but a glorious safeguard. Our love of freedom depends upon our love of truth. It is because we would be guided aright that we drive no nails into the compass, but allow the Polar needle to waver and tremble at its own longing. The short way to cramp our freedom is to blunt our love of truth; and the short way to blunt that, or any other faculty, is to forbid it its natural expression.
> Organisation is necessary to our intellectual life. The exponents of such a principle as ours ought to be in the forefront of theology—the keenest, sanest critics, the pioneers of spiritual discovery, the most helpful comforters of the soul with freight from the voyages of mind. To attain all this the mere elemental impulse is not enough; it must be equipped. Books, teaching, intercourse, co-operation, are needed, and they must radiate from a central point. The work of Manchester College must be magnified, glorified, extended. The work of building up a great school of philalethian divines is an urgent work, and it is our work, and only by organisation can it be performed.
> And most important of all, by neglect of this task we impair our spiritual health. It calls us, and we can do it or shirk it, but we cannot disown it. Our message is God's message, the world needs it, and we are sent. Shall we go to the world with it, or content ourselves with muttering it behind our open door? To those who love our quiet seclusion too well, and shrink from the bustle of a larger Church life, may be commended these closing words from a thrice famous tract: "I cannot praise a fugitive and cloistered virtue, unexercised and unbreathed, that never sallies out and sees her adversary, but slinks out of the race where that immortal garland is to be run for, not without dust and heat."

That is finely put, and we are entirely convinced of the justice of this plea. Our service of Truth is service of GOD, and it needs to be more effectively equipped, for its own progressive life and for clearer and more powerful demonstration to the world.

But when Mr. LUMMIS has so defined the meaning of our service of Truth, there remains something more to be said as to the foundations of our Church life. The principle of openness to truth is, indeed, a fundamental characteristic of our Churches, but it is not that principle which constitutes them Churches. A society which is formed simply for the investigation and dissemination of truth is not a Church. The very essence of the Church is that it is for the worship of GOD and the cultivation of religious life; and the quality which distinguishes genuinely free Churches from others is, that in them those who gather for worship are convinced that it must be with minds open to all the light of Truth, because that is the very light of GOD.

The recognition of this fundamental fact is doubtless implied in Mr. LUMMIS's paper, but it seems to us important that it should be explicitly stated, because it is at this point that we must look for every quickening of fuller life.

It is the Churches, in which there is a true fellowship of worship and of work, that need to be strengthened, and then to be drawn together into closer union of sympathy and mutual helpfulness and common work, by whatever method of organisation appears to be the best.

Mr. LUMMIS has no hesitation as to the course which ought to be pursued:—

> The task of fulfilling this duty has already been begun. In the National Conference we have such a living machine. It is imperfect, even rudimentary, as yet; but it possesses continuous life; its church roll realises a corporate unity; its assemblies, committees, and sub-committees are limbs that work, and can already point to worthy results of their efforts. It behoves us now to complete what we have begun, by making the National Conference as effective a machine for our grand purpose as it lies in our power to make it. The lines of progress are obvious. They continue those along which we have already come. Those inspiring assemblies, to which more than anything else we owe our sense of membership one of another, must be made annual. Why, in all conscience, should two years out of every three be deprived of this great aid to God's work for man? The powers of the committee must be enlarged. The treasurer's fund must be abundantly increased. If this work is worth doing at all, ought it not to be done as thoroughly as our energy, intellect, and wealth can do it?

But at this point we are met by a very serious practical difficulty, which has grown with our growth, and was already firmly established as a circumstance in the life of our community before the National Conference was thought of.

Our idealists (and we count our selves of their number), asking for a consistent Church polity on the principle of undogmatic fellowship, see in the National Conference, which is representative of our Free Churches, the natural completion of such a system. Yet the fact remains that the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, a society, avowedly not representative of Churches, but of individual subscribers pledged to "the diffusion of the principles of Unitarian Christianity," has for many years occupied the field as a central Treasury and Administrator of funds for the strengthening of our Churches and the direction of missionary efforts. There may be little logic in the situation, but the Association has so interpreted the "principles of Unitarian Christianity" that for many years its helpful work has been done in a manner entirely congenial to the spirit of our Churches. It has gained a wide experience and practical efficiency, and has become the trusted friend of the Churches.

We should therefore strongly deprecate any attempt at sudden revolution in the order of our Church polity, with the inevitable confusion and dissension that it would cause. Evolution, not revolution, should be our watchword, and notwithstanding what Mr. LUMMIS says on the subject, we believe that to the individual Churches and the District Associations we ought to look in the first instance, as the field in which the work of regeneration must begin. There must be a deepened sense of the responsibility of membership in the individual Churches, more of the true spirit of devotion and self-sacrifice and mutual helpfulness, and then the meaning and the opportunities of the District Association of Churches will grow clearer. When the Churches have recognised the duties of brotherhood among their immediate neighbours, and have proved themselves in their own field capable of united action, and have thus been more thoroughly trained in fidelity to their fundamental principles, then, and then only, will they be fit to take their place in a National Union of Churches. Thus, out of the natural unfolding of a genuine religious life, our difficulties in the matter of organisation will solve themselves.

IT is difficult to act a part long, for where truth is not at the bottom, nature will always be endeavouring to return; and will peep out and betray itself one time or other.—Bishop Smith.

THE DOGE'S PALACE IN VENICE.

THE modern traveller reaches Venice by a long railway-bridge from the mainland, and enters the city, as it were, by the back door. In old days the approach was from the sea. The trader or ambassador sailed up the Adriatic with the blue waters at his feet and the blue sky over his head, and a line of mountains in the distance. As he drew nearer, the tall tower of St. Mark's, now unhappily a ruin, rose high above the lagoons. Making his way among islands and fishing-boats, gulls and moving masses of sea-weed, he would step ashore at last on perhaps the most beautiful quay in the world. In front of him would stand two granite columns, of a single stone each, brought from Tyre, with figures at the summit respectively of St. Theodore, the former patron of Venice, and a winged lion. Passing between these columns he would enter a square, with the Doge's Palace on his right. Next to the Palace, facing a much larger square, was the old Church of St. Mark, the resting-place, it was believed, of the body of the evangelist. Above the central doorway of St. Mark's were the four bronze horses—the only horses in Venice—from Constantinople. By another entrance were pillars from Acre, and figures cut in porphyry from Greece. Apart from the church in the square stood the huge Bell Tower; and close by rose three red masts, the trophies of conquest in the Mediterranean. Probably, also, the visitor saw flocks of pigeons used as messengers between Venice and her dependencies.

The Venetian Character.

As I have said in a recent article, the Venetians were originally landsmen. Flight from the Goths to the mud-banks of the Brenta made them seamen. By stress of circumstance they became fishermen and sailors, and at length lovers of the element they conquered. They grew into a strong-armed, broad-chested, ruddy-faced people, with great presence of mind and keen delight in the glowing colours of the Italian shore. They were very different from the Florentines. They were not ascetics, nor saints, nor dreamers. Dante and Fra Angelico would have found Venice uncongenial—it may be, intolerable. Yet Venice had her Christian gentlemen—her honourable merchants, her public-spirited and princely statesmen. She had also her beautiful women and children. Her artists were colourists, who painted what was wholesome and pure and dignified, and never descended, until her fall, to anything mean or foul. Shakespeare gives us a true picture of the Venetian character. Antonio is generous; Bassanio is lavish—a spendthrift—but not base. Shylock appeals to the honour of the Senate. When Bassanio pleads—

> Wrest once the law to your authority;
> To do a great right, do a little wrong;

the answer is

> It must not be; there is no power in Venice
> Can alter a decree established.

Where the Doge's Palace joins St. Mark's Church is a stone pillar from which the laws of the republic were read to the people, and on which exiles stood for two days before their banishment. On the church wall above, by an ancient Madonna in mosaic, are two small lamps which have perpetuated for three or four centuries the repentance of the city for an unjust judgment. Two stories are told of it—one of a baker's boy condemned for a crime of which he was afterwards proved innocent; the other of a certain Giovanni Crassi similarly punished, and ten years later found to be guiltless.

Structure of the Palace.

Now what sort of a palace or town hall did these people build for their duke or lord mayor?

Picture to yourselves two rows of white Gothic arches, one above the other, supporting a broad, rose-coloured marble wall. This wall is pierced by windows, that in the centre being larger than the rest, with a balcony. This is the appearance of the building on the two sides facing the sea and the square. A third side is hidden, joining St. Mark's Church; the fourth, which looks down on a narrow canal, is in a later style, and may be seen from a gondola. Unfortunately the roof is flat and invisible. If the building had had its Gothic, tall-pointed roof added, it would be probably the most beautiful secular edifice in the world. A glance across the square at a heavy, thick-set Renaissance mansion emphasises the delicate qualities of the Gothic. The ponderous circles and columns of the Renaissance work seem to groan under a trifling burden; the palace, on the other hand, is lifted on slender but powerful pointed arches like a building in the air. So powerful are these Gothic arches that when a fire destroyed the interior of the building, the walls remained firm and practically uninjured.

Early Venetian houses were built on colonnades. The ground was so low and so damp, and so often flooded by a high tide, that it was necessary thus to raise them. Later, when the foundations of the city were stronger and higher, the old style was for a time preserved. The Doge's Palace, therefore, as an historical building should, recalls the former difficulties and labours of the citizens. Another purpose served by these arches was the provision of a promenade out of the heat of the sun and in view of the sea. The second row above afforded a similar walking space for the senators, who came from their council chamber to take the air and look upon the port whose destinies were in their keeping.

The Sculpture of the Columns.

And what further did they see, both citizens and people, as they walked in the pleasant shade? Just over their heads, and almost within reach of their fingers, were series of Gothic sculptures. The thirty-six columns of the lower arcade, and the seventy columns of the upper are adorned with figures and emblems, comprising, as it were, two great picture-books in stone for the pleasure and instruction of the city. A visitor might spend a month in studying them and be always finding something new and beautiful. I saw representations of the virtues and vices, love and marriage, nations, the ages of man, trades, arts, and sciences, the months of the year, the planets, men of justice, philosophers, kings, children, birds, lions, and all sorts of animals, grotesque monsters, sports, baskets of fruit, and many other things. I must be content to mention only a few of them.

In the upper arcade, where the senators walked or sat and conversed of affairs of state, is the figure of Venice as a queen, with the inscription Fortis et justa trono furias, mare sub pede pono—which means "Strong and upright, I set wrath beneath my seat, the sea under my foot." It expresses the mind of the city in her best days, when she trusted in righteousness as well as in her navy to make her powerful. Many a statesman must have looked at this sculpture with pride—or later with humiliation.

In the lower arcade, that for the citizens, is a story full of wisdom and pathos. It represents eight stages of love. It you like, it is a mediæval love tale. The artist was very human, and wanted to give men and women a true view of a subject about which they sometimes go dreadfully astray. We see the lovers admiring each other. They meet and speak; they exchange gifts; at length they embrace, and are wedded. A child is born, and they hold it in their hands. They are now more to one another, bound together by a new and sacred tie. The child grows, and is happy, and gives happiness. But one day the child is dead. The young parents mourn over the little body. They are yet closer to each other, having a child in Heaven. And, like a true artist, the sculptor tells us of the deepening of their characters. You may observe that when they are lovers they are very neat and particular in their dress, that they take pains about appearances. But in their joy in their child, and again in their sorrow for its death, they forget such matters, caring for something beyond themselves.

Principles of Venetian Government.

On the three angles of the palace visible to the eye are conspicuous sculptures, intended to convey the leading principles of Venetian Government—Just Judgment, Resistance to Temptation, Sobriety, and Filial Obedience. Of the first, the Judgment of Solomon, I have spoken in the article referred to. It is near the gate of the palace, to encourage or restrain those who enter. At the opposite corner is Noah and his sons, Ham and Shem and Japhet. Noah is drunk on the ground. His venerable face and flowing white beard, splendidly carved, intensify the pitifulness of his degradation. "Here," says the artist, "is humanity, created a little lower than the angels, to be crowned with honour and glory, fallen, by servitude to his appetites, below the level of the beast." Divided from their father by the stem and leafy branches of the vine are Shem and Japhet, and behind them crouches the impious Ham. Above the group is the archangel Raphael, followed by Tobit bearing a scroll with the inscription, "Make the bay calm, we beseech thee, O venerable Raphael."

On the central corner is a sculpture of the old story of free choice between good and evil. Adam and Eve stand beside a fig tree, round which the serpent curls itself. Above them the archangel Michael holds a sword and says, "With this sword I protect the good and purge the crimes of evil." It is the symbol of conscience, the Sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God in man's heart, strengthening him in the doing of what is right, wounding him when he does wrong. The capitals of the pillars at this central angle are particularly interesting. On the upper are the four winds, facing north, south, east and west; on the lower is man, as the child of God, the object of the care and watchfulness of the heavens. Christ enthroned creates Adam out of dust and Eve from a rib. The planets in their houses, or constellations, look down upon them—the Sun, Jupiter, Mars, Saturn, Venus, Mercury and the Moon, with various characteristic emblems. For example, the Moon sits in a boat and floats down the stream holding a crescent in her hand. The Venetians had reason to respect the mistress of the tide. Without the daily ebb and flow of the sea the waters of the city would become pestilential, and the difference of a few feet would flood half the houses and fill the lower stories with sand and weed.

The Decadent Interior.

But let us now leave these noble cornerstones, which might suggest thought to the builders of modern town halls, and walk into the palace, through a large square court and up a flight of steps to the state chambers.

These chambers were burnt, and rebuilt in the sixteenth century, when Venetian faith and citizenship were on the decline. Formerly they had been painted by Bellini and his pupil, Carpaccio, and no doubt were covered with pictures of religious history and symbolism. But we are struck now with the worldly spirit of the decoration. In the hall, for instance, where Venice welcomed her foreign ambassadors, we see not "Fortis et justa trono furias, mare sub pede pono," but "Venice, the never undone, the unconquered, the guardian of freedom," and similar mottoes. In an ante-chamber is a picture by Titian of a Doge kneeling before Faith—a splendid piece of colouring, but otherwise purely secular. Mr. Ruskin says:—"The figure of Faith is a coarse portrait of one of Titian's least graceful female models. The eye is first caught by the flash of the Doge's armour. The heart of Venice was in her wars, not in her worship."

But let us enter the great council-room, which contains work of the gifted and serious Tintoret. Round the chamber are seats for the senators. At one end, raised up, is the Doge's chair. In the middle of the ceiling, visible to the whole assembly, is a great picture by this artist, crowded with beautiful figures and glowing with rich harmonies. It represents a queen in the sky, enthroned among the clouds, not the Queen of Heaven, the Madonna, but the Queen of the Mediterranean, Venice herself—no longer the worshipper but the worshipped. Beneath is the ocean, a fine piece of sea-painting, an expanse of blue rolling water with white crests, out of which rise gods and goddesses, tritons and nereids, with offerings of pearl, coral, shells, and all the treasures of the deep; and about her throne, paying her reverence, are the greater heathen deities. The whole is pagan, frankly pagan, and full of self-glory—an embodiment of the Venetian spirit at the close of the sixteenth century.

The Dead Christ.

And Tintoret knew it. The old painter, the last great painter of Venice and of Italy, represented the city as she loved to be represented; and probably, in a further picture, on the wall at the end of the room, behind the Doge's chair, we may see his comment upon it. Looking from the ceiling to the Doge every man in the council-room might see it—a painting again of Venice, with her towers and palaces, and in the forefront, adored by two of the city fathers, a Dead Christ. Yes, a Dead Christ. Once the Venetian senators had bowed down before a Living Saviour. The people had known disgrace and adversity, and by work and prayer had changed them into blessing, lifting their homes and churches above the mud waste. Now in the days of her pride, delighting in luxury, trusting in her material power, Venice knelt before a Dead Ideal.

When does Christ die? Not when honest opinions about him are changed; nor when men cease to believe in wonders recorded of him in Scripture; nor when they reject the old dogma of his Divinity; but when they no longer have the spirit of Jesus, and cease to love God and Man, and are puffed up by the sense of their own wisdom and power, and forget their need of Divine Mercy. Christ is dead to us when we have faith in money instead of in righteousness, in ships and guns rather than in the arm of the Lord, when we grow accustomed to the sight of sin and misery in our streets and in hardness of heart declare that we cannot help it, when we spend much on eating and drinking, on costly and showy works that give no noble happiness to men, and go to church to fulfil a social function and not to gather strength for the work of the Kingdom of God. Then is our Saviour dead, and we bend before a corpse.

EDGAR I. FRIPP.

A STUDY IN HUMAN NATURE.*

III.

AFTER describing the Religion of Healthy-mindedness, Mr. James concentrates his attention on the opposite type, represented by the hosts of people whose moral and spiritual growth is not and never could be like the harmonious progress of the once-born.

The Divided Self: Religious Cases.

He shows the point of view which a temperament organically weighted on the side of melancholy loves to occupy. He dwells at length, and with great sympathy, on two cases of religious melancholy which are also cases of genius: Bunyan, in "Grace Abounding," and Tolstoy, in "My Confession." He then proceeds to show the cause from which religious melancholy so often results: an inner constitution which from the outset is lacking in harmony and balance—the impulses inconsistent with one another, so that the will follows now this, now that—the passions often excessive—the life usually haunted by regrets:—

> A little inconsistency will only count as an amiable weakness; but a stronger degree of heterogeneity may make havoc of the subject's life. There are persons whose existence is little more than a series of zigzags, as now one tendency and now another gets the upper hand. Their spirit wars with their flesh, they wish for incompatibles, wayward impulses interrupt their most deliberate plans, and their lives are one long drama of repentance and of effort to repair misdemeanours and mistakes. . . .

* "The Varieties of Religious Experience: a Study in Human Nature." Being the Gifford Lectures on Natural Religion, delivered in Edinburgh in 1901 and 1902. By William James, LL.D., &c., Professor of Philosophy at Harvard University. London: Longmans and Co. 12s. net.

This is the religious melancholy and "conviction of sin" that have played so large a part in the history of Protestant Christianity. The man's interior is a battle-ground for what he feels to be two deadly hostile selves, one actual, the other ideal. . . . Wrong living, impotent aspirations; "What I would, that I do not; but what I hate, that do I," as St. Paul says; self-loathing, self-despair; an unintelligible and intolerable burden to which one is mysteriously the heir.

St. Augustine's case is a classic example. If we wish to regard these things intelligently—neither magnifying them as unique experiences due to special visitations of God, nor dismissing them with contempt as due to neurosis, hysteria, &c.—we must remember that they are only intense forms of experiences which are more common than is supposed, and not entirely unknown even to the once-born. Who does not know what it is to feel an inner incompleteness needing to be remedied, an inner discord to be resolved? In its specially religious form this is based on the fact that man has a dual nature and is connected with two spheres of existence, a shallower and a profounder sphere, in either of which he may learn to live more habitually. Thus we come upon the truth in the old idea that there is a natural and a spiritual life, and that by surrendering the former we gain the latter.

The Divided Self: Non-Religious Examples.

The inner division need not, however, necessarily assume the religious form. It may take place with any sort of mental material; and the happiness of release from it is great in proportion to the severity of the previous discord. The release may come gradually, or it may come abruptly; but however it come, it brings a characteristic sort of relief—"and never such extreme relief as when it is cast into a religious mould." In the latter case we have what is called "conversion":—

To be converted, to be regenerated, to receive grace, to experience religion, to gain an assurance, are so many phrases which denote the process, gradual or sudden, by which a self hitherto divided, and consciously wrong inferior and unhappy, becomes unified and consciously right superior and happy, in consequence of its firmer hold upon religious realities. This at least is what conversion signifies in general terms, whether or not we believe that a direct divine operation is needed to bring such a change about.

But just as the discord need not be connected with religious subjects, so neither need the regeneration be. Religious regeneration, in the ordinary sense, is in fact only one species of a genus that contains other types as well:—

For example, the new birth may be away from religion into incredulity; or it may be from moral scrupulosity into freedom and license; or it may be produced by the irruption into the individual's life of some new stimulus or passion, such as love, ambition, cupidity, revenge, or patriotic devotion. In all these instances we have precisely the same psychological form of event—a firmness, stability, and equilibrium succeeding a period of storm and stress and inconsistency. In these non-religious cases the new man may also be born either gradually or suddenly.

Among his illustrations Mr. James quotes from the French thinker Jouffroy. His doubts had long harassed him; but on a certain night his disbelief grew fixed and stable, and the immediate result was sadness at the illusions he had lost. Our author also describes the sudden conversion of a prodigal spendthrift to extreme parsimoniousness and avarice. The "explosive" ways in which emotions such as love, jealousy, guilt, fear, remorse or anger, can seize upon us are familiar to all. The man who has illustrated most things in life has shown us this also—for remorse, see Othello after the murder; for anger, Lear after Cordelia's first speech to him. There are also recorded numerous "conversions" which are purely ethical, as in cases of habitual drunkenness. John B. Gough's case, for instance, is practically the conversion of an atheist—neither God nor Jesus being mentioned. In this connection Mr. James quotes the opinion of the founder of the Salvation Army, that the first vital step in saving outcasts consists in making them feel that some decent human being cares enough for them to take an interest in the question whether they are to rise or sink.

The explanation which Mr. James gives of conversion is the key to his whole point of view.

Explanation of Conversion.

In the first place, conversion, whatever it may seem to those who undergo it, is not a supernatural creation of a "new man." We see this by applying Mr. James' favourite "pragmatic" test—"by their fruits ye shall know them":—

The believers in the non-natural character of sudden conversion have had practically to admit that there is no unmistakable class-mark distinctive of all true converts. The super-normal incidents, such as voices and visions and overpowering impressions of the meaning of suddenly presented Scripture texts, the melting emotions and tumultuous affections connected with the crisis of change, may all come by way of nature, or, worse still, be counterfeited by Satan. The real witness of the spirit to the second birth is to be found only in the disposition of the genuine child of God, the permanently patient heart, the love of self eradicated. And this, it has to be admitted, is also found in those who pass no crisis, and may even be found outside of Christianity altogether.

Further, conversion does not require—in order that anyone may attain to it—any particular views of God or of Christ; it may indeed take place with any kind of theological belief or with none. This is in direct opposition to the evangelical view.

In the second place, conversion is not a mere pathological disturbance. At bottom it rests upon the common nucleus of fact to which under all their discrepancies the creeds unanimously bear testimony: that "there is something wrong about us as we naturally stand. . . and that we are saved from the wrongness by making proper connection with the higher powers." The whole course of investigation pursued by Mr. James forms a continuous demonstration that new spiritual energies do in point of fact arrive upon us, their fruits being unmistakable. And in identifying ourselves with these higher energies and making them our ideals, we become conscious that "they are conterminous and continuous with a MORE of the same quality"—a source or fountain of such energies, as we might say—existing beyond the narrow limits of the conscious self. What is this "more" with which we make connection? Whatever else it may be, it is the subconscious continuation of our conscious self. By the "subconscious" or "subliminal" is meant that region of our mental life which lies beyond the thoughts and feelings of which we are clearly aware.

The Subconscious Self.

The whole mind of man is essentially one; a smaller portion is to a varying extent illuminated by consciousness, while around this stretches the larger part, in contact on one side with the highest spiritual influences, and on another intimately bound up with the rise and fall of the physical energies of life. This region is the larger part of each of us, for it is "the abode of everything that is latent, the reservoir of everything that passes unrecorded or unobserved." The late Mr. F. W. H. Myers and others may have carried the theory of a "subliminal self" too far; but there is no doubt that, since the time when Dr. W. B. Carpenter wrote of "unconscious cerebration," there has been an accumulating mass of facts to prove that there really is a part of us, beyond ordinary clear consciousness, where impressions, thoughts, &c., may not merely lie dormant, but actually develop themselves—sometimes almost as if they constituted an independent personality.

The application of this to the explanation of religious experience is made by Mr. James as follows. The subconscious may contain tendencies, moral proclivities or possibilities, of a different character from those which had been governing the conscious life. They may have been inherited, or the mind may for long have been gathering them to itself in obscure ways from experience. At length these subconscious energies burst through into full upper consciousness, taking command of the affections and aims, of the whole life, in fact. Hence "conversion"—that is, change in mental development by a sudden transition or crisis—can only take place with persons in whom there is a certain cleavage between the conscious and subconscious regions of the mind, so that in the latter may be gathered moral forces different from those in possession of the former. When the influences, maturing in subconsciousness, are of a higher moral and spiritual worth than any to which the conscious struggling self has attained, and they burst through to consciousness "explosively," we have a case of sudden "saving conversion." When there can be regular and harmonious intercourse between the two regions we have the kind of growth characteristic of the once-born. Mr. James seems to us to have made good his case; and, speaking as a scientific psychologist, he has a right to say:—

We have in the fact that the conscious person is continuous with a wider self through which saving experiences come, a positive content of religious experience which is literally and objectively true as far as it goes.

And, further, still speaking from the strictly scientific point of view, this reference of a fact to the subconscious does not exclude the possibility that divine agency may be present in it.

Divine Influence may be Subconscious.

So far, we have scarcely transgressed the limits of scientific fact. But Mr. James makes a further contribution to that great enigma of the spiritual life.

He modestly asks indulgence for it as an "hypothesis," and speaks of it as one of his "over-beliefs"—those beliefs which we all have in every department of life, and which go beyond what is scientifically deducible from clearly conceived facts; and if we discarded all over-beliefs our intellectual furniture would become scanty:—

The further limits of our being plunge, it seems to me, into an altogether other dimension of existence from the sensible and merely "understandable" world . . . So far as our ideal impulses originate in this region—and most of them do originate in it, for we find them possessing us in a way for which we cannot articulately account—we belong to it in a more intimate sense than that in which we belong to the visible world, for we belong in the most intimate sense wherever our ideals belong. Yet the unseen region in question is not merely ideal, for it produces effects in this world. When we commune with it, work is actually done upon our finite personality, for we are turned into new men, and consequences in the way of conduct follow in the natural world upon our regenerative change.* But that which produces effects within another reality must be termed a reality itself, so I feel as if we had no philosophical excuse for calling the unseen world unreal. God is the natural appellation, for us Christians at least, for the supreme reality, so I will call this higher part of the universe by the name of God.

Thus the "more" with which we find our ideals to be connected is not simply the subconscious part of ourselves; it has its roots in—or is "continuous" with, as Mr. James would say—a larger Power that is friendly to us and to our ideals. He speaks of this idea as an "hypothesis"; but evidently it is something more than this. He frequently speaks of it also as an interpretation of experience. Individuals are conscious of an intercourse between themselves and a larger Power to which they feel themselves to be related. This phenomenon connects itself specially with the highest objects of endeavour—Truth, Beauty, or Goodness: when something ideal, something that at first seems only a dream of future possibility, seems to become more than this, and to bring us into direct connection with a present Reality larger than ourselves, ready to help us as we try to make the ideal a part of ourself. In this we have the real basis of religious belief, without which such belief could never have arisen; and were this foundation to fail, theologies and churches would speedily become extinct among us.

Divine Influence not a mere Hypothesis.

The present writer is not perhaps well qualified to criticise this view of the basis on which religion rests, because he had already convinced himself of its truth before these lectures were delivered. As we have seen, Professor James states it in connection with the psychological distinction of the "fully conscious" and the "subconscious," and teaches that divine comfort and guidance are received through our subconscious self, where the life of the soul has its roots in God. Professor James' exposition of this basal spiritual truth in connection with the psychological doctrine aforesaid is rich in suggestiveness and interest. It is not likely to find favour with our academical psychologists, most of whom have preferred to ignore the evidence in favour of the belief that there is a large subconscious region of the mind. They limit the meaning of the "subconscious" to those impressions which are just outside the focus of attention, on the margin of consciousness: such as the ticking of the clock in the room when we are engrossed in writing or thinking. It is true that many of the speculations to which Professor James refers with approval are likely to remain sub judice for a long time to come; but the "subconscious self" is a fact of which account will have to be taken.

The present writer had stated the principle in another way—by trying first to make clear the significance of the fact that our knowledge of ourselves is partial and fluctuating at the best, and has many varying degrees of truth. The whole personality of a man—all that makes up his selfhood and is involved in it—must be in him as a matter of immediate experience; but he does not know what is in him until his intelligence has wakened up sufficiently to interpret the facts of this inner experience. Thus, the region of "full sunlit consciousness" consists of what we experience and (to some extent) think about or understand; the region of "subconsciousness" consists of what we experience but do not understand, and perhaps not think about at all.* These variations in self-knowledge account for the fact that there are so many who believe themselves to have knowledge by experience of intercourse with the Divine, and so many more who cannot admit that they experience anything of the sort. Such surface-work as our ordinary knowledge of ourselves does not usually—nor often—embrace the deeper sides of our being. The soul of man may be in vital union with the life of God and continually derive spiritual energies from that life, and yet we may have no clear, distinct perception of it, while we experience its immediate action.

Professor James' Gifford Lectures afford what seems to be a convincing demonstration, that this experiential view of the basis of religion is a sound one.

To follow Professor James in this respect is not to accept the details of the "philosophical" construction which he suggests. To some of these points we must direct attention in a concluding article.

S. H. Mellone.

Interest in Mr. Jupp's recent articles has led to several inquiries as to H. W. Dresser's books, and we may note here that three of them are published in this country by Messrs. Gay and Bird, 22, Bedford-street, Strand: "The Power of Silence," "Voices of Hope," and "The Perfect Whole." A series of extracts from the first and last of these is also published, under the title, "The Heart of It." The price of these four books is 3s. 6d. net each. Other books by Mr. Dresser, published in America, may also be procured through Messrs. Gay and Bird. These are "Living by the Spirit," 75 cents, and "In Search of a Soul," 1.25, and a monthly periodical, The Higher Law.

* When speaking thus we must remember that for some men these changes arrive suddenly, for others gradually, while others again enjoy them all their life as part of the natural growth of mind and character.

MANCHESTER DISTRICT SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

AN APPEAL.

The extension of the work of this Association has enabled the officials to render more effective aid to a large number of Sunday-schools, principally in Lancashire and Cheshire. The admirable syllabus of lectures and subjects for examination of scholars, the lists of lantern slides, temperance speakers, and the periodical issue of musical publications have long been recognised features. A new departure was made when the Holiday Home at Great Hucklow, Derbyshire, was established. The initial cost for the erection and furnishing of the Home reached £1,500, and of this sum only £200 remains to be secured. That such an experiment would meet a growing necessity has been proved by the Home becoming self-supporting. The Association has further maintained a Convalescent Home at Blackpool, kindly provided by Mr. C. C. Grundy, where numbers of scholars from thickly-populated districts have been greatly benefited. The increasing work has, however, considerably taxed the financial resources of the Association, and it has become necessary to make this appeal. Arrangements are being made to hold a bazaar next year in the Lower Mosley-street Schools, Manchester (kindly lent for the occasion), with the object of raising at least £1,000. Subscriptions are earnestly invited from all interested in Sunday-school work, and may be sent to the Bazaar Treasurer, Mr. J. H. Pimley, 44, Bishop-street, Moss Side, Manchester, or the Secretary, the Rev. A. Cobden Smith, 52, Barton-street, Moss Side, Manchester.

CORRESPONDENCE.

[The Editor is not responsible for the opinions expressed by correspondents. Letters cannot be inserted without the writer's name; and all private information should be accompanied by the name and address of the sender.]

LOYALTY TO TRUTH.

Sir,—It is satisfactory to know that, apart from prejudice, there is nothing in my previous letter that "any reasonable man would think of controverting." Mr. Mellor is needlessly alarmed by the apprehension of some "evil thing that is going to transact itself, in all its enormity and ugliness, through our congregations." I wish, for his own peace of mind, he could be happily delivered from this nightmare. I have already reminded him that the B. and F.U.A. is not a hotbed of ecclesiastical tyranny, but is simply a union of individual subscribers, incapable of interfering with anybody's religious liberty. Mr. Mellor credits me with the "astounding suggestion" that there is some analogy or other between the Wesleyan Conference and the B. and F.U.A. I never made any such absurd suggestion. On the other hand, I emphasised the difference between them in constitution, in function, and in ecclesiastical authority. The Wesleyan Church is a sect; the B. and F.U.A. is the name for a band of men and women associated for missionary purposes, having neither desire nor power to compel faith, to excommunicate for heresy, or to silence free inquiry. In my sermon I enforce the confession of one's own personal convictions as an element of loyalty to truth.

Well, I am, by conviction, a Unitarian; and, for the life of me, I cannot see that there is any sectarianism in such an affirmation of personal faith. Is it meant that we are to be loyal to truth and yet decline to indicate what we mean by truth? Mr. Mellor is under no necessity to become a member of the B. and F.U.A.; he is not compelled to call himself a Unitarian; he is at perfect liberty to withdraw his name from the "Essex Hall Year Book"; his congregation can call itself by any title it chooses; and I find that his Church is voluntarily affiliated to the Yorkshire Unitarian Union! Let your correspondent be at rest; there is no plot on the part of those whom he honours me by calling "my friends" to interfere either with his private faith or his public ministry. Why do not those who desire some ecclesiastical organisation at once set about to secure it? There is nothing to hinder them; there is no authority at Essex Hall to thwart them in the construction of an "English Presbyterian" or "Free Catholic" Church at whose portals "no Unitarian congregation need apply," and from whose "Year Book" (so we are warned) the very mention of the B. and F.U.A. is to be severely excluded. I fancy our brave old Association will manage to survive even such an anathema as that; it will not be a penny the worse; and, perchance, it will still contribute to the support of the very Churches within whose narrow borders there will be no room for its broad and generous growth. Twenty-eight years ago I renounced sectarianism and all its works; and, in the service of three Unitarian churches, I have found the joy of "the prophets free calling," though Mr. Mellor evidently thinks that I have incurred the terrible risk of adopting the "self-hired avocation of the spiritual quack-doctor."

FRANK WALTERS.

Newcastle-on-Tyne, Sept. 22.

THE AUTHOR OF "FESTUS."

SIR,—Most of the papers which refer to the late Philip James Bailey (THE INQUIRER among the number) give a criticism of "Festus," but omit any biographical details. I am sorry I cannot supply this omission to any extent, but one or two notes as to the poet's connection with Nottingham Unitarians and the High Pavement may be of interest to your readers.

Mr. Bailey was brought up among the Independents, and sat at the feet of the Rev. Josiah Gilbert, the well-known Congregational divine, and one of his early schools was that kept by Mr. Gilbert's co-pastor in the ministry of St. James's-street Chapel, Nottingham. His chief education, however, prior to his entering Glasgow University, was received from the Rev. Benjamin Carpenter, minister of the High Pavement, who at that time kept a school for boys, which was attended by the sons of many well-known Nottingham people. Bailey had as schoolfellows Robert Gregory, now Dean of St. Paul's, Kirke Swann (a relative of Henry Kirke White), Oldknow, and (among others) Richard Enfield, Alfred Lowe, of Highfields, Edward and Sydney Smith, Francis Hart, and Samuel Hollins—all sons of well-known Unitarians.

Mr. Carpenter taught his scholars Latin and Greek, the pupils reading Virgil and Horace, the "Iliad" and some of the works of the Greek dramatists. The class of books used for English reading and study appear to have been particularly good, and may have helped to foster the literary tastes of the poet. Bailey does not seem to have displayed any special poetical talent in his schooldays, but he took a good position in his class work. The lads had weekly "Judgment Books." Oldknow was always first, while Bailey and Richard Enfield were constantly bracketed equal, second.

After Mr. Bailey's final return to Nottingham a few years ago, he was a frequent attender at the High Pavement Chapel during Mr. Addis's ministry. He always, however, cherished an affectionate regard for the religious body in which his early years were spent, and cannot be claimed as a member of any denomination.

Nottingham, Sept. 17.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Aberdare: Highland-place.—The induction of the Rev. H. Fisher Short took place on Tuesday, Sept. 23. The devotional part of the service was conducted by the Rev. R. J. Jones, M.A., of Aberdare. Other ministers present were the Revs. D. Evans (Cwmbach), D. Rees (Rhondda), J J. George (Aberdare), and J. Morgan Jones, M.A. Lond., Congregational minister, Aberdare. The charge to the congregation was given by the Rev. John Ellis, of London, who, in the course of an earnest address, appealed to the congregation to give their minister time to read, to think and meditate. After time well spent in that direction he would come back to them with greatly increased power. There was a tendency nowadays of multiplying organisations—Sunday-schools, Literary Societies, Young People's Unions, Bands of Hope, and various other organisations with special objects in view. A great part of this work could be done by members, and the time of the minister could be devoted to more important duties. The prayer of dedication was then offered by the Rev. Alexander Gordon, M.A., who also delivered the charge to the minister, who was one of his students at the Home Missionary College. The church, he said, had its place and the ministers of the churches had their place; but as a means, not as an end. The end was the regeneration of the world. The end would not be attained even if their new and devoted minister filled the church with earnest members. The church must be a door through which souls might pass on to Christ. In order to be a door there must be that in them which drew confidence, which would bring people to see that through them they might be able to come into closer relation with things both divine and human. The minister would have to be sympathetic or he would not receive sympathy. He would have to come in contact with human nature; he would have to study the great book of books, and in this connection a great part of the secret of a minister's invincible power was his knowledge of the book of human nature. He would meet dark human nature and bright human nature; dry human nature and enthusiastic human nature. In gaining experience in this way he would be better equipped to meet the difficulties which must of necessity confront him. Not intellectual difficulties so much, but moral difficulties; difficulties of conscience and difficulties of character. To meet these it would require knowledge of human nature. He was entering a calling in which there were the sweetest joys. He would be certain to meet with disappointments; he would be disappointed with himself, disappointed with his opportunities, disappointed most of all with his own work. But in these hours he could turn to God and be sure that disappointment would not meet him there. Later in the evening a social meeting was held, Colonel S. Phillips in the chair, who extended a hearty welcome to the new pastor. Letters of regret at inability to attend were read by the secretary, Mr. L. N. Williams, from Mr. Carslake Thompson, Cardiff; the Revs. Copeland Bowie and Tudor Jones, Swansea.

Billingshurst. — Anniversary and Harvest Thanksgiving Services were held on Sunday, conducted by the Rev. G. Lansdown, and continued on Monday, when the Rev. F. Allen was the preacher. Subsequently a meeting was held, when the Rev. G. Lansdown and Mr. W. Carter offered a cordial welcome to the visitors from Horsham and elsewhere, and speeches, largely dealing with the Education Bill, were made by the Revs. E. S. Lang Buckland, A. J. Marchant, F. Allen, and J. J. Martin. Mr. Martin also congratulated the congregation on the adoption of the Essex Hall Hymnal.

Birmingham: Hurst-street Mission.—Sunday-school Anniversary and Harvest Festival Services were held last Sunday, conducted by Mr. W. J. Clarke, who delivered appropriate addresses to crowded congregations morning, afternoon, and evening. The chapel was very effectively decorated. An anthem, "Sing a Song of Praise," was excellently rendered by the Sunday-school choir, trained by Mr. C. Johnson, the Superintendent; and Dr. Gauls' anthem, "The eyes of all wait upon Thee," was beautifully sung by the chapel choir. The services will be repeated for the junior scholars on Sunday next in the Hall, the large congregations now regularly attending the chapel services making it impossible for Sunday-school scholars to be accommodated with the ordinary worshippers.

Bridgwater.—The annual treat of the Christ Church Sunday-school was held on Sept. 18, by kind invitation of the Misses Spiller, at Sunny Bank. On Sunday last very successful Sunday-school Anniversary and Harvest Thanksgiving Services were held. The preacher for the day—the Rev. G. V. Crook, of Taunton—gave appropriate sermons, both discourses being greatly appreciated. A good congregation assembled in the morning and a large one in the evening. The collections exceeded the amount taken in past years.

Clifton.—On Sept. 14 and 21 the Rev. Dr. Warschauer paid return visits to Old King-street Baptist Chapel, Bristol, to address the men's class, at their request, on the subjects "How Came Men to Think Jesus God?" and "The Unitarian Case Against the Doctrine of the Deity of Jesus." The attendances on both occasions were exceptionally large, fully 500 men being present on Sept. 21; and it may be at once recorded that the reception given to the lecturer was not only friendly, but cordial and almost enthusiastic. The address delivered by Dr. Warschauer before the same class two months ago, on the question "Did Jesus Claim to be God?" has evidently served to stir much theological interest, especially as the minister of Old King-street Chapel, the Rev. J. Moffat Logan, who is uncompromisingly orthodox, has in the meantime preached and published two sermons in reply to it. On Sept. 14 the lecturer treated his subject from a purely historical standpoint, showing how late the doctrine of the deity of Jesus began to be promulgated, how hesitatingly it was introduced, how long the belief in the humanity of Jesus remained the dominant one in the Church, and by what sanguinary means it was finally extirpated. Last Sunday he presented a survey of the whole question, maintaining the position that the orthodox doctrine could be justified neither from reason, Scripture, nor history, and repiying incidentally to arguments used by defenders of the popular theology. Both addresses were listened to with marked attention, frequent applause showing on which side the sympathies of a large proportion of the audience lay; and the discussions which followed gave the lecturer still further opportunities for clearing up misunderstandings and answering objections. A large quantity of Unitarian literature, generously supplied by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, was distributed among the men, 300 pamphlets proving all too few "among so many." For October Dr. Warschauer announces a course of evening sermons, in which the Rev. J. Moffat Logan's defence of the orthodox position will be examined.

Derby.—The Anniversary and Harvest Festival Services were held in Friargate Chapel last Sunday, conducted by the Rev. Principal Gordon, of Manchester, and on Monday the annual social gathering was held in the schools. After tea the chair was taken by the Rev. John Birks, F.G.S., who, in his opening remarks, referred to the work of the church, Sunday-school, and connected institutions, as affording ample scope for the exercise of all their powers in the love of God and the service of man. He also spoke of the increasing interest manifested in a truly national system of education, for which they had always stood—namely, unsectarian, efficient, and free. Their religious work was illustrated by the Parable of the Leaven, and they had great encouragement in the gradual broadening of the thought and life of the age, of which he gave several interesting facts. An earnest, practical address was delivered by the Rev. W. Lindsay, of Nottingham. Enjoyable music was given at intervals during the evening, and the meeting closed with the customary vote of thanks proposed by Mr. S. D. Hall, seconded by Mr. G. Kitching, to all who had in any way contributed to the success of the anniversary.

Gateshead.—In connection with the Band of Hope Union Conference in Newcastle-on-Tyne, special Temperance Sermons were preached at Unity Church last Sunday; the Rev. Rowland Hill, of Bedford, occupied the pulpit in the evening. The October Calendar announces a course of evening sermons on "Man and God," and a series of lectures on Tennyson's "In Memoriam," extending over the next three months.

General Baptist Assembly.—The 249th annual gathering was held at the Bethnal Green-road Chapel last week, delegates or ministers from the following places being present:—Bethnal Green, Billingshurst, Chichester, Deal, Deptford, Dover, Headcorn, Long Sutton, Portsmouth, Rushall, Saffron Walden, and Trowbridge. On Tuesday evening a religious service was conducted by the Rev. J. A. Brinkworth, and the Rev. G. Lansdown preached the annual sermon, taking for his subject, "Numbers not a test of strength." The sermon was instinct with courage and strong conviction, dwelling upon the power of truth, upheld by even a few faithful witnesses. On Wednesday morning, after a devotional service, conducted by the Rev. W. Harvey Smith, the Rev. Joseph Wain delivered the presidential address, in which he spoke of the strength of their position being in a loyal attachment to the principle of faith, faith being the utterance of the whole man, not a matter of demonstration, but of deep inward experience. He further dwelt upon that aspect of the religion of Christ which shows it to be the religion of progress, making for the establishment of the Kingdom of God. The power of their religion must make itself felt among the people by the influence of their personal lives. The business meeting was subsequently held, when the roll of the Assembly was called by the secretary, the Rev. C. A. Hoddinott, and the usual business was transacted. The Rev. G. Lansdown, on behalf of his church, invited the Assembly to meet next year at Billingshurst. A telegram of fraternal greeting was sent to the venerable Rev. Henry Solly. In the afternoon, in the course of a discussion on public questions, the Education Bill was strongly condemned. The proceedings closed with an open Communion Service, conducted by the Rev. C. A. Hoddinott.

Loughborough.—On Sunday week the Rev. Peter Dean gave a lecture in the Victoria-street Church on "Denmark," recounting his experiences in the course of a recent holiday spent in that country. Of the well-being of the Danes, physically, intellectually and morally, he gave a glowing account, describing the happy conditions of their land tenure, and their admirable educational system, from both of which we have much to learn. The lecture is published in full in the Loughborough Examiner of Sept. 20.

Mossley.—On Sunday afternoon, Sept. 14, the annual Service of Song was given by the choir and scholars to a full congregation. Miss Elliott was the reader, and notwithstanding that some half of the mills in the town are "not working," the collection was in advance of that of last year.

Newcastle-on-Tyne.—On Sunday morning last the Rev. Rowland Hill, of Bedford, delivered a special address in the Church of the Divine Unity in connection with the autumnal meetings of the National Band of Hope Union. In the afternoon the scholars and teachers were addressed by Mrs. John Tweedy, of Newcastle, and Mr. F. A. Edwards, of Hammersmith. It is hoped in a short while that the Band of Hope will be re-established.

Padiham.—The Harvest Thanksgiving Services were conducted at Nazareth Chapel last Sunday by the Rev. M. R. Scott, of Ainsworth, and his addresses were much appreciated. Anthems were rendered by the choir.

Parkstone.—On Sunday last a Temperance Service took the place of the usual P. S. A., conducted by Mr. W. T. Bushrod, assisted by the Rev. J. W. Bishop, of Manchester, and Messrs. Bunce and Smith, who gave earnest and telling addresses to a good assembly. At the evening service Mr. Bushrod addressed a goodly company. The collections at both services were taken on behalf of the local hospital.

Southend-on-Sea.—Harvest Thanksgiving Services were held last Sunday, the preacher being the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards. There were good congregations.

Whitchurch: Salop (Appointment).—The Rev. C. D. Badland, M.A., has accepted a unanimous invitation to become the minister of the Church of the Saviour, and will enter upon his duties at once.

We are glad to note the following instance of inter-denominational friendliness. On Thursday week the Rev. R. W. Berry, Congregational minister at Grange, Lancashire, having heard that the Rev. Dr. Griffiths, Unitarian minister of Ilkeston, was visiting Grange for his holiday, called upon him and pressed him to take his pulpit for the morning and evening of the following Sunday in order that he himself might be able to attend the Congregational Union meetings at Glasgow. Dr. Griffiths accepted the invitation, and his sermons gave great satisfaction.

Among the first papers that find their way into the well-regulated English Home are the old-established and largely circulated Weeklies published by Messrs. James Clarke and Co., of 13 and 14, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

THE SOUTH SHORE UNITARIAN CHURCH, BLACKPOOL,

has purchased, at a cost of nearly £600, a plot of freehold land, and they now appeal for help to erect a plain, substantial building to serve for all purposes. It is hoped to be able to do this for £1,500, making a total cost of £2,100. The land, thanks to the generosity of Mrs. John Grundy, of Summerseat; Miss S. Scholes Wrigley, of Windermere (on her own and her late mother's behalf), and Mr. R. T. Heape, of Rochdale, is entirely paid for. The Congregation have themselves promised over £300 towards the erection of the building. They carry on the Services and the Sunday School without any grant, and they feel that the remarkable success of their efforts justifies them in asking friends to help them to carry on their work under more favourable circumstances than at present. Their appeal has the full approval of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, the North and East Lancashire Mission, and the North Lancashire and Westmorland Unitarian Association; and the B. and F. U. A. has promised £25 to the Building Fund.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

We have received from the Rev. Philip H. Wicksteed, M.A., a letter on the question of the Natives in the Transvaal, which will appear next week. We are also obliged to defer until then the publication of the second part of Dr. Hicks' study of "Huxley as a Scientific and Philosophic Thinker."

The first number of the Hibbert Journal, "a Quarterly Review of Religion, Theology, and Philosophy," is published this week, and will receive, we trust, a very cordial welcome from all friends of earnest thought on the deepest questions of life. Of the contents of this first number we shall have more to say next week, but may note at once the fact that the Journal is not to be merely an organ of technical scholarship, beyond the reach of a wide public interest, for in this first number we find three contributions (independently written) on "Catastrophes and the Moral Order," by Professor Howison, and the Revs. R. A. Armstrong and R. F. Horton, and an article on "Matthew Arnold," by Mr. Stopford Brooke, side by side with such articles as Professor Percy Gardner's on "The Basis of Christian Doctrine," and Sir Oliver Lodge's on "The Outstanding Controversy between Science and Faith."

THE Hibbert Journal, the Editors state in their opening address, aims at providing a common ground for the literary expression of opinion on the great subjects to which it is devoted. It will offer to religious thought a genuinely open field, in which frank discussion may further the cause of truth. "We stand," the Editors declare, "for three positive truths: that the Goal of thought is One; that thought, striving to reach the Goal, must for ever move; that, in the conflict of opinion, the movement is furthered by which the many approach the One."

In the mode of conducting this Journal the implication will be that movement, in accordance with intellectual law, betokens health and vitality in religion. At the same time, we are on our guard against defining the direction such movement ought to take—whether as a return to old positions or as a departure for new. Carefully avoiding the pre-judgment of that question, our aim must be to reflect the movement of religious thought in its continual approach to firmer ground.

Controversy will be welcomed, because "the encounter of opposites kindles the spark of truth," "and when conducted in the right spirit" the end of controversy is not darkness but light."

FROM a northern correspondent we hear that the Hibbert Journal has been ordered for his Church Library, and that several readers have already bespoken it. That is an example which should as far as possible be followed in all the Liberal Churches of the country, and we may add that good service may be rendered by those who can secure a place for the Journal in their Free Library and in other public libraries and Reading Societies.

PARTICULARS as to the autumn meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association at Newcastle-on-Tyne on Monday and Tuesday next have already been announced in these columns. From the programme of the public meeting on Monday evening we see that in addition to the addresses by the Chairman, Alderman J. Baxter Ellis, J.P., and the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, President of the Association, Miss Marian Pritchard is to speak on "What Unitarianism means to me," the Rev. Frank Walters on "Have we a Mission?" the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones on "Our Religious Homes," the Rev. W. G. Tarrant on "The Problem of the City," and the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie on "The Crisis in National Education."

ON Sunday week the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke is to preach at the morning service in Little Portland-street Chapel, and from that date has consented to occupy the pulpit regularly on Sunday mornings through the winter until the end of March. We understand that at these services Mr. Brooke's "Christian Hymns" will be used, and that copies of the book will be on sale at the chapel; also that arrangements have been made to reserve their places for seat-holders, until five minutes before service begins, and that intending seat-holders have still time to subscribe. As to this, they had better communicate at once with the officers of the congregation.

THE autumnal conference of the United Kingdom Band of Hope Union at Newcastle-on-Tyne was attended by some 300 or 400 workers from all parts of the kingdom, and proved a very successful and encouraging series of gatherings. After a great children's demonstration in the afternoon and a people's meeting in the evening of Saturday, Sept. 20, at the Town Hall, there were on the following Sunday Temperance sermons and addresses given in nearly all the churches, chapels and Sunday-schools in Newcastle and the neighbouring towns and villages, among the principal preachers being the Bishop of Newcastle (Dr. Jacobs), and the Rev. G. Armstrong Bennett, B.A. Special addresses in our own churches have already been reported.

THE succeeding days were busily employed with sessions of the conference, public meetings, and social functions. The papers read and discussed were of a high order, and included the subjects: "Evening Agents and Lecturers for Bands of Hope," "Successful Methods of Retaining our Senior Members," "Periodic Temperance Lessons and Addresses in the Sunday-school," "Efficient Band of Hope Secretaries and their Equipment," "Festivals and Demonstrations," "The Value of Women in Band of Hope Work," "How to Secure the Educated and Leisured Classes as Band of Hope Workers," "What the Band of Hope can do to train Temperance Citizens," and "The Value of Enthusiasm in Band of Hope Work." Some of these papers were very suggestive, and those interested in Band of Hope work should look out for them in the pages of The Band of Hope Chronicle. The public meetings were large and enthusiastic, and the visits to Durham and Sunderland, where likewise sessions of the conference and public meetings were held, were not less useful. Altogether the series of gatherings passed off very successfully, and testified not only to the earnestness of the workers in the North, but to the solid determination for aggressive work of those interested in the Temperance movement amongst the young throughout the country.

THE remarks of Justice Grantham at the last Durham Assizes on the extraordinary list of crimes he had to deal with brought forth the following comment in the Daily News:—"Until the present or, perhaps, the previous generation, Methodism was an all-prevailing morally and socially uplifting power in the mining villages of the county. For reasons which cannot now be discussed it has in recent times lost ground. The spiritual fervour, and the quaint but touching and noble ideals of goodness, which were frequent, if not common, in a bygone age have nearly ceased to exist." The Methodist Recorder contests these allegations, quotes several testimonies to the effectiveness of Methodism in Durham; shows that membership in the Wesleyan body has risen from 15,600 in 1880 to 18,100 in 1901, and protests that "Methodism is still the most potent force in the social and religious life of the Durham mining villages. The men's leaders are chiefly Methodists, and many of them local preachers in one or another of the Methodist bodies; the man they send to Parliament from amongst themselves is one of the most respected Primitive Methodist local preachers in the North; and their Permanent Relief Fund—with which are associated the Northumberland miners—has as its President our own veteran George Parkinson, whilst its secretary is a local preacher in another Methodist denomination." These statements meanwhile are not necessarily inconsistent with the comments that occasioned them. The loss of spiritual fervour and the obscuration of an ideal may not for a time involve the destruction or the diminution of a Church, but merely impair its usefulness. If some unseen, impalpable cause prevents a man from being so intensely earnest about his own soul as at one time he would have been, and if meantime no other intense earnestness has taken hold of him, he will be a worse man even when singing the old hymns and using the old words. A danger similar in kind besets every Church, and not only the Methodist.

A new chapel belonging to the Methodist New Connexion was recently opened in Failsworth, Manchester. Being in debt about £400 on their former place of worship the congregation exerted itself so vigorously that the debt was cleared off, and the nucleus of a new building fund formed. The new chapel costs £4,000, of which some £3,000 are in hand. Evidently there will be a chance to repeat the previous policy on a larger scale. The plan may be commended to any church which has a debt.

The Methodist Times describes from an an old document, dating 1825, the kind of report which a Methodist class-leader was expected to be able to give of the members who, week by week, met him for advice and exhortation. The name and address of every individual would, of course, be recorded; a special mark would indicate if he was married, widowed, or single; but, further, each one's state of grace was to be notified thus:—(a) for awakened; (?) for one whose state is doubtful; (1) for one who professes justification; and (:) for one who professes the perfect love of God. Happy day, when the rise and progress of Religion in the soul could be so clearly marked out, and its stages so accurately discerned! Since then life has become more complex, men's lives and characters are no longer "built up like rows of neatly-ordered bricks," and the deftest class-leader must at times be bewildered.

Correspondents are requested to note that to be sure of insertion the same week, news must reach the Office by the first post on Thursday at latest, and the earlier in the week the better.

AN APPEAL FOR WORKERS.

The Rev. John Ellis, of the Mansford-street Church and Mission, Bethnal Green, has issued an earnest appeal addressed particularly to young people of some leisure and culture, for help in the work of his Mission. Such an appeal every one of our ministers working among the poor might make with equal urgency, and we print the following passages from Mr. Ellis's statement to show how many and various are the opportunities of service for men and women of good will. Whoever is willing to help at Mansford-street should address Mr. Ellis at the Parsonage.

APPEAL.

Our objects are:—"The promotion of the Moral and Religious Life of the People, and the amelioration of the condition of the poor." We seek to do this in the spirit of Jesus Christ. Consecrated effort on the part of numerous workers is what we need.

You, young men and women, who have culture and refinement, who have the love of God and the love of man in your hearts, who have a fair amount of leisure time at your disposal, do you ask yourselves sometimes how you can make your lives of real service?

I will tell you some of our needs. These will probably show you the way.

1. In the Sunday School there is always scope for men of ability. Our special needs are (1) a Superintendent to relieve me of that duty on Sunday afternoons, so that I might give special attention to the Senior Scholars. (2) Some devoted woman to take charge of the Women's Sunday afternoon class which was the joy of Miss E. J. Garrett's life for so many years.

2. In the District the Provident Society is greatly in need of workers. The work is exceedingly interesting to all who undertake it. It gives an opportunity to enter the homes of the poor, and helps to quicken the sweetest human sympathies.

3. During the Week there are various ways in which you can help to brighten the lives and stimulate the intelligence of your brothers and sisters who are less fortunately placed than yourself. At the Mothers' Meetings Vocal and Instrumental Music, or an occasional Recital, would be delightful to tired and hard-worked mothers. At the Week-night Entertainments, Music, Lectures and Dramatic Performances are needed. The Gymnasium, fully equipped, cannot be started this year without an Instructor. The Girls' and Boys' Clubs would be glad to have friends interested in their welfare. Indeed, there is opportunity, during the winter evenings, for any Social Service you may wish to render.

4. The Preston Club appeals to the men. The fellowship of men of refined tastes would help to raise the tone and quality of the lives of many in this district. I want a dozen young men from our Churches in the W., N. and N.W. to come and participate in the life of this Club. We can allot them duties which will not be too arduous, but will give real pleasure in return.

5. Outside. An occasional visit to the Museums, Art Galleries and places of Historical Interest, under a capable leader, on Saturday afternoons, would have educational value, and for many would add interest to life. I should be glad to hear of any friend who would be willing to conduct parties and point out features of special interest.

Now, my brother and sister, that you have surveyed the field, will you not come into the harvest? In the Master's Name, come. In the Spirit of Brotherhood, come. I can promise you joy for your pains. John Ellis, Minister.

A SONG OF HARVEST.

What of the brave?—
Is it naught
That they laboured and fought,
That they wrote and they wrought?—
It is well, it is well with the brave,
Though the end of the day be dark night, and the end of their life but a grave.

What of the wise?—
Is it naught
That they dreamed and they thought,
That they questioned and sought?—
It is well, it is well with the wise,
Though the lips that have spoken be dumb, and the vision hath died from their eyes.

What of the seed?—
Is it sown?—
Right and left it was thrown,
And has sprouted and grown;
It was scattered afar through the land;
In the morning the sower went forth, in the evening he held not his hand.

What of the corn?—
'Twill unfold
O'er weald and o'er wold
With a promise of gold;
And they who have toiled and are dead
Live again in the joy of the harvest, are known at the breaking of bread.

R. H. U. Bloor.

The September number of Present Day Papers contains the first instalment of a "History of the Adult School Movement," by the editors. A chronological record of this movement, by which the Society of Friends has done such a remarkable religious and social work, is appended, the first date being that of the opening of the Nottingham Adult School in 1798, and the last that of the appointment of an organising secretary to the National Council in the present year. The mind of the editors on this subject may be seen from the following passage in another article in the same number, entitled, "The Wages of Going On."

To ride for a fall is not the same thing as riding to clear the ditch. If we say that adult schools have reached the limit of their development we go a long way to prove our statement true. If we say that Quakerism is destined to be the cult of an exclusive few, we close the doors to expansion if we do not bolt them. . . . A Church that ceases to nurture life is dead.

And in a previous article on "The Need for Adult Schools" in the August number, we read:—

The Adult School idea has its basis in the promotion of a vivid sense of human fellowship, rooted in all-embracing Divine Love. The small gatherings are or should be in the family spirit; their intensely human character, their simplicity, their freedom from conventional restraint tend to keep them close to the difficult problems of life.

THE TRANSFORMATION AND DISSIPATION OF ENERGY.

AUTUMN is the stock-taking time of Science. Every September the addresses and lectures given at the meeting of the British Association tell us of some of the recent advances made and of new outlooks attained. This year the President, Professor Dewar, gave a most interesting account of one of the greatest advances in Physical Science in our time, the development of the methods of producing low temperatures and the investigation of the properties of matter at those low temperatures, a subject in which he is among the foremost workers. He is engaged in exploring a region not far above the absolute zero of cold, than which we can imagine nothing colder. I propose in this article to give some account of the theory of the transformation of energy which leads us to the belief that there is this absolute zero, this starting point of temperature below which we cannot go. In another article I shall say something of another great advance, the discovery and investigation of the new radiations with which Professor Thomson dealt in the Friday evening lecture, and I shall give some account of the theory of the constitution of the atoms which Professor Thomson has set forth.

Temperatures on the Mercury Thermometer.

An ordinary mercury thermometer gives what we may call an arbitrary scale, since it depends for its indications on the behaviour of two arbitrarily chosen substances, mercury and glass. It depends on the fact that mercury expands more than the glass tube containing it, and dividing the excess expansion between the temperatures of melting ice and boiling water into 100 equal steps, each step is a degree on the mercury in glass scale. Most other substances expand nearly equally for each step upwards, each degree, of the mercury thermometer, though, of course, the length of step for one substance may be quite different from that for another. But not quite equally, and some substances, of which water is a very notable example, get hopelessly out of step with mercury. Nor is glass a consistent expander. If we take two mercury thermometers made of different kinds of glass they give slightly different readings when exposed to the same temperature. Then again, mercury freezes at about 40 deg. below melting ice, and at some 400 deg. or 500 deg. above that temperature it evaporates so much that it bursts the containing tube. So that not only is the common scale of temperature arbitrary as depending on the properties of one or a pair of particular substances, but it is very limited—too limited in one direction for use on Arctic expeditions, too limited in the other for manufacturers who wish to measure the temperatures of their furnaces. Further, it affords no sign of a beginning.

Temperatures on the Gas Scale.

The first idea of a definite general scale of temperature came from the discovery that various gases expand by almost exactly equal amounts for equal rises of temperatures. Imagine, for instance, two ordinary thermometers, one containing air instead of mercury, but open at the top of the tube to allow the air to expand and with a little plug or pellet of mercury separating the air inside from the air outside, this plug sliding up and down the tube as the air expands and contracts, and telling the volume of the inside air. Let the other thermometer be just the same size, but let it contain hydrogen instead of air. Then if the two start level at any one temperature, as the temperature is altered, they will advance or recede almost exactly together.

If we imagine the bulbs so big that they hold 273 cubic inches of gas at the temperature of melting ice, each gas will expand to 373 cubic inches at the temperature of boiling water, and if each inch added is taken as marking a degree we have the gas scale. Oxygen, nitrogen, hydrogen, helium, and others agree very nearly in this equality of expansion, and the gas degrees agree very nearly with mercury degrees between 0° C. and 100°. But the scale can be prolonged upwards as high as any vessel can be made to withstand the temperature and hold the gas, and it can be prolonged downwards, the gases still marching together far away beyond the freezing point of mercury. If we continued to cool the gases they would occupy 272 inches at −1°, 271 inches at −2°, and so on, so that if we could only take 273 such steps their volume would vanish, and we should get to the very bottom of the scale. This behaviour of gases gave the first definite idea of a zero of temperature and pointed to its existence, no great way below the temperatures with which we are familiar. But accurate researches on the properties of gases show that they do not contract quite exactly pari passu as they cool. Now too we know that ultimately, and each at a different temperature, every gas will condense to a liquid and then freeze to a solid, and show no sign at all of vanishing away. So that after all the gas scale is really arbitrary; for as the different gases do not expand or contract exactly alike we must select one particular gas as our standard. In practice too the scale is probably limited by the gas ceasing to be a gas and becoming a liquid.

The Absolute or Work Scale.

About fifty years ago Lord Kelvin, when he was developing the theory of such transformations of energy as we have in the steam engine, showed that we could imagine a scale of temperature quite definite, quite independent of any particular substance, a scale derived not from the measurement of the expansion of heated bodies but from the work obtained from the heat imparted to produce that expansion. This work scale has a very definite starting point below which we cannot think it possible to go, and if there are, as usual, 100 steps or degrees from boiling water to melting ice, there are almost exactly 273 steps more down to the absolute zero. The gases then did point in the right direction. How this transformation from heat to work gives us a scale of temperature we may see by considering the corresponding Transformation of Position Energy to Work.

If we have a reservoir of water at a height above the general level, that water has potential energy, or, as it is better to call it, position energy, since it depends on the position of the water above the earth. We can get some of the position energy out of the water by allowing the water to turn a water-wheel. Water-wheels, as a rule, are not very efficient machines; there is usually a great deal of leak from them, a great deal of useless agitation of the water, and a great deal of friction. But on paper we can make them as perfect as we like. So we will build one with its highest point just level with the reservoir and its lowest just level with the pool at the bottom. It shall take in water quite quietly at the top, be turned round by its load and let it all out quite quietly at the bottom. Evidently by such a wheel we shall get a definite amount of work out of every pound of water passing down it, we shall transform so much of the position energy into energy of motion, or whatever it may be, in the mill. But we do not get all the position energy. Some still remains in the water as it flows into the pool at the bottom. The lower this pool, and the greater its depth below the reservoir, the more of the energy do we transform. Still, however, in practice there is always some left in the water turned out. But now imagine that a shaft is sunk, going right down to the centre of the earth, and imagine that we have a series of wheels one below the other, the bottom of one being on a level with and delivering its water to the top of the next, and that this train reaches from the reservoir right down to the centre of the earth. Now we can, at least in imagination, get all the position energy out of the water by letting it run down the whole train to the centre, where it is equally pulled in all directions and so has no weight left, no tendency to fall any way. The centre of the earth is an absolute zero of level for the water. To go any further we must push the water, when it will take in, not give out, energy of position. If we adjust the diameters of the wheels so that out of each pound of water each wheel extracts the same quantity of work, we may think of each wheel as letting the water down through the same difference of level. This is a "work" measure of level, and it would not be consistent with the measure by a footrule. For evidently as we go further down the weight of a pound gets less, and the diameter of a wheel which is to extract from it the same amount of work gets larger. To put the idea of these wheels in definite form, let us think of the distance from the earth's surface to its centre as divided into 273 steps-down of level, each giving the same amount of work. If then we put in 273 parts of energy at the surface we can transform one part in each step. Or if we start 100 steps above the surface, and put in 373 parts there, again we can transform one part in each step. Suppose we work only down the first hundred of these steps, between the top and the earth's surface, we get 100 parts transformed out of every 373 put in. And these illustrations serve to show that the proportion transformed in any case depends solely on the levels available and their heights above the zero level.

Energy Transformation Depends on Difference of Level.

The limitation of the energy which can be transformed by the difference of levels available, so obvious in the case of position energy just discussed, exists in all other cases. With each form of energy there is something corresponding to level. With heat energy it is temperature, with electrical energy it is voltage, and so on.

The theory of the transformation going on in heat engines, such as steam or oil or gas engines, was first given by Carnot and developed afterwards by Clausius, Kelvin and others, and it was this theory of transformation, together with the recognition of the conservation of energy, which made the middle of last century an epoch in physical science.

Case of Transformation of Heat.

Take, for instance, the steam engine. It works between two levels or temperatures, that of the boiler and that of the condenser, or if there is no condenser that of the air, into which the expanded steam is turned. So much energy is put into the engine at the top level, so much remains in the steam turned out at the lower level, and the working of the engine depends on the difference between the heat put in and the heat turned out. Lord Kelvin saw how this idea of an engine working between two levels would give us a scale of temperature. Imagine a series of engines, the condenser of each serving as boiler to the next, like our train of water-wheels. Let us put some quantity of heat energy in from the boiler of the first engine, and follow it as it runs down through the series, ever lessening as it goes. Let us adjust the temperature steps between boiler and condenser in each engine, so that each gives out the same amount of work. On Lord Kelvin's scale each of these temperature steps is equal or contains the same number of degrees, and from the method of testing this equality it is termed the work scale of temperature. We can imagine engines which will work at any height or depth of temperature, so that there is no difficulty in thinking of our series continued downwards below freezing point, and Lord Kelvin showed that making 100 steps from boiling water to melting ice 273 more such steps would yield all the heat energy put in, and transform it all to work. No one has yet succeeded in imagining the possibility of a step below the lowest of this series, and so it is termed the absolute zero.

Now we can see what is the best we can do with the steam engine. We can arrange the boiler to be perhaps some 450 degrees or steps above the absolute zero, the condenser some 300 steps above it, so that we can only go down 150 out of the 450 steps imaginable, or only transform one-third of the heat to work. We could transform far more if we could use the temperature of the fire. But the heat falls down enormously in level without undergoing any transformation in passing from the furnace to the water in the boiler. This is a very great defect in the steam engine. It is as if we worked a water-wheel by allowing the water to fall straight down on to it from a point hundreds of feet above it, thus losing the opportunity of transforming so much more of the energy. If we could use the temperature of the fire as the higher level we could start perhaps at 1,000 steps above zero and use some 700 of them. In the gas engine the ignited gas is its own furnace, and we do use this higher level. Consequently it is far more efficient than the steam engine, and there is little doubt that when the difficulties in the construction of the gas engine have been overcome, the steam engine will be relegated to the museum.

Energy Transformation Always Accompanies Life

Regarded merely from the physical point of view every living being is an engine for the transformation of energy. It lives, as it were, between differences of level, and allowing the energy to run down hill it catches and transforms some of the falling stream. But probably we must regard the living engine as chemical or electrical rather than as one of the heat class.

The Dissipation of Energy.

The transformations of energy depend entirely then on the existence of differences of level. Where all is at one dead level no transformation can happen. Now there is a tendency on the part of energy to reduce its own differences of level. Thus a water reservoir tends to leak and let the water run away down hill to the level of the sea. An electric current tends to escape from the mains and run "to earth." A hot body will certainly share its heat with its cooler neighbours. When this tendency results in action, as a rule some of the energy, if not already heat, is sooner or later transformed to heat, and heat we know will tend to one level. So that we must recognise a tendency on the part of energy to a reduction in transforming power—a tendency for each form to come to a dead level, yielding heat as its hills and valleys sink into a plain, and a tendency for heat to be scattered everywhere till it is all at one useless temperature. This scattering is known as the Dissipation of Energy.

Sometimes we are presented with a melancholy picture of the ultimate fate of Nature when this scattering is complete, when each kind of energy has sunk to one level, when all matter is at one temperature, and the universe is a system of dark, worn-out suns and frozen planets hung in a calm, lifeless sea of energy. Such a picture results from applying to the infinite our fragmentary knowledge of the finite. If we could shut up the solar system, say, in an energy tight box, and leave it to itself, no doubt it would continually approach one dead level of temperature, though it would never in a finite time attain it. But our system is only one bit of a system to which we can set no bounds—a system in which the differences of level may be finite though the stores of energy are infinite. The present store of energy in the sun on which we now depend existed once, according to the best guess we can make, as energy of position of particles scattered through a vast region of space. They drew together and their position energy was changed, we believe, into the heat now pouring out on all sides from the sun. Possibly the suns may draw together and change their position energy into new stores of heat, and we may be merely at one stage of a gradual drawing together of matter into larger and larger masses with successive conversions of position energy into heat at centres more and more remote and at epochs further and further apart. This is no doubt wild speculation, but at least it will serve to show that as we know of no beginning in the activity of nature so we need not picture any end.

J. H. POYNTING.

OUR LADY OF HEALING.

AT the foot of Mt. Blanc, on its southern or Italian side, there is a church called Notre-Dame de Guérison. We were passing this place at seven o'clock one morning, and stepped in. We had concluded from the name of the church that it was one of the many which have been built on sites where the Virgin is supposed to have appeared, and which pilgrims visit in the hope of obtaining, on spots so favoured, some special manifestation of Divine power in answer to their prayers. Our surmise proved to be correct. Round the walls were hung the usual votive offerings bearing witness that many who had come on pilgrimage had believed their desires to have been fulfilled. The tender-hearted "Mother of God" had heard them and had made intercession. Diseases had been healed, children had been given, strength to endure griefs or to make sacrifices had been granted. Almost every variety of suffering and struggle known to human life was represented there, either by tablets with inscriptions or by other symbols which expressed, even more plainly than words could do, gratitude to the Virgin for her special aid.

I suppose there are few—if, indeed, there are any—who can look upon such things without being moved to deep sympathy. In the present instance it would have been more difficult than usual to do so. The ordinary early mass was being said; many of the peasants of the neighbourhood had come to pray before going to their daily work; and, though it was clear that to some the service was not a very absorbing matter, at least one had tears in her eyes—tears, perhaps, of wondering grief that the answer to prayer was so long delayed, and that, while others who came from far went away relieved of their burdens and with light hearts, she, or one dear to her, though living near to the holy place, had to suffer still.

A Contrast.

In a few minutes we passed out into the sunshine and continued our walk along the base of that mighty range in which Mt. Blanc is the highest but not the most striking of many great peaks. And as we looked up at those towering pinnacles, which seemed (some of them, at least) so utterly inaccessible, and which were, in fact, unscaled until quite modern times, there arose in the mind a sense of contrast—a sense of the contrast between the spiritual mood of those who in their weakness and distress go to pray to Our Lady of Healing, and that of those who take delight in matching human strength and skill against stupendous walls of rock and ice such as rear themselves so proudly above the church where the prayers are made.

The characteristic mood of the pioneering mountain-climber is confidence in human power; that of the pilgrim to the Church of Our Lady of Healing is trust in *super*human power. The one knows that only by self-help can he succeed; the other feels the narrow limits of his own strength and relies on Divine aid. The one regards muscle, energy, perseverance, knowledge, experience and training as everything; the other believes that his best resources are faith and prayer.

The Mountaineer's Self-reliance and the Dependence of Faith.

Sitting by the wayside for rest and food

an hour or two later, with the thought of what we had seen in the church still in mind, and with the same imposing peaks still in view, I could not help pondering over this contrast. The feeling of its significance deepened; it seemed to open out the profoundest issues. It was intensified by the aspect of one mountain in particular, the Aiguille de Péteret, a huge and bare but gracefully soaring spire of rock first climbed in 1885. That that mountain could be scaled, and had been scaled, seemed to typify in the most impressive way the power and resourcefulness of man; for it was scaled for pure sport. Difficulties did not depress, but were accepted as an invitation; the toil and pain of overcoming them were not grudged but were endured willingly, as though they brought their own reward. The climber reached the summit not by craving from some superior being new power of limb and thought and will, but by accepting the powers he had, and training them to the utmost degree of efficiency.

But may not life as a whole be regarded as a climb which all men have to make? If so, why do men attempt to accomplish it, either wholly or in part, in a spirit and on a method quite different from that of the self-reliant mountaineer? Can the spirit and the method of the pilgrims to the Church of Our Lady of Healing be in the least degree reconciled with the spirit and method of the men who first climbed the peaks above it?

An Ever-recurring Problem.

Pondering on such questions as these I soon realised that I was looking at an old problem—it was only wearing a face which was new to me; I had never before approached it from just this point of view.

The contrast between the mountaineer and the pilgrim to the Church of Our Lady of Healing is the same as that which has given rise to the long struggle between science and religion in so far as such a struggle is real; it is the same as that which divided the advocates of salvation by works from the supporters of salvation by faith.

These and other conflicts have arisen from this, among other causes, that there is a real contrast in human nature which from time to time has been exaggerated or misunderstood, and which at the best makes it difficult to form a duly balanced conception of man's place and duty in the world—the contrast between man's strength and his weakness.

Man's Resourceful Strength.

Physically, intellectually and morally human nature sometimes seems very strong—so strong that a person of hasty judgment or enthusiastic temper is apt to overlook its limits. Probably most of us can remember a moment or moments in our own experience—especially in the first flush of eager thought—when, looking at the vast increase of knowledge, the ever-increasing power of science, the continual social progress, we have asked: "Is there any limit to the possibilities of human development? Why should not man understand and master the world, even the whole universe? Why should not improved modes of living indefinitely increase the length of life? Why should not new discoveries and applications of science bring all matter into subjection to man, and enable him to sweep through space at what speed he likes? Why should not his moral powers be so perfected by education, that evil shall become a thing unknown and even undreamt of?" And then, with thoughts like these in our minds, it has seemed to us that religion as commonly understood is not wanted. Man's powers and prospects have so expanded in our imagination, that there is no room for any higher power such as men have named God. The thought of him, trust in him, seems to be only a hindrance, a blinding and a lulling superstition. "Must not religion," we ask, "if it is to mean anything, be simply and solely knowledge of the laws of nature and life in accordance with them, but is not science the true and better name for that?"

Inevitable Limitations.

But there is another aspect of human nature and life which sooner or later forces itself into view, and which in its turn is apt to become exclusive and to monopolise the thoughts. No science has warded off gradual decay and death from any single human being; no science can say a conclusive word as to whether we enter upon another life after this; no science has been able to show that there is meaning in all human suffering; no human being has ever reached a moral standard which has been accepted as perfection by all acquainted with it—indeed, all right-minded men are conscious of moral weakness, the best not less, but often more than others.

Who has not known facts like these overwhelm him with a sense of the weakness of man and the insignificance of his life? Who has not found forming itself silently and irresistibly in his mind the thought of a power greater than death, a being greater than man, a life larger than human life, a moral perfection unknown in this world, an existence where justice reigns supreme and universal? Here lie the roots, not only of rational religion, but also of those forms which pay least regard to science and which science has persistently fought against. For let a man concentrate his whole attention upon life's shortness and the darkness of the future, upon man's frailty and his moral weakness—and what more natural than that he should give up self-reliant effort, bow himself in vague fear and hope before the first impressive form of deity presented to him, and look upon all power and all happiness as a favour to be asked, rather than a prize to be won? It is the exaggeration of human weakness and dependence which leads to forms of religion which the scientific man condemns as crouching superstition.

Wisdom of the Just Balance.

And yet, as I have said, this weakness and dependence is an incontrovertible fact, which will play its part in moulding men's views of human life and of the world. And the constantly recurring problem is to maintain a balance or to find the right adjustment between this fact and that other which the scientific man rightly insists upon—namely, that man is entrusted with certain very real powers, and that human life can only be lived wisely and happily by him who uses these powers vigorously and in a spirit of self-dependence. From age to age there have been constant variations in the distribution of emphasis between these facts. Moreover, in each particular age there are parties or groups of men (religious and scientific) who place the emphasis differently. We may go further and say that each individual person lays the stress somewhat differently according to his circumstances and his mood of mind, and especially according to the growth of his experience and the particular aspects of life which face him most frequently and take most hold of his thoughts.

To understand this is to learn to be patient with that babel of conflicting beliefs which human thought presents. It sometimes seems equally incomprehensible and disastrous that contradictory ideas on the ultimate questions of life should fix themselves in men's minds. And the strangest thing of all is that as a rule the holders of contradictory beliefs appear to be equally sane and equally sincere. The explanation is easy, when we remember that human nature has the two contrasted aspects which I have dwelt upon. And the moment we realise that a person who holds some religious opinion which seems to us obviously untrue may be only fixing his attention too exclusively upon one aspect, we cease to conclude that he must be mad or insincere—we may even be prepared to allow that his opinion contains a truth, though in disguise—especially if we admit the possibility that we may be fixing our attention too exclusively upon the other aspect.

The Permanence of Religion.

But the contrast between the mountaineer and the pilgrim to the Church of Our Lady of Healing offers suggestions which take us further than this. Though contradictory opinions upon religion may be held by persons who are equally sane and equally sincere, it does not follow that we may choose which we please, according to mere whim; that we may accept without examination just that which we were taught in childhood; or that, on the other hand, we may stand aloof, and treat all opinions with impartial indifference. It is true that upon the ultimate questions of life we can never be sure that we have arrived at absolute and unchangeable beliefs which will serve not only our own but all future generations. But we can never escape the question whether there is more or less probability and practical value in any ideas which come before us; we can never escape the responsibility of seeking to embody the more of truth in our own ideas and of bringing them up to the highest standard within our reach.

Our religious ideas may change; they may be purified; we may give up old and antiquated forms, and accept new and improved forms. But religious ideas of some kind (as distinct from the ideas of physical science), no man can help forming who surveys life in a large way, keeping well in view both aspects of which I have spoken, and giving to each its due emphasis. This was Tyndall's experience on the summit of the Matterhorn. He had no sooner overcome the enormous difficulties of climbing that stupendous pinnacle of rock, than his thoughts were turned to the kind of question which carries the mind beyond science. For he found that the mighty mass which seemed from below an emblem of permanence and infinite power bore on its whole face marks of decay and proofs of transience. "What means this fact that nothing endures?" he was impelled to ask.* The whole history of men's thoughts about mountains affords an interesting and striking illustration of the two kinds of answer which have been given to all such ultimate questions—the answer of fear or despair, and the answer of hope or trust. This curious by-way of history (which the length of this article forbids me to trace) leads to the same conviction as its broader and more beaten paths. Looking at the world and the facts of human life—a world and a life so bright with beauty but so dark with mystery—what we need is a combination of revering hope and trust with intellectual vigour and fearless sincerity. Where this combination is most complete and most harmonious, there is the highest manifestation of the religious spirit. H. Rawlings.

LITERATURE.

MR. STOPFORD BROOKE'S "BROWNING."†

It was a great privilege that the crowded audience at University College enjoyed, in the early months of these last two years, in listening to Mr. Stopford Brooke's Browning lectures; and now there is offered to them, and happily to a much larger audience, in the printed volume not indeed a keener pleasure but a more permanent possession and an ampler store in the completed study of Browning's poetry—a study which is an inspiration, that may quietly have its way in the reader's mind and heart.

"The Poetry of Robert Browning" is a companion to Mr. Brooke's "Tennyson: His Art and Relation to Modern Life," and they are volumes which every lover of our poets must desire to possess. We are fortunate indeed to have two such studies of the poets who, since Wordsworth, have been nearest to what is best and noblest in our modern life, by one who is himself a poet at heart and a master critic. These are interpretations which help us to understand and enjoy, rich in sympathy and wise in discrimination. To study Browning can be no light task; but Mr. Brooke makes us feel that it is, like the ascent of a great mountain, worth all the effort, for the testing of our manhood in that keen and vigorous air, for the splendour of the mountain itself, and for the glorious outlook over the world, and into the illimitable heavens above.

This book is distinctly a study of Browning's poetry, with only so much reference to his life as is needed to understand the progress of his work. One learns to know much of the man, with growing admiration and wonder at his strength. As to his religion, also, we may learn much, but the question of Browning's theology is referred to only to be set aside.

The contrast between the theology found in Tennyson and in Browning, Mr. Brooke says in his opening chapter, would lead him too far afield.

Moreover, Browning's theology and ethics, as they are called, have been discussed at wearying length for the last ten years, and especially by persons who use his poetry to illustrate from it their own systems of theology, philosophy, and ethics.

And in a later chapter on "Imaginative Representations," speaking on "Natural Theology on the Island; or, Caliban upon Setebos," he says:—

> I do not mean, in this book, to speak of the theology of Caliban, though the part of the poem which concerns the origin of sacrifice is well worth our attention. But the poem may be recommended to those theological persons who say there is no God; and to that large class of professional theologians, whose idea of a capricious, jealous, and suddenly-angered God, without any conscience except his sense of power to do as he pleases, is quite in harmony with Caliban's idea of Setebos.

It would have been of the deepest interest, and we should have been thankful to have Mr. Brooke's interpretation of this side of Browning's mind also, and particularly of his thought concerning Christ, as expressed in such poems as "Christmas-Eve and Easter Day," "A Death in the Desert," and the "Epistle of Karshish, the Arab Physician"; but if it was not to be in this book, we must hope for it in some other form.

The book opens most happily with a chapter on "Browning and Tennyson." On the two peaks of Parnassus Mr. Brooke pictures them, unchallenged, through all the latter years of their contemporary life in their right to that pre-eminence. On the lower heights of the mount of song there were other poets, "but none of them ventured seriously to dispute the royal summits where Browning and Tennyson sat, and smiled at one another across the vale between." Long ago the dispute used to be common in Germany, which of the two, Goethe or Schiller, was the greater poet; on which Goethe is reported once to have remarked:—"Man solle doch lieber nicht streiten, wer von ihnen grösser sei, Schiller oder er, sondern sich freuen, dass zwei solche Kerle vorhanden sind." This we may venture to paraphrase and apply to our own poets:—"People ought not to waste their breath in disputing which of the two, Tennyson or Browning, is the greater poet, but just be glad that they have got two such splendid fellows!" In that spirit Mr. Brooke contrasts the careers of the brother poets, the progress of their work for sixty years, Browning's long waiting for recognition, his remarkable anticipation of modern movements, his universal sympathies, the wealth of his expression as poet of human nature, and thus brings out the distinctive character of his work. Of his failure to win popularity, it is said:—

> For all this neglect Browning cared as a bird cares who sings for the love of singing, and who never muses in himself whether the wood is full or not of listeners. Being always a true artist, he could not stop versing and playing; and not one grain of villain envy touched his happy heart when he looked across the valley to Tennyson. He loved his mistress Art, and his love made him always joyful in creating.

As to Browning's obscurity Mr. Brooke is quite frank. He is difficult not by his thoughts, but by his expression of them. He is unpardonably careless of clearness in his art. He continually puts his words into the wrong places, and leaves his sentences half finished and his meaning half expressed, and inserts needless parentheses. "This is irritating except to folk who like discovery of the twisted rather than poetry; and it is quite needless. It is worse than needless, for it lowers the charm and the dignity of the poetry." Yet there is something to be said on the other side, for which we must refer our readers to the book.

After two chapters on Browning's Treatment of Nature, Mr. Brooke passes to what is in Browning by far the more essential subject, his poetry of human nature, and first deals with his "Theory of Human Life" as found in his earliest poems, "Pauline" and "Paracelsus," and consistently held to the end. The life of Man in this world, with all its glorious powers and rich delights, in spite of all imperfection and failures, finding God, with faith in humanity, perfected, and at one with God, through the power of love, this is the constant subject of Browning's poetry, rising at its highest to magnificent expression. At the end of the chapter on "Poems of the Passion of Love," the final outcome of his faith is thus described:—

> Finally, as to the mightier kinds of love, those supreme forms of the passion, which have neither beginning nor end; to which time and space are but names; which make and fill the universe; the least grain of which predicates the whole; the spirit of which is God Himself; the breath of whose life is immortal joy, or sorrow which means joy; whose vision is Beauty, and whose activity is Creation—these, united in God, or divided among men into their three great entities—love of ideas for their truth and beauty; love of the natural universe, which is God's garment; love of humanity, which is God's child—these pervade the whole of Browning's poetry as the heat of the sun pervades the earth and every little grain upon it. They make its warmth and life, strength and beauty. They are too vast to be circumscribed in a lyric, represented in a drama, bound up even in a long story of spiritual endeavour like Paracelsus. But they move, in dignity, splendour, and passion, through all that he deeply conceived and nobly wrought; and their triumph and immortality in his poetry are never for one moment clouded with doubt or subject to death. This is the supreme thing in his work. To him Love is the Conqueror, and Love is God. (Pp. 262-3.)

In "Sordello," which was published in 1840, when Browning was not yet thirty, Mr. Brooke describes a work of astonishing genius, but one of the most difficult of the poems. "Sordello is obscure, Browning's idolators say, by concentration of thought. It is rather obscure by want of that wise rejection of unnecessary thoughts which is the true concentration. It is obscure by a reckless misuse of the ordinary rules of language." That Browning could write otherwise was proved by his very next poem, exquisite in its refreshing beauty, "Pippa Passes." A chapter on "Browning and Sordello" points to the remarkable self-revelation of the poet himself in the hero of his poem, and at the end of the third book his direct confession of purpose to dedicate his heart to the love of Humanity. Everything human interests him, and often in his poems Browning turned aside to the study of strange and unlovely things, but never without his ultimate faith in the triumph of Divine Love.

With all his marvellous gift of the dramatic realisation of character, Browning no more than Tennyson was successful as a dramatist; this the chapter on the dramas makes clear. On the other hand, how real his men and women are is abundantly illustrated, and most vividly in the chapters on "Womanhood in Browning," and on that astonishing poetic tour de force "The Ring and the Book." Browning's two supreme women are Pompilia, in "The Ring and the Book," and Balaustion the Greek girl, as to whom we cannot refrain from quoting the following passage:—

Pompilia is the image of natural goodness and of its power. A spotless soul, though she is passed through hell, enables her, without a trained intellect, with ignorance of all knowledge, and with as little vanity as Balaustion, to give as clear and firm a judgment of right and wrong. She is as tolerant, as full of excuses for the wrong thing, as forgiving, as Balaustion, but it is by the power of goodness and love in her, not by that of intellect. Browning never proved his strength more than when he made these two, in vivid contrast, yet in their depths in harmony; both equal, though so far apart, in noble womanhood. Both are beyond convention; both have a touch of impulsive passion, of natural wildness, of flower-beauty. Both are, in hours of crisis, borne beyond themselves, and mistress of the hour. Both mould men, for their good, like wax in their fingers. But Pompilia is the white rose, touched with faint and innocent colour; and Balaustion is the wild pomegranate flower, burning in a crimson of love among the dark green leaves of steady and sure thought, her powers latent till needed, but when called on and brought to light, flaming with decision and revelation. (P. 371.)

"The Ring and the Book" is central in Browning's work, and the chapter which deals with it is one of the most interesting and illuminating in Mr. Brooke's study of the poet. The poem is far too long, he says, and desires that it should be read as Browning himself suggested in publishing its original four volumes, at intervals of a month, so that its twelve books, in which the same story is told over and over again from different points of view, may be read one every ten days till the whole is finished. It contains some of Browning's finest imaginative work, and much that is hardly poetry at all, but only extremely clever intellectual analysis and wit. What never failed Browning was "the power of creating men and women into distinct individualities." But that is not a power special to the poet. Carlyle, Mr. Brooke says, had it as remarkably, or nearly as remarkably, as Browning. And after "The Ring and the Book," published when he was nearly fifty, Browning's love of intellectual analysis seemed to get the better of his imaginative poetic power, to the great detriment of his later work; but he resisted, and at the end his imaginative power largely reasserted itself. This Mr. Brooke shows in a final chapter on "The Last Poems." Whatever Browning lost, it is there said, "there was one poetic temper of mind which never failed him, the heroic temper of the faithful warrior for God and man; there was one ideal view of humanity which dominated all his work; there was one principle which directed all his verse to celebrate the struggle of humanity towards the perfection for which God, he believed, had destined it."

"Asolando," Browning's last volume, published on the day of his death, Dec. 12, 1889, concluded with the noble epilogue, which ends:—

"Strive and thrive!" cry "Speed,—fight on, fare ever
There as here!"

With these high words he ended a long life, and his memory still falls upon us, like the dew which fell on Paradise. It was a life lived fully, kindly, lovingly, at its just height from the beginning to the end. No fear, no vanity, no lack of interest, no complaint of the world, no anger at criticism, no villain fancies disturbed his soul. No laziness, no feebleness in effort injured his work, no desire for money, no faltering of aspiration, no pandering of his gift and genius to please the world, no surrender of art for the sake of fame or filthy lucre, no falseness to his ideal, no base pessimism, no slavery to science yet no boastful ignorance of its good, no morbid naturalism, no devotion to the false forms of beauty, no despair of man, no retreat from men into a world of sickly or vain beauty, no abandonment of the great ideas or disbelief in their mastery, no enfeeblement of reason such as at this time walks hand in hand with the worship of the mere discursive intellect, no lack of joy and healthy vigour and keen inquiry and passionate interest in humanity. Scarcely any special bias can be found running through his work; on the contrary, an incessant change of subject and manner, combined with a strong but not overweening individuality, raced, like blood through the body, through every vein of his labour. Creative and therefore joyful, receptive and therefore thoughtful, at one with humanity and therefore loving; aspiring to God and believing in God, and therefore steeped to the tips in radiant Hope; at one with the past, passionate with the present, and possessing by faith an endless and glorious future—this was a life lived on the top of the wave, and moving with its motion from youth to manhood, from manhood to old age. (Pp. 440-1.)

With this passage we must conclude our most imperfect notice of Mr. Brooke's delightful volume, with one final word of thankfulness for this gift, to be added to his "Tennyson." At the end of that earlier volume Mr. Brooke expressed the hope that he should help us by his study to love Tennyson more. That he certainly has done. And for Browning, after reading his new book, we may adopt the concluding sentence: "Mankind is fortunate to have so noble a memory, so full and excellent a work to rest upon and love."

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

He that loveth not knoweth not God, for God is love.

That great truth Whittier always delighted to teach, and some of his most beautiful poems tell of it. "The Minister's Daughter" is one of these, and was written when he was an old man of over seventy. In it he pictures a minister and his little daughter walking home one Sunday morning after the minister had been preaching a sermon about the wrath of God, and the terrible doom to which all but a chosen few are condemned by it. That dreadful doctrine was believed by many people in New England when Whittier was a boy, and he protested against it with all his strength. And in this poem he makes the little girl teach her father a better lesson.

After the painful service they walked home together, "through the apple-bloom of May":—

Sweet in the fresh green meadow
Sparrow and blackbird sung;
Above him their scented petals,
The blossoming orchard hung.

Around in the wonderful glory,
The minister looked and smiled;
"How good is the Lord who gives us
These gifts from His hand, my child."

But in his sermon he had been telling the old story of the Garden of Eden, and how man had fallen through disobedience in eating from the fruit-tree there. And the little girl, remembering this, thinks that the blossom on the fruit-tree must be wicked to have caused such dreadful misery to man. But the father says they cannot understand it, and whatever God does is right. Whether He sends them joy or pain they must fear and love Him still.

Then, with the little girl's reply, the poem goes on:—

"Oh I fear Him!" said the daughter,
"And I try to love Him, too;
But I wish He was good and gentle,
Kind and loving as you."

The minister groaned in spirit,
As the tremulous lips of pain,
And wide, wet eyes uplifted,
Questioned his own in vain.

Bowing his head he pondered
The words of his little one;
Had he erred in his life-long teachings,
Had he wrong to his Master done?

To what grim and dreadful idol,
Had he lent the holiest name?
Did his own heart, loving and human,
The God of his worship shame?

And lo! from the bloom and greenness,
From the tender skies above,
And the face of his little daughter,
He read a lesson of love.

He saw how impossible it was for God, who is our heavenly Father, to deal in that terrible way, as the old doctrine taught, with His children; and after that, he let his own heart teach him, what it must mean when we say "God is love."

Thereafter his hearers noted
In his prayers a tenderer strain,
And never the message of hatred
Burned on his lips again.

And the scoffing tongue was prayerful,
And the blinded eyes found sight,
And hearts as flint aforetime,
Grew soft in his warmth and light.

SHALL WE COMPROMISE ON THE EDUCATION BILL ?

The agitation over the Education Bill waxes hotter every week. It is manifest that the Liberal party is thoroughly aroused, and that revolt is threatening in more than one province of the Government domain. Accordingly, the plea for compromise begins to be heard, and there are even rumours of conferences between leaders on either side with a view to discover a basis for negotiation.

To the friends of undenominational Education then the question becomes urgent: Shall we sanction a friendly compromise or shall we stand rigid and unswerving in opposition? It is a question of supreme moment, and must be frankly faced.

But a right answer can only be given after a survey of the history of the Education struggle for the last two-and-thirty years. A compromise after long and equal conflict may often be an honourable solution of a great public question, making for peace, good-will, and the greatest weal of the greatest number. But a compromise which is but the last of a long series of compromises all in one direction, in which the friends of freedom have been forced to beat reiterated retreat, would be a sorry business honourable neither to one side nor the other. Now the story of this problem since 1870 has been one of continuous compromises in which the principles of Liberalism have always beaten retreat and those of Sacerdotalism have always made advance.

Mr. Forster's Act of 1870 was itself a compromise—a compromise against which the Nonconformists manfully struggled in the making, and protested after it was made. When it had become law a meeting of 2,500 delegates from 800 delegating bodies met in Manchester and unanimously protested "against the payment of public money to schools under private, irresponsible, and denominational management." That protest has never been withdrawn. But Act after Act has since increased the public contribution to the cost of Denominational schools without any increase of public control. Before 1870 the principle was one-third school fees, one-third Voluntary subscriptions, one-third Government Grant. The 1870 Act set up the principle, school fees and Voluntary subscriptions together one-half, Government Grant one-half. The Act of 1876 swept away this principle, and gave Government Grant up to 17s. 6d. a head without requiring any local contribution at all. Next, in 1891, a new Act remitted threepence a head a week of fees, and gave an additional 10s. a head a year out of Government Grant instead. This left the managers the controllers of the schools with only one-sixth of the cost of maintenance to find by fee, endowment, or subscription, the national exchequer finding five-sixths of the whole. And then in 1897 came the Aid Grant, which added about five shillings a head from Government, leaving local effort to find about one thirty-sixth of the whole cost of maintenance; while the Act laid down a legal definition of a Voluntary school which required no voluntary subscription at all.

This last microscopic fraction of the cost of maintenance is the "intolerable burden" from which the richest Church in Christendom now asks to be relieved; and the Bill proposes to transfer this burden to the rates, while leaving to the present managers the chief part of the control.

Now all these Acts have been represented as equitable compromises between the Liberal and the Denominational contentions, whereas the Act of 1870 was the only compromise—and a compromise which Mr. Chamberlain, Dr. Crosskey, Dr. Dale, and all the advanced Liberals of the day thought grossly unjust to Nonconformists; and each subsequent Act has simply been a departure from a compromise solemnly signed and sealed, a departure in the interest of one party to the deliberate treaty of 1870.

But it is not only in the matter of pounds, shillings, and pence that the Denominationalists have steadily and progressively violated the compromise of 1870. Mr. Forster's Act gave them half of the maintenance cost of their schools on the distinct and binding condition that denominational influences should be confined to the hours set apart for religious instruction. It is not too much to say that from the first the clergy of the Church of England have disregarded this agreement. They have taken the money, but they have not observed the promise by which it was obtained. Day scholars have been compelled to become Sunday scholars also. Classes have been taken into church in the middle of the school morning. The organ of the Church schools has persistently declared that "the whole school time of the child" should lead up to making him a communicant of the Church of England, and the Archbishops have declared that the religious instruction should "penetrate and influence all the instruction of whatever kind."

In view of these indubitable facts of history, it is difficult to conceive a more audacious suggestion than that the advocates of a national system of education free from denominational conditions should enter now into conference for the purpose of finding an amicable "compromise" with those who claim that the last farthing of the cost of maintenance of the Denominational schools should be provided from the public rates.

On the contrary, absolute and unswerving opposition, honourably conducted, but determined and unrelenting, seems the only temper in which we ought to face the present Bill if we are to preserve our self-respect.

For what does this Bill propose?

It is useless to enumerate again all its educational iniquities. Let us be content to recall one or two of its proposals which are in themselves sufficient to justify our cry of "No Surrender."

The Bill abolishes School Boards. School Boards have their faults; and the mode in which they are elected is singularly inept and ought to be amended. But School Boards have become an organic element of the British constitution. They have grown into our national life and profoundly influenced the whole community. Their abolition by a high-handed Government absolutely without mandate from the people would be an act of revolution of the most drastic and intolerable kind. Parliament would hardly more flagrantly violate the constitution if it proposed, without consulting the people through the polls, to sweep away all Town Councils or to abolish the Poor Law system.

The Bill perpetuates clerical and denominational control over one-half of the elementary education of the country, thus inevitably depressing permanently the standard of education and lending the powers of Parliament to the artificial sustentation of that sacerdotalism which has in all times and in all countries told so heavily against democracy and freedom.

The Bill confirms conditions which practically make a great part of the teaching appointments in the country's schools the monopoly of Anglicans or Romanists, or those who are willing insincerely to profess the tenets of those bodies.

Political rancour, personality, and innuendo are at all costs to be avoided. But we have here the direct opposition of two great and far-reaching principles which may be summed up as the Liberal and the Sacerdotal. We may say Liberal, not Nonconformist, for the principle transcends the boundaries of Nonconformity.

There are brave and noble men on either side. We may heartily respect the leaders to whom we are opposed. But the lines of battle are squarely set. Is the Liberal principle or the Sacerdotal principle to control the development of England through the twentieth century? To this issue we are called, and there ought to go forth from us no uncertain voice.

But let the battle be honourable on our side, fought out on constitutional lines. Let us concoct no factitious conscience. Let us not pretend that it wounds our consciences to pay the last shilling in rates when we have, however unwilling, yet without moral scruple, for years past paid the nineteen in taxes. Let us not organise martyrdom in squads and regiments. Let each man individually be ready for martyrdom if the call shall come. But let us stand shoulder to shoulder in a great and momentous constitutional battle in which the noblest principles which we and our fathers have cherished are committed to our charge.

LAMPETER COLLEGE AND DR. ROWLAND WILLIAMS.

On Thursday, St. David's College, Lampeter, held a solemn commemoration of the seventy-fifth anniversary of its foundation. The occasion is being used to draw public attention to the College. The Archbishop of Canterbury himself accepted an invitation to visit Lampeter and take part in the proceedings, and special descriptive articles have been published in the Church of England papers. St. David's College, which stands in the "Unitarian District" of Wales, about thirty miles from Aberystwith and the same from Carmarthen, owes its existence to a bishop, and is primarily a Theological College. It differs, however, from other theological colleges, and rather resembles the old dissenting academies, or Manchester New College before its removal to London, in that it offers a full arts course, and teaches Classics, Mathematics, and Science as well as Theology. On the other hand, it is distinguished from those unauthorised schools by the fact that it is under the patronage of the State Church, and shares in the favour shown to that denomination by the older universities. Lampeter College is "affiliated" to Oxford and Cambridge, so that a student of St. David's can take his degree after only two years of residence, instead of three.

The succession of teachers at Lampeter has been somewhat illustrious. Three living bishops, those of Chester, Exeter, and St. David's, have held the post of Principal. Three bishops no longer living, but remembered with honour, Ollivant, Harold Browne, and Perowne, were in the series of Vice-Principals. Between the last two names there comes, in chronological order, that of another man, who never became a bishop. Instead of advancement he received from the Church of England hatred and persecution. He might have stepped, as did his compeers, from the high table of St. David's to an episcopal chair; but what really befell him was to be hounded out of his tutorship, and to die a simple parish priest. For he committed the unpardonable sin. He divulged the secrets of the augurs, and incurred the wrath of his order.

Vetabo, qui Cereris sacra
Volgarit arcanæ, sub isdem
Sit trabibus, fragilemve mecum
Solvat phaselon.

Some, indeed, who were already in the same boat with him when the storm burst, did their best, it is believed, to save the vessel by making a Jonah of Dr. Rowland Williams.

"Essays and Reviews" appeared in 1860. It consisted of seven papers, written by Dr. Temple, the venerable Archbishop whose visit to Lampeter suggests this retrospect, Dr. Rowland Williams, Baden-Powell, H. B. Wilson, C. W. Goodwin, Mark Pattison, and Benjamin Jowett. It was received by the clergy at large, and the pious laity, as an act of treason to the Church and a deliberate assault on the Christian religion. The Guardian and the Record (then an important paper) denounced and derided it. The Quarterly called upon its authors to resign their positions in the Church of England. The Westminster attacked them from the other side, claimed them as friends, and bade them cast off their disguise and openly join the enemies of the faith. Ten thousand of the clergy presented a Petition of Protest to the Archbishop of Canterbury. An "Episcopal Manifesto," which bore the names of all the bishops (though some of their signatures were forged), pronounced the book anathema. In the end proceedings were taken against Dr. Williams in the Court of Arches, on the ground that his paper, "Bunsen's Biblical Researches," contained doctrine which violated his assent to the Thirty-nine Articles.

A modern reader who should go to "Essays and Reviews" in search of pungent heresy would be woefully disappointed. The world has moved since 1860. Biblical criticism has left the timid questionings of those essayists far behind, and the clergy have learned to be unashamed in torturing the canonical formularies to mean whatsoever they find convenient. But this result must be credited as much, perhaps, to "Essays and Reviews" as to any single book or deed which the liberal party in the Church has put forth. This broke the ground, and other men have been found to till it.

The ninth article in the charges against Dr. Williams alleged that "he did advisedly maintain and affirm that the Prophet Jonah was not a real historical person, and that the canonical book written by him and incorporated in the Old Testament was not really written by him . . . and that the Book of Daniel was not the work of the Prophet Daniel." Such was heresy forty years ago.

The course of litigation was tedious and its ways involved; but the issue was that a condemnation of Dr. Williams in the Court of Arches was reversed by that friend of sinners, the Queen in Privy Council, and each side had to pay its own costs.

We others disagree, at some points, with the methods of the Broad Church; but we recognise that we have high and holy aims in common. Dr. Williams, writing to Dr. Martineau in 1869, upon the scheme of a "Free Christian Union," proposed by him, said "I must sum up that the amount of agreement which suffices for sympathy has not force or momentum enough for co-operation." Let us try to realise the converse truth, that an amount of agreement which is insufficient for co-operation may suffice for sympathy.

A STUDY IN HUMAN NATURE.*

IV.

The outcome of Mr. James' whole treatment of the subject of Religion is that one great central problem has gradually taken more and more definite shape: "Is the sense of the Divine Presence a sense of anything objectively true?" That there is such a sense is evident as a matter of fact; and materialism cannot explain it by reference to physiology or pathology. We have considered Mr. James' own answer to the question aforesaid. There is, he maintains, a sense of something beyond the limits of the small struggling self that feels; something that is morally and spiritually higher, and which becomes a saving force when we bring ourselves into connection with it. Whatever else the "something more" may be, it is in the first place the subconscious continuation of our conscious self; this, Mr. James holds to be scientifically probable, or rather "provable though not yet proved," as we may otherwise express it. But this is not all. The subconscious higher influence indicates the real presence of the Divine. Mr. James seems willing to admit that this is an over-belief which is not proved, and not provable, at all events by any strictly rational means. We have now to examine the grounds on which he rests this opinion. To some extent we may do an injustice to Mr. James; for he repeatedly warns us that in this book his contributions to the theological and philosophical side of religion are only "suggestions," to be developed and defended in another volume. But the "suggestions" form a tolerably complete account of the author's point of view; especially when they are considered in connection with a previous volume—the famous collection of essays, entitled "The Will to Believe."

"Rationalism" Examined.

The question then is this: Can our Reason, our Intelligence, stamp a warrant of veracity upon the religious man's sense of the Divine? What Reason can do depends upon what Reason is—its "nature and limits." What is Mr. James' view on this basal question? He leaves us in little doubt as to what his view is. He says that the first thing the intellect does with an object or event is to class it along with something else; and the next thing the intellect does is to lay bare the causes in which the thing originates. These causes are looked for in other events that have gone on along with it or before it. It is further assumed that we are brought into contact with real existence through the bodily senses and in no other way. "Rationalism" is the name often given to the mental tendency which treats this kind of explanation and evidence as an ideal. Mr. James describes it more precisely thus:—

* "The Varieties of Religious Experience: a Study in Human Nature." Being the Gifford Lectures on Natural Religion, delivered in Edinburgh in 1901 and 1902. By William James, LL.D., &c., Professor of Philosophy at Harvard University. London: Longmans and Co. 12s. net.

Rationalism insists that all our beliefs ought ultimately to find for themselves articulate grounds. Such grounds, for rationalism, must consist of four things: (1) definitely statable abstract principles; (2) definite facts of sensation; (3) definite hypotheses based on such facts; and (4) definite inferences logically drawn.

This is what Reason always tries to do—we are told—and more than this it cannot do. "It is wrong," said W. K. Clifford, "always, everywhere, and for everyone, to believe anything upon insufficient evidence"—even if the belief is true, as he frankly explains. "That man has had a liberal education," said Huxley, "whose intellect is a clear cold logical engine, with all its parts in smooth working order, and ready like a steam-engine to be turned to any kind of work." When we add to this the assumption that the machine will only work with facts impressed on the bodily senses, we have "rationalism." The present Prime Minister, in his book on "The Foundations of Belief," used the word "rationalism" in this sense; a fact which his opponents frequently forgot, in their indignation at his assertion that the logical outcome of rationalism is materialism.

Assuming that rationalism, understood as Mr. James defines it, is a true account of Reason, what can Reason, so understood, accomplish? Obviously it can criticise; and its tests will be very simple, as Hume showed long ago:—

If we take in hand any volume of divinity, or school metaphysics, for instance, let us ask: Does it contain any abstract reasoning concerning quantity or number? No. Does it contain any experimental reasoning concerning matter of fact and existence? No. Commit it then to the flames; for it can contain nothing but sophistry and illusion.

With the same object in view, rationalism is deliberately adopted as a critical and negative principle by such organisations as the "Rationalist Press Association."

Rationalism no Road.

What can rationalism do, constructively? Mr. James does full justice to it in this respect, describing it as a splendid intellectual tendency, of which physical science (among other good things) is the result. In his fine address on "Is Life Worth Living?" (published in "The Will to Believe") he says:—

Science has made such glorious leaps in the last three hundred years, and extended our knowledge of Nature so enormously both in general and in detail; men of science, moreover, have as a class displayed such admirable virtues—that it is no wonder if the worshippers of science lose their head. In this very university [Harvard] I have heard more than one teacher say that all the fundamental conceptions of truth have already been found by science, and that the future has only the details of the picture to fill in. But . . . it is hard to see how one who is actively advancing any part of science can make a mistake so crude.* Think how many absolutely new scientific conceptions have arisen in our own generation, how many new problems have been formulated that were never thought of before. . . . Is it credible that such a mushroom knowledge, such a growth overnight as this, can represent more than the minutest glimpse of what the universe will really prove to be when adequately understood? No! Our science is but a drop, our ignorance a sea. Whatever else be certain, this at least is certain—that the world of our present natural knowledge is enveloped in a larger world of some sort, of whose residual properties we at present can frame no positive idea. Agnostic positivism, of course, admits this principle theoretically in the most cordial terms, but insists that we must not turn it to any practical use. We have no right, this doctrine tells us, to dream dreams, or to suppose anything about the unseen part of the universe, merely because to do so may be for what we are pleased to call our highest interests. We must always wait for sensible evidence for our beliefs; and where such evidence is inaccessible we must frame no hypothesis whatever.

Is there any way of escape from the apparent impasse into which rationalism has brought us? We may reject, as altogether arbitrary, the limitation of reality to what is capable of impressing our bodily senses, and we may insist that there are moral facts which are just as real as the physical. But as long as reason can do no more than observe, compare, and draw inferences from what is given to it, we cannot get from these human facts to anything Divine. The intellectual edifice of "Rational Theology" has broken down. If you start with merely human facts all that you can infer from them will be other human facts: this is the root of the matter. Mr. James contents himself with pointing out that the "metaphysical" attributes of God are devoid of religious significance, while His moral attributes are proved by bad arguments.

Kant and his Successors.

There is a way of escape which has long been open. It consists in seeing that the work of Reason is not exhausted in "rationalism"—in observing, comparing, and inferring from such facts as it can find. Rationalism has its rights; that is why German thinkers speak of it by a name of its own, calling it the Understanding, to distinguish it from the Reason. Reason is at home with principles to which the Understanding is a stranger. In that monumental work "The Critique of Pure Reason," a work marked by almost every possible defect of literary form, Kant proved that the world of the Understanding (the world of scientific objects and laws) cannot be all. We say that he proved this; not—as Mr. James does in the passage we have quoted—by rhetorically exhibiting it as a sort of instinctive belief, but by a patient, laborious analysis of the Understanding itself, showing what are the principles which it uses in building up Science, and what are their limits: and in the same way he is able to show that Reason itself makes demands that could never be satisfied by the world in which the Understanding is at home. Mr. James appears to find no help in this line of thought, from which the various forms of modern Idealism have developed. He does, however, comment on one or two special forms which this Idealism has taken through the influence of Hegel. He argues, in our opinion with much truth, that such a treatment of Religion as we find in the writings of the late Principal John Caird is good as a restatement of religious experience, but uncoercive as reasoned proof. And he justly protests against the pretension made by some writers to construct Religion out of the resources of Reason alone.

Two Kinds of Supernaturalism.

One fundamental question involved in the Hegelian form of Idealism he discusses with greater fulness. This is the question arising out of the meaning of "supernaturalism." In its most general sense, supernaturalism means the belief held by most thinkers, by Spencer as much as by Newman, that the world of our present natural knowledge is enveloped in a larger world of some sort. In speaking of the influential form of this belief, which he calls "universalistic supernaturalism," and which is a necessary part of the Hegelian view, Mr. James goes to the root of the matter. Universalistic supernaturalism holds that the ideal world (which is identified with God or the Absolute) is not a world of facts, but of the meaning of facts; it is a point of view for judging facts. It makes no difference to any particular fact. Of an idealism which rests on this assumption, Mr. James says:—

It confines itself to sentiments about life as a whole, sentiments which may be admiring and adoring, but which need not be so, as the existence of systematic pessimism proves. In this universalistic way of taking the ideal world, the essence of practical religion seems to me to evaporate. Both instinctively and for logical reasons, I find it hard to believe that principles can exist which make no difference to facts. . . . Transcendental Idealism, of course, insists that its ideal world makes this difference, that facts exist. We owe it to the Absolute that we have a world of fact at all. "A world" of fact!—that exactly is the trouble. An entire world is the smallest unit with which the Absolute can work, whereas to our finite minds work for the better ought to be done within this world, setting in at single points. Our difficulties and our ideals are all piecemeal affairs, but the Absolute can do no piecework for us; so that all the interests which our poor souls compass raise their heads too late. . . . It is strange to see this blind corner into which Christian thought has worked itself at last, with its God who can raise no particular weight whatever, who can help us with no private burden, and who is on the side of our enemies as much as he is on our own.

Hence Mr. James maintains that the existence of God makes an actual difference in fact:—

The appearance is that something ideal, which in one sense is part of ourselves, and in another sense is not ourselves, actually exerts an influence, raises our centre of personal energy, and produces regenerative effects unattainable in other ways.

So far, he is on safe ground; but when he goes on to refer approvingly to what he calls "piecemeal supernaturalism," which he deliberately speaks of as if it were the same as the old obscurantist belief in "miracles,"* and when again, at the end of the book, he expresses a preference for polytheism, we can only suppose that he is adopting a "slapdash" style of speech in order to shock academic prejudices. That there is some kind of unity or harmony in the universe is obvious; were it not so chaos would ensue. But we must grant to Mr. James that there is no logically coercive proof of absolute unity in the universe. This is, rather, a supreme act of rational faith. But many philosophers are very unwilling to admit this; and when anyone points it out, they raise a great cloud of dust and accuse him of denying that there is any unity whatever in the universe. And while the notion of "unity" is bandied about in the Philosophical world as a sectarian shibboleth, Mr. James evidently enjoys treating it with somewhat boisterous contempt.

* The tone and tendency of the discussions at the British Association in Belfast seem to show that this attitude of mind is a thing of the past.

The "Pragmatic" Test.

The contribution which our author makes to the solution of the great problem is of the first importance as a contribution to philosophy. The principle of it is clearly stated in a well-known saying of Christ (Matthew vii. 15 to 18). The test for any belief is practical. What are its fruits? Accordingly, Mr. James seems prepared to maintain that the sole significance of thought is conduct ("conduct" in a wide sense, understood as the moral side of life).

To this view the name "pragmatism" has been given. Its truth and importance ought to be evident from the fact that we are constantly using this test in common life. And it justifies the religious man's sense of the Divine, for this may become a source of good in life. But Mr. James regards the pragmatic test as all sufficient in those realms of belief where the evidence of the senses is unavailable; and this leaves us in a state of intellectual chaos which is intolerable. If we know truth by its fruits only, by what standard are we to judge the "fruits"? Grant that the test of religious truth is that it "works"—that life as we know it, or as in our best moments we should wish it to be, may be built upon the belief; how are we to tell what life really is, and what we, as human beings, may require that it should be?

There are further questions which "pragmatism" cannot deal with. Mr. James says:—

> The practical needs and experiences of religion seem to me sufficiently met by the belief that beyond each man and in a fashion continuous with him there exists a larger power which is friendly to him and to his ideals. All that the facts require is that the power should be both other and larger than our conscious selves. Anything larger will do, if only it be large enough to trust for the next step: it need not be infinite, it need not be solitary.

Does Mr. James really suppose that the object of religion can be left so wholly indefinite and vague; or that if men are to worship at all, they will not want to know a great deal more clearly what or whom they worship? There again Reason must supervene on experience to interpret and explain, to justify and criticise. And this is possible, we affirm, because Reason is not the mere empty thing which Mr. James supposes it to be.

If on the one hand the author's delineations and criticisms of religious experience are of the greatest value—on the other this campaign of blind "misology"* is little less than deplorable. At the present day Plato's words are more than ever true—"to hate Reason is the greatest evil that can befall us." If the essence of religion is salvation, the intelligence of man needs saving too—from its confusions and contradictions, and its disconnected views of existence. Socrates reminds us that men became misologists, or haters of Reason, just as they become misanthropists. He who has trusted many times in men who have proved false, ends by thinking that there is no good at all in anyone; so he who has believed again and again in arguments, which afterwards he has found proved to be unsound, ends by disbelieving in Reason altogether. And the wise advice of the aged teacher on the eve of death, might well be laid to heart by us of to-day:—

> Let us not admit into our minds the notion that all reasoning is very likely unsound; let us rather think that we ourselves are not yet sound. And we must earnestly strive like men to become sound, you, my friends, for the sake of all your future life, and I because of my death!

In these words—unconsciously, perhaps—the truth of "pragmatism" is placed in its true light. Once allow to Reason its proper rights and do justice to its demands, then we find in "pragmatism" only a one-sided statement of what has been so often forgotten. It is by action that our experience is moulded and made, and material formed for Reason to treat in the light of its higher demands. For there are ranges of human nature where truth of belief dawns upon the world only in consequence of right action; and the deepest truth of all—the divine meaning of life's duties and ideals—can be won only in the work of life.

S. H. Mellone.

The programme for the new session of the London School of Economics and Political Science shows on its cover a picture of its fine new buildings in Clare Market, W.C., the "Passmore Edwards Hall," in connection with the London University, and a map also shows the situation of the Hall, not far from the Strand, and equally distant from the Law Courts and Lincoln's Inn Fields. Mr. W. A. S. Hewins, M.A., the Director of the School, will meet intending students and advise them as to courses of study, on Wednesday, Oct. 8, and the two following days. The inaugural lecture is to be given on Friday evening, Oct. 10, by Sir A. W. Rücker, D.Sc., F.R.S., Principal of the London University. Among the lecturers in the School, in addition to the Director, are Professor Foxwell (on Banking and Currency), Mr. Graham Wallas (on Central Government), and Mr. Sidney Webb (on London Government). Mr. Hewins is to lecture on Modern Economic History and other subjects.

HUXLEY AND EVOLUTION.

Sir,—Dr. Hicks's estimate of the character and labours of Professor Huxley is so clear and good, that one hardly likes to suggest emendation, even on a minor point. But there is one paragraph calculated to convey the idea that Huxley never regarded evolution as anything more than a working hypothesis: "the doubt . . . remained his own to the last," &c. Contrary to this, Professor G. B. Howes, at the Belfast meeting of the British Association the other week, referring to the discovery in America of the ancestors of the horse, said, "No wonder that this should have provoked our Huxley to the remark that in it we have the demonstrative evidence of the occurrence of evolution." The facts which convinced Huxley are given in the third chapter of his "American Addresses," published in 1877.

LOYALTY TO TRUTH.

We have received from the Rev. W. Mellor another letter of considerable length on this subject with reference to last week's letter from the Rev. Frank Walters. Mr. Mellor affirms that Mr. Walters has misunderstood, misquoted, and misrepresented him, and remains entirely sectarian in his position. These and other matters, however, we must leave to the critical acumen of our readers in judgment on the correspondence which has now passed, and can only afford space for the following conclusion of Mr. Mellor's letter:—

"Meanwhile, to show the enormous practical, as well as theoretical, difference between the Unitarian and, therefore, sectarian Church Mr. Walters and his friends advocate, and the Free Catholic Church I and my friends stand for, let us suppose the case of Mr. Walters, as given by himself, extended. We will suppose, then, that Mr. Walters, in his later life, should get beyond his Unitarianism into a larger theology and Christology, as, in earlier life, he got beyond his Trinitarianism, would he, in the latter case, be bound to change his Church, as he felt himself bound to do in the earlier case? Assuredly he would if, as he contends, our Church, speaking generally and collectively, is a merely Unitarian Church; but assuredly he would not if, as I contend, speaking again generally and collectively, our Church is a Free Catholic Church, since, in that case, ample provision is made for all the theological, Christological, and kindred changes possible within the very wide limits of the essential nature of a Church as an association of men and women for the worship and service of the living God, and for all that appertains thereto. The difference is, indeed, enormous, and all but boundless; and, for myself, as for over twenty-five years past, I shall still follow the higher ideal, though the way thereof has never yet been very easy or smooth to walk on, nor is so now, nor at all likely to be for many long years to come."

PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY OF LONDON & THE SOUTH EASTERN COUNTIES.

The annual meeting of this Assembly was held at Hastings on Tuesday, favoured by very pleasant weather, and if the attendance, owing to the distance from London, was not very large, there was a representative gathering of friends from both the metropolitan and the country churches, and the day was greatly enjoyed.

The annual service, in the Free Christian Church, was conducted by the Rev. J. J. Marten, of Horsham, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. G. Dawes Hicks, of Islington.

THE SERMON.

Based upon the words, "God is a Spirit, and they that worship Him, must worship in spirit and in truth (John iv. 24), the sermon was a powerful exposition of the principles and the mission of the Free Churches represented in the Assembly. The progress of popular enlightenment, the preacher said, was by no means such that they could be assured that the superstitions not only of Roman Catholicism but of Paganism would not still find ready acceptance among the masses of the people, and it was idle to deny the very serious difficulties which stood in the way of religion basing its appeal on the inner consciousness and the rational experience of the individual soul. Mere iconoclasm would always meet with a response from a certain class of minds, but no Church could be built upon that. The work of destruction would go on with or without their co-operation, but the mission of their Churches was to be the bearers of positive conceptions of truth, witnesses to the spiritual realities inherent in human nature.

They must not expect that appeal to touch the masses, nor must they be led away by the common assertion that their distinctive teaching was "plain, easy, and simple" for everyone to understand. Whoever had grappled with all the implications of the great affirmation of God in view of the wider conception of the Universe, could no longer make that easy assertion. Their faith made a high demand; and the majority of men, immersed in the cares and interests of the material world, rather than seek direct and immediate contact with spiritual realities, turned aside and contented themselves with external signs, with the sensuous pleasures of mystic rites or the authority of an infallible Church. In every age there had been few worshippers of the spiritual God; most men needed the help of images. Christianity in its origin very soon became a new Paganism.

Thus it was the lot of their Churches to occupy the post of danger in the religious world; their position must be secured by the honest toil of individual thought, and held by the strength of personal conviction. Content to be without visible success, sufferers, perhaps, from adverse waves of popular sentiment, they must rely on their hold upon unseen but eternal principles, and occupy the unprotected country on the border line, as defenders of spiritual things. It was a great responsibility which was laid upon them, to keep abreast of the advancing stream of scientific and philosophical thought, and a great privilege to be the guardians of the paths which led to Theism—the first to bear the brunt of the attack, the helpers of the earnest and thoughtful people who needed such spiritual fellowship.

The post might seem to some too dangerous, because reason was regarded simply as a disintegrating power. But in reality it was not so. Reason was inherent in the Universe, and the human soul felt itself everywhere at home. Mind could only interrogate that which worked on the lines of mind. Nature spoke a language which the human soul could interpret, because embodied in Nature was a Soul in kind and quality one with that of the interpreter. Thus the great principle of the spirituality of God, which Jesus proclaimed, received its interpretation.

If in their Free Churches they would go forward not pledged to any special form of doctrine, but ready to help the germinating conceptions of the present and the coming time, to devote their best powers of intellect and heart to that, then, although theirs might never be the Churches of the great masses, yet they might be centres where earnest thinkers might find the Divinity, the God whom they could worship in spirit and in truth.

After the sermon a collection for the funds of the Assembly was made, and luncheon was subsequently served in the Albany Hotel.

THE BUSINESS MEETING.

In the afternoon the annual business meeting was held in the Queen's Avenue Assembly Rooms. The President, Mr. John Harrison, was happily so far recovered from his recent illness that he was able to take the chair and deliver the presidential address, though prudence forbade his staying for the evening meeting to speak then, as had been announced.

The roll having been called by the Rev. Frederic Allen, the secretary, the following names of new-comers into the Province were added: the Revs. Eustace Thompson (Bermondsey), Gordon Cooper (Essex Church), R. H. Greaves (Highgate), G. Critchley (Kentish Town), W. H. Rose (Walthamstow), J. Ellis (Mansford-street), F. T. Reed (Besselsgreen), J. Felstead (Lewes), J. H. Wicksteed (London District), while the Rev. A. Farquharson's name was added to the list of ministers without charge, and Mr. George Ward's to the list of lay preachers.

The Reports, which had been previously printed, were taken as read.

The Committee's Report referred to the loss sustained by the death of the Rev. S. F. Williams, and recorded the chief matters of interest in the work of the Province, the appointment of a minister at Bermondsey, and Sir E. Durning Lawrence's gift of five freehold houses adjoining the church in Fort-road, the opening of the new church at Wood-green, the good prospect of the establishment of a church at Acton, the opening of the school-hall at Reading, the appointment of the ministers above-mentioned to positions in the Province, and other matters. The resignations of the Revs. A. Farquharson and Edgar Daplyn, and the removal of the Rev. W. G. Cadman to Macclesfield, were noted, with good wishes to each. The resignation of Mr. Walter Baily, the treasurer of the Assembly, was recorded with great regret and warm thanks for his services during the past eleven years. The accounts showed a balance of over £100 in hand for the General Fund.

The report of the Minister at Large, the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, told of a large amount of faithful work in support of the weaker churches of the Province, and, among other matters, recorded that at Halstead, during the winter months, Mrs. Kemp, a lady-member of the congregation, had conducted a service on alternate Sundays with great acceptance.

The President, having offered the thanks of the Assembly to Dr. Hicks for his admirable sermon, moved the adoption of the reports, which was agreed to. The report of the Advisory Committee, sent by the Rev. J. Harwood, who was absent in the North, was happily very brief, as its services had not been required; but it was a negative benefit to the Province that the Committee was there if wanted.

The Rev. F. K. Freeston then read the report of the Public Questions Committee, appointed at the last meeting of the Assembly. It dealt in an admirable manner with five questions intimately affecting the national welfare: Gambling, Temperance Reform, the Housing Problem, the Settlement in South Africa after the War, and Education.

On the motion of the President, seconded by Dr. Hicks, it was agreed that the Report be received, printed, and circulated. We shall therefore shortly have the opportunity of referring more fully to its contents.

The Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, who subsequently spoke, bore very warm testimony to the earnestness, patience, and persistence of the weaker churches in isolated places in maintaining their positions. They must not despise the day of small things. Dogmatic and ecclesiastical Christianity were losing their hold. What people chiefly welcomed now was genuine practical religion, and they must have good hope for the cause of liberal religion.

On the motion of the President, the Rev. F. K. Freeston was elected President for the coming year, and a hearty vote of thanks having been passed to Mr. Walter Baily, the retiring treasurer, the President was elected to that office, and expressed his great satisfaction in undertaking it. The other officers, the General Committee, Advisory and Public Questions Committees were also appointed, two new bye-laws were passed, and a welcome was given to representatives of kindred societies, to which the following briefly replied:—Rev. W. Copeland Bowie for the B. and F.U.A., Mr. David Martineau for the L.D.U.S., Lady Wilson for the C.P.M., Mr. Ion Pritchard for the S.S.A., and the Rev. J. A. Brinkworth for the G.B.A.

An invitation for the assembly to meet next year at Highgate was cordially accepted, and the Rev. J. J. Marten was elected preacher, and the Rev. S. G. Preston supporter.

The President then delivered his address, paying in the first instance a tribute to the memory of the late S. F. Williams. He thanked the committee and officers for the help they had given him during his year of office, which, he said, had been an education to him, enlarging his views of the work done in the Province. He warmly commended the Ministers' Pension and Insurance Fund to the support of the churches, so that every minister might be enabled to enjoy its benefits. To that end he urged an increase of the funds at the disposal of the Assembly.

A cordial vote of thanks to the President brought the meeting to a close, and the company adjourned for tea at the Albany Hotel.

POSTAL MISSION.

After tea the Branch Postal Mission held its annual meeting in the church. In the unavoidable absence of Mrs. Farrington (president), the Rev. W. G. TARRANT presided. Lady Wilson (secretary) presented the report, which showed that correspondence was being conducted with writers in many parts of the world, and the library was well used. The adoption of the report was moved by the Chairman and seconded by the Rev. J. H. Wicksteed. Lady Wilson was warmly thanked for her valuable services, and she was re-elected as secretary.

THE EVENING MEETING.

The evening meeting was held in the Assembly Rooms, Mr. FREDERICK A. HARRISON in the chair. After an opening hymn the Chairman welcomed the members of the Assembly to Hastings and explained the absence of the President, his brother, who was to have been one of the speakers.

The Rev. W. COPELAND BOWIE gave an address on the crisis in national education, a question, as he said, of supreme importance, for the child and its education were in danger of being lost sight of in the warfare of words in the Press and in the country. The real mischief of the present Bill was that it left the control of public funds in the hands of private managers, and resistance should be centred on that point. For the rest, there might be a good measure of compromise, to satisfy the denominationalists and give them facilities for their distinctive teaching. All the trouble had arisen through religion, or what was called religion, and its teaching must be separated entirely from the control of the schools. He did not go so far as some of his Nonconformist brethren in advising non-payment of rates. There was no fundamental difference between paying through the taxes and through the rates, and it was better in a country such as theirs to gain their end by constitutional agitation. He was inclined to think that the Bill had elements out of which something could be made. For thirty years the people had had the opportunity of adopting School Boards, and even such towns as Preston and Stockport had not done so, not from any love of the Church but to save their pockets. Now he hoped there would be an opportunity of bringing the whole country into one uniform system, and make the people pay equally throughout for education. In conclusion he said that religious education was in a most unsatisfactory condition. A great deal of what was called religious teaching and Bible teaching even in Board-schools was such that they could not be content, and great injury was done to the children, when they discovered the unreality of what they had been taught. They ought earnestly to seek for some better system of teaching.

On the motion of Mr. WILKES SMITH, seconded by Mr. R. W. KITTLE, a resolution was then passed, with one dissentient, and ordered to be sent to the Prime Minister, the Leader of the Opposition, and others, protesting against the Education Bill, on the following grounds: That it does so little for secondary and technical education, that it abolishes School Boards, which have done so much for English education during the last thirty years, and substitutes education committees not directly responsible to the ratepayers, and that it will allow Voluntary schools, almost entirely supported by rates and taxes, to be managed by a majority of unrepresentative managers.

Mr. F. LAWSON DODD then gave an eloquent address, on the simplicity of the Unitarian or Free Church Movement. In all departments of life at the present time, he said, they saw a simplification of life. Now with the doctor, the question was not "What shall I take?" but "What shall I give up?" If they could get fresh air and sunshine and exercise in the open fields, then they would be saved. And what was true of science was true also of religious development. Now they cared less for the Athanasian Creed than for the Lord's Prayer, less for the Thirty-nine Articles than for the Beatitudes. And they aimed at simplicity of life, and held to the great truths of the Fatherhood of God and Brotherhood of Man, not because it made things easy for them, but because it opened their hearts to the source of divine life and truth. Then they realised the littleness of their own achievements, and felt that religion must leave the realm of words and enter that of deeds. They must beware of the halo of religious sentiment that merely covered up the emptiness beneath, and see to it that they were really doing something for the Kingdom of God. Life, Death, and Time were greater teachers than the parsons, and even if all the churches were closed, those great silent messengers would be always teaching, and would turn men to the light:—

> O come into the light of things,
> Let Nature be your teacher.

That simplicity of life would compel them to face the great realities, that they might really learn to love God, and their neighbour as themselves. They could not fail to be struck by the contrast between the teaching of Christ and that of modern commercialism. They must not shrink from the facts and must give themselves to the service of the Kingdom.

Helpful addresses were also given by the Revs. W. G. TARRANT and H. M. LIVENS, and votes of thanks brought a very successful meeting to a close. The ministers and delegates are greatly indebted to Mr. F. A. Harrison, of Hastings, for the ample hospitality he extended to them at lunch.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Ainsworth Presbyterian Chapel.—The annual choir and Harvest Festival sermons were preached on Sunday last by the Rev. Neander Anderton, B.A., of Preston. Special anthems and solos were sung at each service. There were good congregations at each service, and the collections amounted to £9 3s. The fruit will be distributed to the sick and poor of the parish.

Byker.—Last Sunday the Harvest Thanksgiving service took place, when Mr. Glendining delivered an address appropriate to the occasion. On Wednesday evening a harvest soirée took place. There was a large attendance; and after tea a concert was given by the Orpheus Prize Glee Choir. On the previous Sunday special sermons were preached to large congregations by the Rev. Frank Walters and Mr. Charles Bell, of Redcar.

Garston.—A Sale of Work was held on the 24th ult., by the kindness of the Committee, in the Ancient Chapel Meeting-room. The gross receipts were £26; and, deducting cost of material and expenses, £22 will be available for class-books and a Sunday-school library, and as a contribution to the erection of an iron church. Towards the church, a gentleman had already promised £50; and, since the sale, a lady has sent £5, whilst there are goods over which may bring in a few pounds more.

Hale.—The Rev. A. Leslie Smith, B.A., whose acceptance of the pulpit of Hale Chapel we have already announced, is to enter on his duties on Sunday week, Oct. 12.

Kirkcaldy.—A service was held last Sunday evening in the Hunter-street Unitarian Church, for the induction of the Rev. G. A. Ferguson, as minister—Mr. Ferguson having just completed his course as a student in Manchester College, Oxford. The Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, who had also preached at the morning service an impressive sermon on "Bearing Witness to the Truth," gave the charge to the minister, and the Rev. James Forrest to the congregation. On Monday evening a welcome soirée was held in the church, at which representatives were present from the Unitarian congregations in Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Aberdeen. Mr. H. B. Melville occupied the chair, and extended a welcome to Mr. Ferguson on behalf of the congregation, the Rev. R. B. Drummond (Edinburgh) on behalf of the Unitarian ministers of Scotland, and Mr. Graham (Glasgow) for the Scottish Unitarian Association. The Rev. Alexander Webster, of Aberdeen, and the Rev. James Forrest, of Glasgow, also spoke, the former humorously describing various types of ministers and congregations, and the latter giving some sound advice to both minister and people. Mr. Ferguson, in his reply, thanked one and all for their kind welcome; he was himself a Scotsman, and closely connected with Fife; but, like most of his hearers, had also been obliged to abandon the old Presbyterian theology for the broader outlook and freer atmosphere of Unitarianism. After describing how he himself had made the pilgrimage, Mr. Ferguson said that what he valued most of all in that pulpit was his perfect liberty of thought and utterance, a privilege worth far more to him than hundreds of pounds of salary. In that church they could only worship the Highest, and in the worship of the Highest they had a bond of union stronger than all minor differences of opinion. During the evening a telegram was received from the late minister, the Rev. A. E. Parry, regretting his inability to be present, but sending his best wishes. Music added to the enjoyment of the evening, which terminated with a comprehensive vote of thanks, and the Benediction pronounced by the new minister.

London: Bermondsey.—On Sunday evening a service was held in the Fort-road Unitarian Church for the induction of the Rev. Eustace Thompson as minister. Mr. Thompson, who was a student of the Home Missionary College, Manchester, had been for the past seven weeks already in charge of the church. The service was conducted by the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, who delivered the charge to the congregation, in the course of which he spoke warmly of the patient faith and persistent endeavour of the faithful few who still remained attached to the church. Now they hoped for a better day, and he urged the congregation to realise their own responsibility in the work no less than that of the minister. The charge to the minister was given by the Rev. Alexander Gordon, Principal of the Home Missionary College. He spoke to Mr. Thompson of his mission, his studies and his expectations. The mission, he said, was the ministry started among men by Jesus Christ, to make known the mind of God and lead men into that way. It was to share, to show and make influential in the hearts of men the spirit of Christ, the spirit of lowliness, patience, faith, self-forgetting, charity, obedience, soundness of mind and heart and soul. His studies hitherto had been of books, now they must be of men. In the study of human life books would help in so far as they were full of human nature, and above all the greatest of books. It would not be enough for him to be a man of learning, industry and earnestness, he must be a man of feeling too, and of judgment. In that also he could learn of Christ. As to his expectations, he must pitch them high, high as his aim and ideal. He must expect much from his people and from himself. Above all, he must never let his expectation of Almighty God fail; for with Him help was always to be found. In conclusion, Mr. Gordon gave him the right hand of fellowship in the ministry. Mr. Thompson subsequently made an address, in which he spoke of his ideal and his expectations and hope in the work. On Monday evening a welcome meeting was held,

Mr. John Harrison occupied the chair, and offered words of courage and cheer to Mr. Thompson in the arduous task which he had undertaken at Bermondsey. Short addresses conveying the good wishes of London ministers and congregations were delivered by the Revs. W. Copeland Bowie, L. Jenkins Jones, Joseph H. Wicksteed, F. W. Stanley, and A. J. Marchant. The Rev. Alexander Gordon spoke of his admiration for Mr. Thompson as an earnest student, a devoted worker, and as a man who was consecrated to the service of religion. Mr. Thompson, in responding, pleaded for the co-operation and sympathy of the little group of worshippers whose number it was hoped would soon increase. A vote of thanks to the chairman and the speakers, moved by Mr. George Callow, brought the proceedings to a close.

London: Wandsworth.—On Sunday morning the Rev. W. G. Tarrant preached a special sermon for "Re-union Sunday," and the revised edition of the "Essex Hall Hymnal" was used by the congregation for the first time. To-morrow (Sunday) the seventeenth anniversary of the opening of the church is to be celebrated, together with the Harvest Thanksgiving.

Maidstone.—The annual Harvest Thanksgiving services were held on Sunday, and a Scholars' Harvest Thanksgiving service was held in the afternoon. Harvest hymns and the anthem, "O Lord, how manifold," were well rendered by the choir, and the teachers and scholars sang the special hymns. All the services were well attended.

Mossley.—The congregation of the Christian Church have lost a life-long member, a trustee, and a faithful worker in the Sunday-school, by the death of Mr. Herbert Lawton, at the age of 45. Mr. Lawton was a devoted temperance worker, and was also closely identified with the Mossley Mechanics' Institute, of which he became one of the hon. secretaries. The attendance at the funeral proved in what high regard Mr. Lawton was held.

Norwich.—Among those who have passed away into the unseen world, one who has borne testimony to the faith which she held, and to a life consistent with it, must be enrolled Miss Lucy Kitton, a long-time worshipper at the Octagon Chapel, and one of its oldest members. The Sunday and day schools, the District Visiting Society, each in their turn engaged her care. For many years devoted to the tuition of the young—there are those still living whose mental and moral growth she helped to develop. To a late period the social problems and passing events of the day had a keen interest for her. At length the shadows of the evening of life began to fall, and a long life of usefulness has been brought to a close.

Ringwood. — Harvest Thanksgiving services were held here on Sept. 28, when appropriate discourses were delivered by Mr. J. Ewart, M.A., McQuaker Scholar, of Manchester College, Oxford. In the evening there was a Service of Song. Collections were made for the District Nursing Fund, amounting to £2 7s.

Stockton-on-Tees.—The Harvest Festival was held last Sunday, the church having been decorated by members of the Young People's Christian Service Guild. The Rev. Henry Cross (minister of the church) preached. The annual meeting of the church was held on Monday evening, when most encouraging reports were presented from the church secretary, from Young People's Guild, the Band of Hope, Ladies' Sewing Committee, Social Committee, &c., and officers and committees were appointed for the year.

Tavistock.—Last Sunday Harvest Thanksgiving Services were held at the Abbey Chapel. Familiar harvest hymns were heartily sung, and members of the Volunteer Band assisted with instrumental music.

Tenterden.—On Sunday last the Rev. Felix Taylor preached farewell sermons before his departure on a voyage to South Africa for the benefit of his health. At the close of evening service a presentation was made to Mr. Taylor of a pair of field-glasses, with a short address, in appreciation of his services during the past eight years.

To make the people fit to choose, and the chosen fit to govern; to teach them not to admire wealth or birth; to hate turbulence and ambition; to place everyone his private welfare and happiness in the public peace, liberty, and safety—till this be done I am in doubt whether our State will ever be thoroughly settled; never are we likely till then to see an end of our troubles and continual changes.—John Milton.

The Best Guide to the Best New Books.

The Literary World.

[ESTABLISHED 1867.]

EVERY THURSDAY, 1d. MONTHLY, 6d.

Although published at a penny, this Journal is a literary organ of the highest class. The Newest Books in Fiction; Biography, Religion, and Theology; Travel; Poetry; Science; Philosophy and Politics; History and Topography—in fact, in every department of Art and Literature—are reviewed in its columns by a staff of experienced Reviewers, including several well-known men of letters.

By means of its "Table-Talk" paragraphs, readers are kept fully informed as to all literary movements. "The Classified List of the Publications of the Week" shows at a glance what works are in the market.

Critical Reviews of all Important Works are given, sometimes in the form of Signed Articles.

Brief Illustrated Extracts, in combination with Comments, enable readers to form a very fair idea of the Best New Books.

THE SOUTH SHORE UNITARIAN CHURCH, BLACKPOOL,

has purchased, at a cost of nearly £600, a plot of freehold land, and they now appeal for help to erect a plain, substantial building to serve for all purposes. It is hoped to be able to do this for £1,500, making a total cost of £2,100. The land, thanks to the generosity of Mrs. John Grundy, of Summerseat; Miss S. Scholes Wrigley, of Windermere (on her own and her late mother's behalf), and Mr. R. T. Heape, of Rochdale, is entirely paid for. The Congregation have themselves promised over £300 towards the erection of the building. They carry on the Services and the Sunday School without any grant, and they feel that the remarkable success of their efforts justifies them in asking friends to help them to carry on their work under more favourable circumstances than at present. Their appeal has the full approval of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, the North and East Lancashire Mission, and the North Lancashire and Westmorland Unitarian Association; and the B. and F. U. A. has promised £25 to the Building Fund.
